and offend the enemy. Neither had they sustained and held out the first shout, charge and H shock of the Romans (as having now for certain years past been used ever more to go away deseated and vanquished) but that a mightier fear imprinted and setled in their heart roots, held them perforce from running away: for they ever had continually represented in their eye, the whole turniture of that secret sacrifice; of those armed sacrificers and Priests with naked swords; of that hideous butchery of men and of brute beafts, lying flain one with another in their blood intermingled together; of the Altars beiprinkled and stained with the lawful shedding of the one. and the detestable effusion of the other; of the dreadful and horrible execrations; and to conclude, of that frantick, furious, and deteltable form of words, composed and devised to the deteltation and malediction of their line and race. Being fast bound, I tay, with these bonds for sleeing a-1 way, they flood to it, and flirred not back, fearing their own countrymen more then the enemies. The Romans from both points, and from the middle and main battaillon charged hotly, beat them down, killed and cut them in pieces, thus amazed and aftonied as they were with dread of gods and awe of man. Small refiftance made they, as who only seared to flie and rungway: fo as by this time, there was execution and havock made of them almost to the very Standards. At which very instant, there appeared overthwart from the one side a dust, as if a mighty army had raifed it to their march; namely, Sp. Nautius (or as some say, Octavius Meting) who had the leading of certain Cohorts called Aleria, mounted upon Mules, which on purpole made a duit greater, then for that number they were. For those variets and new horiemen, as they fat on their Mules and Sumpter-bealts, drew after them trailing on the ground, boughs of g trees full of branches and leaves: and first, there appeared in the fore-front (as it were, through a duskish and dim light) their armour and guidons: but the dust behind them, rising higher and thicker, made thew of a troop of horsemen stanked an army of footmen: wherewith not only the Samnits but Romans also were deceived. And the Consul himself, to avow the error and bearthem down it was fo's cried aloud amongst the formost Ensigns, so as his voice reached unto his enemies, That Cominium was won, and his Brother Conful was come with victory; and therefore, they should endeavour and emorce themselves to get the day, before that another army should win the honour out of their hands. Thus cried he out on horseback gallopping among the ranks to and fro. Then he commanded the Colonels and Centurions, to make a way for the men of arms. Himself afore, had willed Trebonius and Ceditius, that when the espied him to bear his spear upright and to shake it, then they should with all the might they had, put forth the Cavalry and charge the enemies. Every thing was done at a beck, according as they were directed and instructed before hand. The wayes were made wide between the files. The horsemen sling out, and with spear in rest charge upon the middle battaillon of the enemies, and brake their arrayes whereloever they charged. Volumnius and Scipio seconded them with the Infantry: and while they were difarrayed overthrew them, and bare them to the ground. Down went these linnen Cohorts now, when God and man tought against them, and were discomfited: and as well those that took the oath, and the other that were uniworn; fled amain; and without respect of one thing or other, feared none but their enemies. All the footmenthat estaped the battel, were beaten into their camp at Aquilonia. The Gentlemen and the men of M arms fled toward Povianum. The Cavalry of the Romans pursued the horiemen, and the Infamily chaled the footmen. The wings took divers ways, the right toward the camp of the Samnits, the left unto the Town. V. Laminis was tomewhat before, and got the Camp. Scipio found more refishance in the City: not for that vanquished men, as they were, had more courage and resolution, but because that walls are stronger to endure anassault, and better to keep out armed men, then a plain trench and rampart. For, from the Courtine, with stones they beat and repulfed the enemy. Scipio foreseeing well enough that they should be longer about the affault of a firong and fenced town unless he dispatched the matter quickly and went through with it, in their first affright and confusion, before they took heart again: demanded of his fouldiers, If they could take it well, and abide to fee the camp won by the other point of g the battel, and themselves (being likewise Conquerors) to be repelled from the City Gates? When they all cried, No; and faid they would never endure that diffrace: himfelf with histarget over his head, approached the gate, the others following after under a target-fense, rush into the City, thrust down the Samnits about the Gate, and gat to the Walls: but to engage themselves farther into the City, they durst not, being so few as they were. The Consul himselfe at the first knew nothing of all this, but was occupied about the retreat, and rallying of his men! for now the sun was well neer down; and the night comming on apace, caused every thing even to the very victors to seem dangerous and inspicious. But when he was advanced farther, he saw on the right hand the camp taken: and on the left, he heard a confused cry and tumult in the City, compounded of the noise of fighting men, and frighted persons: and even at that in Q flant, it fortuned that they skirmished at the gate. Then he rode on, neerer and neerer, and saw his ownmen upon the Walls, howbeir nothing yetfully performed; but through the rash adventure and fool hardiness of some sew, an overture only made, and some advantage got of performing a great piece of tervice and worthy exploit. Whereupon, he commanded the forces that were retired to be called, and with banner displayed to enter the City. So foon as they were in, they took the next quarter to the Gate, and for that the night approached, there they rested, and went no farther. But even in that very night, the enemies abandoned the Town.

The Tenth Book of T. Livius.

A There were flain that day before Aquilonia 30340 Samnits, and 3870 taken prisoners: and of field entigns they went away with 90. Moreover, this is reported and recorded of Papprins, that there had not been lightly icen a General in any battel more lightiome, chearfull, and merry; were it of his own natural disposition, or upon assured considence of victory. Upon which courage and refolution, he could not be revoked from battel, a beit there was some question and s rapleabout the Auspice: and even in the hottest time, and dangerous point of the conslict, at what time as the manner is to vow temples to the immortal gods: he vowed unto Jupter Vidor, Ifio be that he defeated the Legions of the enemies, to prefent him with a cup of a liweet and pleafant mead before he drank any throng and heady wine of the grape: which vow the gods accepted and B liked of, and turned the ill preiage of the Auspices to good.

The other Confull had as good speed at Cominium: For at the break of day he approached with all his forces to the wals of the town, and inveffed it round about: and fet flrong guards at the gates, for fear they should iffue or fally forth. And even as he was about to give the signall of afjank, there came a messenger post from his sellow Cons. who in great affright brought word of the coming of twenty cohorts to the succour of them within the City: which both kept him short from giving the assault, and caused him to call back again part of his forces, which were arranged and ready under the counterfearp to affail the defendants. Then he gave charge to Decias Brauas Scava, one of the Lieutenants, to take the first legion and twenty cohorts of the wings, and other horlemen, to make head against the reiene of the enemies aforesaid; and where oever he C met them, there to impeach them, yea, and if occasion served, to give them battel; and in no case to suffer that power to come to Cominium. Himself commanded that ladders should be reared on every side of the town, and under a sence of targets approached the gates. So that in an instant the gates were burst open, and the wals scaled on every part. The Samnits, as their heatts served them well enough to keep the enemies from entrance, before they faw any armed men upon the wals: 10, after they perceived, that they were affailed not aloof with stones and darts, but fast by and with hand-flokes: and how that they, who hardly and with great difficulty from the plain gat up the wals, having now gained and furmounted the place (which they most feared before) could fight at ease from aloft with their enemy, who was not able to match them in the even ground; quit their towers and wals, and gathered all together in the market place, and there for Da while tried the utmost hazard of battel But afterwards throwing downtheir weapons, 15400 of them yielded themselves to the Consul his mercy. There were sain 4380. Thus went the game at Cominium, and thus at Aquilonia.

In the mid way between these two Cities, where a third battel was looked for, the enemies were not to be found. And when they were feven miles off from Cominium, they had a countermand from their own country-men, and were called away, and so came not to the rescue, neither in the one battellnor the other. In the shutting in of the evening, when it began to be dark, being within the fight of the Camp of one hand, and Aquilonia on the other; they might hear a like noise and cry from both parts, which caused them to paule. But afterwards, when they were over-against the Camp which was fired by the Romans; the slame spreading far E abroad declared the defeat of the Samnits more evidently, and staicd them there for going farther. In which very place they laid down here and there in their armour (as they were) and passed a restlets and unquiet long night, expecting (and yet searing) the light of the day. At the dawning whereof, and so soon as it began to peep, while they were uncertain and doubtfull what way to take, they hapned to be discovered by the cavalry of the enemies: and suddenly in a fear-full amaze and afright, they took them to their heels and fled in great disorder. Those horsemen having purfued the Samnits, who in the night feafonescaped our of the town, chanced to efpy this forefaid multitude, and perceived they were neither entrenched, nor defended with a good corp: do guard. This company was descried also even from the wals of Aquitonia: whereupon, by this time the legionary footmen likewise madeaster them; but they could not overtake r them in the chaie, fofalt they fled : howbeit the horsemen cut off some, and slew two hundred and fourfcore in the tail of the rereguard. In this affright they left much armour behind them, and eighteen entigns, and to the rest of the army saved themselves, and as well as they might in so searfull confusion, recovered Rovianum. The joy of these two Romans armies was wonderfully encreased. to see one another have so good and fortunate success in their enterprises. Both the Confuls, by each others advice and conferr, gave their towns thus won unto the fouldiers to be facked and rifled : and after the goods were out, to fer fire on the empty houses; in fuch wife, that in one and the same day both Aquilonia and Cominium were burnt to ashes: and the Consuls, with muruall congratulation and joy, as well between their Legions as themselves, feathing one another joyned both their Camps in one, Afterwards in the fight of both Armies, Carpillus highly G commended and praised his souldiers every one as he deserved, and rewarded them with gifts accordingly. Papprins also for his part, who had performed many and fundry skirmifhes as well in the field and battel, as about the winning of the Camp and forcing the City, bestowed by way of honour upon Sp. Nautius, and Sp. Papprius his brothers fon, as also upon four Centurions and the band of the H. flatior Javelineers, bracelets and coroners of gold: and namely, Nantins for that he hare himself to worthily in that journey and expedition, wherein with his counterfeit troop of horsemen upon Mules, he so terrified the enemy, as if he had conducted a main army of men at armes: and young Papprius for his good service with his cavalry as well in the battel and con-fliet, as also in that night, wherein he forced the Samnits to flie fecretly, and quit the City Aqui-H lonia: the Centurions and souldiers, in this regard, that they were the first who seized the gates and wals of that town : as for all the horsemen, in consideration of their manifold travell, and brave exploits shewed in fundry places, he gave them bracelets and little horns of silver. This done, forasmuch as it was time now to withdraw their army from out of Samnium, either both twain, or one of them alone, they fate in Council and consultation thereupon: and thought it was the better course (to the end that the Samnits might be brought lower, and their state more sensibly decayed) to go forwad (till, and charge them with greater force and refolution, and to puriue the rest that was behind; that Samnium might be delivered up to the Consuls their successors, utterly tamed and subdued : since that the enemies now had no army abroad in field, like either I to give or abide another battel; and there remained but one manner of making war, even to befiege and affault their Cities and strong Towns; by the winning and subversion whereof, they might with the pillage enrich and make their own fouldiers for ever and with all impoverish their enemies, and make a hand of them quite, being now at the last cast, forced to fight for Church and Home, Hereupon the Contuls dispatched their letters to the Senat and people of Rome, containing the effect at large of all their exploits; and then divided themselves, and took two severall waies: Pappriss marched with his legions to the fiege of Sepinum; and Carvilius with his to beliege

Volana. The Confuls letters were read and heard with exceeding joy as well in the court of the Councill of the City, as in the Common Hall of affemblies; and this publike contentment and rejov- K cing was folemnized with generall processions, for the space of four daies, and with marvellous zeal, affection, and devotion of private perions in particular. And to say a truth, this victory was to the state of Rome not only great and honourable, but also of great consequence, in regard that it fell out in fo good and commodious a time. For even then, news came, that Tuscam was revolted and rebelled, and men began to cast in their minds, and discourse how they should do (in case ought should hap but well in Jamnium) to withstand the for es and invasions of the Tulcans: who taking heart, and preluming upon the Samnits, and their curied and execrable oath, by vertue whereof they were obliged to light to the utmost extremity, embraced the occasion and opportunity of taking armes again, whiles both the Con uls and the whole forces of Rome were diverted and withdrawn into Samnium and there employed. The Embassadors of theiral- L lies and confederats, were by M. Attileus the Prætor brought into the Senat, and had audience given them; where they complained, that their ferritories were over-run, burnt, and spoyled, by the Tuscans their next neighbours; and all because they were unwilling to revolt from the people of Rome: humbly beleeching the LL. of the Senate, to detend and protect them against the violence wrong, and outrage of common enemies. Answer was returned unto the Embassadors: That the Senate would have regard that their allies should have no cause to repent of their faithfull allegeance, and constant loyalty; and that ere many dates went over their heads, the Tulcans should taste of the same cup that the Samnits had begun unto them. Howbeit, they would have been flack and cold enough in dealing with the Tulcans, had not fresh news come, that the Falifei also, who had for many years continued in amity and friendship with the people of Rome, M were combined with the the Tuicans, and entred into arms, as well as they. The near neighbourhood of this nation, gave an edge to the Senators, and whet them on, to take care and ordain, that their Feciall Heralds should be addressed thither to demand restitution and amends for harms done: which being denied, and no goods restored; by the advice and authority of the Senat, together with the grant of the people, war was proclamed against the Tuscans : and the Confuls were commanded to call lots, whether of them should pais out of Samnium with his forces, into Infcany.

By this time now Carvilius had won Volana, Palumbinum, and Herculaneum, towns appertaining to the Samnits, Volana was forced within lew daies: Palumbinum, the fame day that he came before the wals: but at Hercalancum, he fought two feverall battels, with doubtfull and uncer-N tain issue, yea, and with more loss of his own part than of the enemies. But afterwards, he pitched his camp before the town, beleaguered the enemies, and kept them within their walls, gave the aflault, and won it in the end. In these three towns there were either taken priloners of slain in all, to the number of ten thousand: but so as through tear the greater part by far, suffered themselves to be captives, rather then to dye on the edge of the sword.

The Confuls cast lots for their Provinces; and it fell unto Carvilius to go into Tuscany, as the fouldiers wished and defired who could no longer away with the rigour of cold weather in Samnium. Asfor Papirius, he found a greater power of enemies, and more refiftance, before Sepinum. Many a time he was fought withall inbattell arranged: oftskirmiffied with in his march: yea, and oftentimes under the very walls, the enemies fallied out against him from the Town, in such 0 fort as he could not tell what to make of it: for neither was it to be called properly a fiege alone, nor vet altogether a battell fight; considering that the enemies were no more protected and co. vered themselves, by thestrength of their walls; than the walls were defended by force of arms and men of war: howbeit in the end, what with fighting and what with skirmishing, helodged them within the City fo as they durit come abroad no more, but kept themselves close, and were befieged indeed: and after long fiege, as well with forcible affaults, as by trenches, baftils, and rampiers, he was mafter of the town: and therefore after he was possessed of it, upon anger and

A choler that they had so long stood out and put him to so much trouble, that there was more bloud-fied; and seven thousand died by the tword, whereas under three thousand were taken prilopers. The spoil and pillage, which was exceeding great, considering that the Samnits had laid up all their gods in some few Cities, was given to the souldiers. And now lay the snow thick all over upon the ground: neither could menendure abroad in the field without house and harbor: and thereupon the Conful retired his Army out of Samnium. Against his comming to Rome, it was decreed by the general voice of all men, that he should triumph: and so he triumphed whiles he was in his Magittacy, with great magnificence, and imprisons pomp, as those daies would afford, Fox, as well his footmen as horsemen marched and passed by in a snew, adorned with their Bgift and prizes othonour, Many a "civick," vallare and "morale garland was feen worn that day. " For faving of Much looking and wondring there was at the spoils also of the Sampits atmour and apparel: a Citizens life for with their goodly beauty and glorious hue were they comparable to those that his father had in battel, made won before him, which were commonly seen, and well known in the publike places of the City, adorned and beautified therewith. Moreover, there were led before him in this triumph and ting fift over pompons entrance of his into the City, certain captives and priloners of noble bloud dekended, the ramper of men of great worth fometime, and name, as well for their own deeds, as their fathers acts. The rest of the mustitude sell into his hands, after he had won the town by mere force. This done, he forced five Caftles, ftuate in places E of great facingth: where were flain of enemies 2400, and not all out 2000 taken prisoners. And so gracious was this Conful; that he protected and faved L. Voluminis, one of his Lieurenants, against the people: who being arrefted and called to his answer by M. Cancius, a Tribuse of the Commons, fled for his laft help, to his Eleurenanthin (as they tay) and avoided thereby the danger of their judgement: for that during his absence in that charge his acculation might well be set on foot and followed, but brought to a final end and definitive lentence,

After this year expired; the new Tribunes of the Commons entred their office: and for this there was supposed some errourin their creation, the firth day after were other chosen in their flead. The same year there was a Lustrum or solemn survey of the City, held by P. Cornelius Arvi-Gna, and C. Marius Ruilius Cenfors. In which were numbred and affeifed 262322 pols of Romani Citizens. These were in order the fix and twentieth Censors from the beginning: and this was reckoned the nineteenth Lastrum after the first inflitution. In this year, and never before, the pectators of the Roman Games and Plaies, in regard of their happy fuccels in wars, stood adorned with wreaths and garlands of flowers upon their heads: and then came up the fathion at Rame, botrowed from the manner and custome of Greece, to honour those with branches of the date lece, who won the prizes, and were victors in those folemn Games.

VV Hen Fabius Gurges the Conful, had fought an infortunate battellag ainft the Samnitt, and the Senatewere about to discharge andremove him from his Army; Fabius Maximus his father, belought them for his fake, not to offer him that differace and dishonour. For rather than that should come to pass, he promised to serve in person under his son in quality of his Lieutenant. Which moved the Senate, and prevaled more than anything elfe. And he was his words mafter. For he went to the field, and by his means and good advice, the Corful his for was fo well affifted, that be defeated the Samuits, triumphed over them, led captive before his triumphant Chariot C. Pontius, Lord General of the Samnits, and afterwards struck off his head. Whiles the City of Rome] was pitions- M ly visited and afflitted with the plaque, there were certain Embassadors addressed and sent to Epidatus, for to translate the Image of Esculapius from thence to Rome. And instead thereof they brought away a great snake or serpent, which of it self embarked in their ship, and wherein they were verily personaled, that the puissance and divine power of the saidgodwas resident. And when they had con-ducted it with them by sea as far as to Rome, it went forth of its own accord, and swam to the Island within Tyberis, where it setled: and in that very place where it took sand, they cretted a Temple to Esculapius. L. Posthumius, a Consular man [1, e. who had been Consul] having the charge of an Army, was condemned, and had a round fine fet upon his head, for that he emploied his fouldiers about some work in one of his farms. The League was now the fourth time renewed with the Sam-nits, at their earnest suit and request. Curius Dentatus the Consul, after he had defeated and sams the Sammits, vanquished the Sabins, who were revolted and rebelled, and received them under his obersance, triumphed twice during the time of one Consulhip. Three Colonies were erected, and probed, to with, Castrum, Sena, and Adria. The three Triumvirs to sit upon capitall crimes were then pica, 1000.

The Breviary of L. Florus to the twelfth Book.

The Roman Embassadors being murdred by the Senonois in Gaul, and war thereupon denounced and proclaimed against them, Iucius Cacilius the Pretor, fortuned with his whole army to be defeated by them, and put to the sword. When the Roman sleet was spoited and ransacked by the Tarentins, and their Admiral besides slien, the Senat dispatched their Embassadors unto them to make complaint of these wrongs and outrages; but they were evil intreased and sens away with great abussa Whereupon dessance was likewise grown unto them, and war proclaimed. The Sammits revolted. Against whom togather with the Lucasus, Strainus, and Tuscans, sundry battels were fortuned foungibly for or add the Turentins. When a Legion of the Epirots for the Albanois Jassado over land to the City for to add the Turentins. When a Legion of the Campans was sent under the conduct of Decius Jubelius to Rhegium, there to lie in garrison, they treacherously slew the natural inhabitants, and seized the City of Rhegium to their own beboof.

Alcrius Levinus the Conful lost the field against Pyrthus: by occasion principally that his fouldiers were terrified and amazed at the uncoust fight of the Elephants. After that battell, when Pyrthus C viewed and beheld the dead bodies of the Romans, lying flain on the ground; he observed and marked, that all their faces were turned toward the enemy affront. From thence he went forward spoiling and wasting all the way to Rome, C. Fabricius was sent unto him for to treat about the redemption and ransom of the prisoners: and was sollicited by the King (but invain) to abandon the service of his own country. The foresaid prisoners were enlarged and sent home without paying any ransom at all. Cyneas was lent as Embassador from the King unto the Senat; who required, that the King his Master, for to end and compound all quarrels, might be received into the City and amity of the people of Rome : but when it was thought meet to debate and consult of this important matter, in a more frequent affembly of the Senators, Appius Claudius, who many a day had not intermedled with the affairs of State and Councill, presented himself in the Court among the Senators: where his opinion carried the matter clear away? D and Pyrthus his demand was flatly denied. P.Domitius, the first Censor of the Commoners, held a Lufixum or survey of the City, in which were found 278222 Roman Citizens by the poll. A second field was fought against Pyrthus, but with doubtfull event and iffue. With the Carthaginians, the alliance was renewed now the fourth time. When a certain fugitive traitor that ran from Pyrthus, off ered to C.Fabricius the Consul for to poison the King, he was sent back again, and the treason was discovered to the King Over and besides, this book containeth the prosperous assairs in war against the Tuscans, Lucanians, Brutians, and Samnits.

E Nyrthus passed the seas into Sicily. When among other productes and scarfull tokent, the image of Jupiter in the Captoll was overthrown and smitten down with lightning, the head thereof was recovered and sound again by the Southairs. Curius Dentatus, as he was taking musters, sold in port-sale the goods of one that would not answer to his name when he was called. He descated Pyrthus after he return again out of Sicily into Italy; and sovced him to avoid and depart once for all. Fabricius a Censor, cassed and displaced out of his Senators room P. Cornelius Rusinus, one that had been Consul, for that he had in sliver plate to the weight of ten pounds. There was a Lustrum holden by the Consorting and there in were sound 271224 Civizens. A society and alliance was contrasted with Ptolomy King Seyyth. Sextilia a prossisted vestall Num was convisted of uncleanness and fornication, and buried quick. Two new Colonies were erected, so wit, Postodous and Consis, Asserbed of Carthaginians arrived to aid the Marmerius by occasion whereof the league was broken. This book comprised also, the happy exploits against the Lucanians, Sammits, and Brusians: together with the death of King Pyrthus.

And after many encounters and battels with the Carthaginians, when the Senat by reuson of his so happy conduct and management of the wars, sent no other to succeed him, he dispatched his letters unto them and complained thereof: and among other pregnant reasonsthat he alledged for to have a successor to come upo him, this was one; That the little inheritance and living which he had suffred waste, by the default or lewdness of his bailiffs of husbandry. Meanwhiles, as if fortune had been disposed and sought means to shew a notable example in the person of this one man Regulus, as well of adversity as prosperity, he was overthrown in plain field, and taken prisoner by Xan-M thippus, a renowned Captain of the Lacedamonians, whom the Carthaginians had waged, and fent for to aid them. He same may I well say, in the Prassace and entrance of this one part of my work, which most writers of histories have promited and made protession of, in the beginning of the whole, to wit, That I will write the most famous and memorable warthat ever was, even that, which the Carthaginians under the conduct of Annibal fought with the people & State of Rome, For neither any other Cities or Nations are known to have warred together more wealthy and puissant than they; nor at any time ever were they themselves so great, so I firong in forces, and so mighty in means, as now they were. Moreover, they came not newly now, to wage war, without knowledge of the prowess and martiall skill, one of another; for trial they had made thereof infficient already, in the first punick war. Besides, so variable was the fortune of the field, so doubtfully were their battels fought, that neerer loss and danger were they, who in the end won the better, and atchieved the victory. And to conclude, if a man observe the whole course and proceeding of these their wars, their malice and hatred was greater in a manner than their forces: whiles the Romans took foul fcorn and dildain that they, whose hap before was to be vanquished should unprovoked begin war afresh with the Conquerors; and the Carthaginians were as male-content, and throughly offended, as taking themselves (notwithstanding they were overcome) to be abused too much at their hands by their proud, insolent, and coverous rule over N them, Over and besides all this, the report goeth, that Anibal being but nine years old, or thereabout, came fawning and flattering as wanton children do to his father Amilear, that he would take him with him into Spain, at what time, as after the Affrican war ended, his father was offering facrifice, ready to pass over thither with an army: where he was brought to the altar side, and induced to lay his hand thereupon, and to touch the facrifice, and fo to iwear, that fo foon as ever he were able, he would be a professed and mortal enemy to the people of Rome. Vexed (no doubt at the heart, was Amilear himself, a man of high spirit and great courage, for the loss of the Islands Secily and Sardinia: for not only Sicily was overhastily yielded (as he thought) as despairing too foon of the state thereof, and doubting how it should be defended; but also Sardinia was by the cunning and fraudulent practice of the Romans surprized out of the Carthaginians hands, L whiles they were troubled with the commotion and rebellion of Affrick; and a Tribute besides imposed upon them. He being disquieted I say, and troubled with thesegriess and discontents so bare Limself for five years space in the Affrick war, which insued immediatly upon the peace concluded with the Romans; and likewise after, in Spain, for nine years together, enlarging ever still the dominion of Carthage; that all the world might fee, heintended and designed a greater war than that he had in hand; and if God had spared him longer life, it should have been well feen that the Carthaginians under the leading of Amilear, would have made that war upon Italy, which afterward they waged by the conduct of Annibal. But the death of Amilcar happing in 10 good leafon [forthe Romans] and the childhood and tender nonage of Annibal together, were the cause that this war was put off and deferred. In the mean time, between the father and the fon, Afdrubal M bare all the rulefor the space almost of eight years. This Afdrubal had been Amilear his minion, grown highly into his grace and favour, at the first (as men say) for the very prime and flower of his youth: but afterwards, in regard of the fingular towardness of a brave and haughty mind, which foon appeared in him, and for his forwardness to action, he was preferred to be his fon in law, and married his daughter. Now, for a fmuch as he was Amilear his fon in law, he was advanced to the foveraign conduct of the war, with no good liking at all and consent of the Nobility and Peers, but by the means and favour only of the Barchin faction, which bare a great stroke, and might do all in all, among the fouldiers and the common people. Who managed all his affairs, more by policy and fage counsell, than by force and violence: and using the authority and name of the Princes and great Lords of those countries, and by entertaining friendship with the chief N Rulers, won daily the hearts of new nations still, and by that means enlarged the power and seignory of the Carthaginians in Spain rather than by any war and force of arms. But for all this peace with forrein States, he was never the more fure of his own life at home. For a certain barbarous fellow, for anger that his Master and Lord was put to death, slew him in open place: and being laid hold on by them that were attendant about Afdrubal his person, he kept the same countenance fill, as if he had escaped and gone clear away : yea, and when he was by cruell torments all full constancy mangled and torn, he looked so cheerfully and pleasantly on the matter, as if he had seemed to and resolution smile; for ar his joy of heart surpassed the pains and anguish of his body. With this Asambal, for thathe had fo fingular a gut and wonderfull dexterity, in folliciting and annexing unto his dominion the nations aforesaid, the people of Rome had renewed the League, upon these two capitulation ons and conditions; first, that the river * Iberus should limit and determine the seignories of them both : Ijem, that the Saguntins, leated in the midft between the territories of both nations, should remainfree, and enjoy their ancient liberties.

Thus Annibal was lent into Spain, and immediately at his first coming, drew all the whole army after him; so highly he was regarded and beloved. The old souldiers beleeved verily that Amilear was alive again, and come amongst them: they thought they beheld and saw the same vigour and spirit in his countenance & visage, the same quickness and liveliness in his eyes, the same proportion, feature and lineaments of his face. And afterwards, within short time, he had so n wrought and wound himself into their favour, that the late rememembrance of his father was the least matter of all others, that won him grace and love among them. Never was there one and The natural the felf-fame nature, framed and fitted better, for two things that are in quality most contrary; dispussion of namely, to rule, and to obey. Whereby, a man could hardly differn and judge, whether he was more dear unto the General for the one, or to the Army for the other. For neither Afdrubal would make choice of any one before him, when there was some valiant service or brave exploit to be executed: nor the fouldiers put more confidence in any other Leader, nor go more boidly and resolutely to any enterprise, than under him. Most forward he was and hardy to all hazards Havertues, and dangerous adventures: right provident and wary again, at the very point of perill and jeo-pardy. No travell was able to weary and tire his body: no pains-taking could daunt and break E his heart. He could away with heat and cold alike. For his diet and feeding, he measured both his meat and drink by his naturall appetite, and not by pleasure and delightsome taste. For sleepping, for waking, day and night was all one with him. When he had once performed his fervice, and finished his exploir; if there were any spare time after, therein would he take his rest and repole: and that should not be upon a soft bed neither, nor procured with great corionty by still filence, and making no noise about him. Full often many a man hath seen him lying on the hard and bare ground, under a good fouldiers jacket and homely cassock cast over him, even among the sentinels and corps de guard. For his apparel, it was not more costly nor braver than his fellows and companions: mary, in his armonr and horses he loved ever to be goodly be-seen above all other. Amongst footmen and horsemen both, he would alwaies be a great way formost. And to r conclude in giving a charge upon the enemy, and to begin to battell, he was by his good will ever the first and when the fight was done; the last man seen to retire out of the sie'd. Of these so noble qualities and manly vertues, he had not so many, but there were as great vices and imperfections in him again, to counterpoise the same. number over-weighed the better.

Disposed thus as he was, and inclined by nature, to vertues, and vices, he served full three years under General Astrubal. During which time, he omitted and forgat no one thing that was meet either to be executed or enterprised by a man that was himself another day to be a Captain and chief Commander in the wars. intended ought against them directly: but that by order and course of his affairs, after he had H subdued the countries bordering upon them, he had been drawn (as it were) for vicinity and neighbourhood take to that war and to joyn them also with the relt unto the Empire. And first he wan by for e, and lacked b Carteia, a rich City, the leat town and chief place of all that nation. Whereupon, other meaner and smaller Cities alto, for fear came under his obedience, and yielded to pay tribute. His Army then after these victories, and enriched with spoil and pillage, was brought back to new ¿ Carthage, there for to winter. Where he made fure unto him the hearts and affectionate love, as well of his own countrymen as of the allies, partly, by beflowing the pillage liberally among them, and partly, by making true paiment of fouldiers wages for the time past. And then in the very prime of the springshe went forward to war upon the a Vacaer. He for-I ced by affault c Hermandica and Arbacula, two Towns of the | Cartei, Arbacula by the manhood and multitude of the Townsmen held out a long time. But certain sugitives that were fled from Hermandica, having rallied themich es, and joyned with other exiled perions of the Olcadera nation the jummer before subdued, raised also the & Carpetans to take arms: and fer upon Annilal, in his return from the Vaccet; and not far from the river b Tagus, troubled and difordred his march, heavily charged with spoil and booty. Annibal forbare to fight, and encamped himself upon the bank of the river : and fo foon as the enemies were in their first fleep, and all fill and husht, passed over with his Army at the foord: and after he had pitched his Campio faroff from the river fide, as that his enemies might have room enough to march away befides him, he determined to fet upon them as they should pats ever the river: To his horsemen he gave com- & mandment to charge upon the Regiment of footmen, to foon as they perceived them to have saken the water: and upon the bank he arranged forty Elephants afront them. There were of the Carpetans, counting the aids and succours of the Olesdes and Vacces, rocooo firongs an Army invincible, if they had fought on even and indifferent ground. Who being both by nature here and couragious, and for multitude confident; pretumptuous besides, upon their imagination that the enemy was retired for fear; supposed that the only stay of their victory was, because the river ran between: and fetting up a shout and out-cry, without direction of any Leader, in all diforder they ran into the river here and there, every man what way was next him. Now from the other fide of the bank, a great troop of horsemen were entred into the river, encountred them in the midft of the channel and fought with great advantage. For whereas the footmen unfleady L and not able to keep fast footing, and hardly trusting the footd, might easily be cast and overturned, even by naked horsemen if they did but put forth and prick forward their horses it skilled not how the horsemen on the other side having their bodies at liberty; and able to wield their weapon, with their horses under them standing sure even in the midst of the stream and whirlpools, might with ease either fight close hand to hand, or affail the enemies aloof. Many of them befides perifhed in the water some by the whirling waves of the river were driven upon the ensmies, and by the Elephants trodden under foot, and crushed to death. The hindmost, who might with more fafety recover their ownbank, after they were rallied together into one from divers places, as fear had feattered them; before they could upon to great a fright, take heart and comeagain to themselves, Annibal who with a four-square battallon had entred the river, forced to Mile from the bank: and when he had wasted the country, within few daies brought the Carpetans also under His obedience.

And now all beyond Iberus was subject to the Carthaginians, the Saguntins only excepted. With whom as yet he would not feem to war: howbeit, to minister some cause and occasion thereof, quarrels were picked, and feeds of diffentions fown between them and their neighbors namely the * Turdetans. Unto whose aid, when he wascome, that was himself the fower of all the variance, and had fet them together by the ears; and when it appeared plainly that it was not a matter of right to be tried by law, but an occasion rather fought of fight and open war; then the Saguntins sent their Embassadors to Rome, for to crave aid against that war, which doubtless was at hand. The Confuls at that time of Rome, were P. Cornelius Scipio, and Titus Sempronius N Longue, who having brought the Embassadors into the Councill House, and proposed matters unto the LL, there, concerning the weal publike, and decreed to fend their Embassadors into Spain to take survey, and look into the state of their allies: who also if they thought it meet, should give Annibal warning, not to meddle with their confederats, and moleit the Saguntins; and withall, to fail over to Carchage into Affrick, and there make relation of the complaints and grievances of the allies of the people of Rome: when, I say, this Embaffagewas deciseed but yet not fent, news came sooner than all men looked for that "Saguntum was already belieged. Then was the matter propounded new again before the Senate Some were of mind to dispatch the Confuls unto the Provinces of Spain and Affrick, with commission to make was both by sex and land, Others thought better to bend all their forces wholly into Spain against Annibal. There were 2-0 gain of opinion, that so great and weighty an enterprise was not hundred head, and raffly to be attempted; but rather that they should attend the return of the Embassadors out of Spain; and this advice that seemed most safe, was held for the better, and took place. And therefore so much the sooner were these Embassadors P. Valerius Flaccus, and Q. Bebius Pamphilus, addressed unto Annibal before Saguntum, with direction, from thence to go forward to Carthage (in case he would not defift and give over war) and for to demand the Captain himself; for amends and satilfaction of breaking the league. But whiles the Romans were amused about these consultations&

A decrees, Sagunum was by this time with all forcible means affaulted. This City of all other most Sagunum bewealthy and rich, stood beyond Iberus, situate almost a mile from the sea. The inhabitants are field by Anfaid to have had their beginning out of the Island " Zacynthus: and some among them, were de-" bal. feended from Ardea, a City of the Rutilians: but they grew within short time to this puissance and wealth of theirs, partly, by the fruits and revenews of their lands, and partly, by the traffick and gain of their merchandile, and commodities transported by sea, as also by the great affluence and encrease of people, and lastly, by their straight rule of discipline, whereby they observed their troth and loyalty with their allies, even to their own ruine and finall destruction.

Annibal after he had invaded their confines as an enemy, and by way of hostility, with his Arn my overrun and wasted their countrey, besieged and assailed the City three waies. There was one canton or angle of the wall shooting out into a more plain and open valley, than any other place all about: against which he meant to raise certain mantlets or fabricks, under which he might approach with the Ram to batter the wall. But as the place far from the wall, was even enough and handsome for such engins of battery to be driven upon: so after that they came to the proof and execution indeed, the fuccess answered nothing to the enterprise begun. For befides that there was a mighty tower over-looked and commanded them the wall it felt (as in a place doubted and fufpecked) was more fortified and raifed higher there than eliewhere: and also the cholenyouth and ablest men were bestowed to make more forcible resistance, where there was like to be most troubleand danger. And first with shot of darts and quarels, and such like, they put the enemy back, C and would not fuffer the pioneers and labouters in any place to entrench of raile rampiers in falety. In process also, they shot not from the wall only and that tower, and shewed them elves there in arms for defence, but also their hearts served them to fally forth, and to break into the guards of the enemies, yea, and to enter upon their tren hes and fabricks. In which skirmifhes there died not many more Saguntins than Carthaginians. But so soon as Annibal him'elf, approaching unadvifedly under the wall fortuned to be wounded grievously in the forepart of his thigh, with a dart or light javelin, and therewith fell to the ground; they all about him fled to fast, and were so scared, that they had like to have given over quite and abandoned their mantlets, and other labricks aforesaid. After this, for some sew daies, whiles their General was under cure of his herr, they lay at fiegerather, than followed the affault. In which mean time, as they refled from skirn mish, so they ceased not to invent new devices, and to prepare new fabricks. Whereupon the alfault began again more hot than before: and in many parts at once they fell to raife roiling mantlets so many and to thick that some places would not receive them; and with all to drive the Ram against the walls. Annibal had men good store, for it is thought he was 1 50000 in Camp strong, The townsmen with devising means to defend, and see to every place, began to have their hands full: but all would not ferve, For now were the walls beaten with the rams, and many parts thereof shaken and battered: and at one place above the rest, by continual battery there was in h a breach, as the town lay open and naked to the enemy. After that, three turrets, and all the wall between fell down with a mighty and horribly crash, intomuch as the Carthaginians thought verily that with that rush the town had been won: by which breach, as if the wall had protected both parties before, they ran forth together on each fide to fight. The battell was not like to a tumustoary skirmish, such as are wont to be about assaults of Cities, by the occasion and advantage of the one part or the other; but a very fer and ranged field (as it were) in an open ground between the feeing their town bare, and void of wals, opposed their bodies in the breach, not one stepping back a foot, lest in the space between he should let in the enemy. The more siercely therefore, and the thicker and closer that they fought together on both parts, the more were wounded; and there was not a dart could light in vain between their bodies and their armour, but it did mif-F chief. The Saguntins nied a weapon called Falarica, in manner of a dart, which they let fly and The descriptilanced from them having a long shaft or sleel, round and even every where toward the one end, or dant called with ison and bound show with the one end, or dant called where it was headed with iron, and bound about with tow, and imeared with pitch. The iron Falaire, head was three foot long; that it might pierce both harnels and body through. But the greatest feare that it did was this, although it fluck fast in the target, and entred not into the body, that being driven and flung, when the middlepart was set on fire, by the motion thereof as it flew, it gathered much more fire, forced the fouldier to fortake his armour, and exposed him ditarmed and naked to the shot following. Well, the fight continued doubtful a long time, by reason that the Saguntins took better heart unto them, because they had rested beyond their hope and expe-Ctation: and the Carthaginians took themselves vanquished, for that they had not got the victo-Gry, and better hand: whereupon, the townsmen all at once set up a cry, and beat the enemies back to the very breaches, and ruins of the wall, and from thence thrust them out clean, whiles they were thus encumbred and affrighted, yea, and at last discomfitted them put them to flight, and cha-

breaches of the wall, and the houses of the town that flood a pretty way diltant within. Of one

fide they were pricked forward with hope, on the other with delpair; whiles Annibal thought

verily that he was matter of the town already, if he held on but a little longer; and the Saguntins fed them as far as their Camp. In the mean while newscame, that there were Embassadors arrived from Rome: unto whom Annibal dispatched certain messengers to meet with them at sea side and to give them to understand, That neither they might safely with security of their persons come among the broiles of fo many barbarous & fierce nations; nor their Maffer Annibal amidft those dangerous and trou-

b'clome affairs, had any leiture to attend or give audience unto embassages. He knew full well, H that the Embassadors being not received and entertained, would straight to Carthage. Whereup. on, he addressed aforehand his letters and curriers to the chief of the Barchine faction, to frame and prepare the minds of that fide, fo, as they of the other part might not gratifie, or do any thing in favour of the Romans. By which means, befides that they were neither admitted by Annibal, nor audien e given them, that embassage also was in vain, and took no effect at Carthage. Only Hanno notwithstanding the whole body of the Senate was against him, spake with great silence and affent of the hearers, by reason of his authority and reputation, and pleaded to the point of the breach of League, in this wife: "I have quoth he, foretold and warned you in the name "and for the love of the gods, who are the witnesses and judges of covenants and confederacies, I "I have, I say, admonished you, that ye should not send Amilear his son, or any of his breed unto "the Camp: for that neither the ghost and spirit, nor the progeny and race of that man can rest and be quiet; nor the Roman league will ever be affored and established, so long as there re-" mained one alive of the Barchine name and family. But fent ye have, for all my words, unto es your armies, a youth boiling in ambition, enflamed with a covetous defire of being a King, and one that feeth no other way thereto, but by raising one war after another, to live guarded with "armiesand legions about him. In which action of yours, ye have as it were ministred dry fewel, and put oilto the fire : ye have, I fay, fed that fire, wherewith ye now all are fet a burning. Your " armies now beliege Saguntum, from which by covenant and vertue of the League they are de-"barred. Within a while and shortly will the Roman legions lie in siege before Carthage, under K the conduct and guidance, no doubt, of those gods, by whose support and aid in the former war, they were revenged for the breach of the accord and alliance. What i know yet not yet, either "your enemy, or your felves, or the fortune of both nations? This good Captain and gentle Gee neral, for footh, of your making, would not admit and receive into his Camp Embassadors coming from our allies, and in the behalf also of our allies: wherein he abolished the law of Nations, "Howbeit, they having raken a repulle, from whence even the very Embafiadors of enemies, are or not wont to be repelled, are come unto you, and by vertue of their League demand amends of "trespais and restitution or satisfaction for their damages. And presuppose the State be not tou-" ched nor culpable in this Action, they require no more but to have the author himself in perion, who is the offender. The more gently they deale, and the longer it is ere they begin, the more L " obstinat they will be, and continue with greater rigour (I fear me) if they once begin, Set before * Guba, or Foz "your eyes the Mands * Ægates, and * Eryx: and what for these four and twenty years past, ye "have endured both by land and sea. Neither was this beardless boy our Captain then, but his fa-"ther Amilear himself, even a second Mars, as these his supposts would have him. But what of "that? We could not then, according to our league, hold our hands, and let Tarentum in Italya-"lone; like as now we are doing with Saguntum. Therefore, both God and man took the mat-" ter in hand, and vanquished us in the end: and when we were at arguing and debating the case 66 with discourse of words about this point, Whether Nation of the twain had broken the league? the event of war, as an indifferent as dequall judge, awarded victory where the right was. And Carthage it is, against which, Annibel even now hath reared mantlets, towers, and other engins M " of affault: even now,battereth and shaketh he Carthage wals with the Ram. The ruins of Se-" quatum (God grant I be a false Prophet) will fall upon our heads, and the war-begun with the Sa-"guntins we must maintain against the Romans. How then? (will some man say) shall we yield "Annibal unto them? I know well how small my authority is in this point, by reason of the old er grudge and enmity between me and his father deceased. Howbeit, as I rejoyced that Amilear "was dead, for that if he had lived still, we should ere now have warred with the Romans: so this "very youth, an impe of his I hate and detell as the very fury and fire-brand of this war: whom "I would have by my good will, not only to be rendred unto them, for to purge and expiate the "breach of league; but if no min would challenge him for to be punished, I would award that he "fhould be carried and transported as far as there is sea or land and to be sent away this her from N "whence we might not once hear of him again and where he might never trouble the quiet and "peaceable flate of this City any more. Over and besides my opinion and resolution is that some "Embassadors be tent present y to Rome, to satisfie the Senate : and others also, with a message to " Annib. I that he withdraw his forces from Saguntum: and with commission to render up Anni-"Lal himself into the Romans hands, according to the tenour of the League : and a third Embal-" fage likewise to the Saguntins, for to make restitution and amends for their harms and loss already fulfained. When Hanno had made an end of his speech, it was altogether needless, that any one man there should make reply, and debate the matter with him by way of Oration, the whole Senate was to possessed already and wrought for Annibal and with one voice they blamed Hanno, and founded it out. That he had made a bitter speech, and more savouring of an enemy,0 than Flaceus V. lerius himself the Roman Embassador. After this, the Roman Embassadors had this answer returned. That the war began by the Saguntins, and not by Annibal. Also, that the peop'e of Rome offered them injury, in preferring the Saguntins before the mote ancient alliance of the Carthaginians. Whiles the Romans thus fpent time in fending Embassages, Annibal having wearied his men, what with skirmishes, and what with trenching and raising mounts and fabricks, he gave them reft fome few daies and bestowed certain good guards to ward and keep the mantlets and ot her engins of battery. In the mean season he encouraged his souldiers, and set their

A hearts on fire, partly, by pricking and provoking them to anger against their enemies, and partly, by drawing them on, and alluring them with hope of great rewards. But after he had once in ageneral affembly made proclamation, That the spoil and pillage should be the souldiers share; they were all so enkindled and enflamed, that if presently he had sounded the signal of battel, it feemed, that no force in the World had been able to refit them. The Saguntins, as they had fome rest from skirmish, and continued certain dayes, neither assuling nor assisted: so they gave not over labouring night and day, for to make up a new wall and counter-mure, on that ide of the Town which lay open by reason of breaches. But after this, grew the assault more hot and furious than before: neither wift they, well (the floouts and alarms were fo divers and difforant on Bevery fide) whether to come first, or where was most need of help and succour. Annual himself was prefent in person to encourage and exhort his souldiers, where as the routing Tower was driven which was so high, that it overlooked all the mures and counter-Fabricks of the City, and being once approached neer the walls, firmished as it was in every lost and story, with ordnance of quarrel shot, brakes, and other artillery, bear the defendants from off the walls, so as none durit 4bide upon them. Then Annih I taking the time, and supposing that he had now a good opportunity preferred unto him, fent about 500 Afficans that were pioners with pick-axes, mattocks and such like tool, to undermine the wall, yea, and to dig into it from the very foundation, And that was no hard-mattered do, for that the cement or morter was not hardned and bound with lime, but tempered with earth and clay, after the old manner of building: and therefore the wall Came tumbling down before it was hewn and wrought into: and through the wide breaches, whole troops of armed fouldiers entred the Town: and withal, they seized one high place above the reft, whereon they planted their artillery and ordnance of flings and brakes, and cast a wall about it, that they might have within the very City, a fort and baltillon of their own, like a Caffie to overlook all. The Saguntins like wife raised another mure within along that fide where the Town as yet was not taken; So that on both fides they made fortifications, and also fought with all their might and main. But the Saguntins defending the inner parts, by little and little brought their Town daily into a smaller compais. And by that means, as also by reason of the long feee, as fearcity and want of all things grew more and more fo the expectation of fortain aid and uccour was every day less than other: the Romans their only hope, being so far off, and their Denemies fo neer on every hand. Howbeit, the indden rode and journey of Janibal againth the? *The inhibi-Ocetans and Carperans, refreshed for a while their troubled and afflicted spirits. These two Nations of Ocetions being rifen upon a discontentment of a ftreight muster and rigorous levy of oridines, had been flaied and derained those Muster-masters, that had in compilion to the beautiful of the real or the second of t flated and detained those Mutter-mailers, that had in commission to take up all sufficient and able of Toletura. men for the wars, and fo, made fome thew and fear of rebellion: but being prevented in the beginning by the speedy coming of Annibal, were soon quiet, and laid down their atms. But the assault of Sagumum continued nevertheless, For Mabarbal, Himileo his son whom Annibal haddless behind as Lieucenant, to bestirred himself, that neither the Townsmen nor the enemy found the mils or absence of the General. This Maharbal had made some fortunat skirmishes, and with three rams (haken a good part of the wall, lo as he shewed to Annibal at his return, all lying along E and every place full of fresh ruins. Whereupon the army was presently brought against the very Caffle of the City, where began a cruel and bloudy conflict, with the flaughter of many on both sides, and one part of the said fortress was forced and won.

Afterwards there was some treaty of peace and agreement, by means of two persons, Alona Saguntine, and Alorem a Spaniard, and some small hope there was of it. Alcen supposing the could fomewhat prevail by way of request and entreating, without knowledge of the Saguntins, departed away by night to Annibal. But after that he faw, that with all his weeping he could do no good, but that heavy and intolerable articles and capitulations of prace were exhibited, as from a wrathful conqueror, of an Orator, proved to be a very traytor, and remained flill in the camp with the enemies, laying, that he was fure to die, who foever should move the Saguntins to peace, runder those conditions. For demanded it was of the Saguntins, Impeints, to make restitution to the Turderans of all harmes and loffes. Item, to deliver up all their gold and filver. Item, to quit the Town, and depart but with one fitte of apparel a piece; and there to dwell where the Carthaginians would appoint. When Alcon avouched plainly, that the Saguntins would never accept of peace with thele conditions, Alorem replied again and faid, That feeing all things ele now failed them, their hearts also must need scome down, and fail likewise; and therewith promised to deliver unto them the tenor of the faid peace, and to be a mediator and dealer in the compaifing thereof. At that time he served Annibal as a private soundier: howbest a publick stiend he Was, and an hoft and gnest of old to the Saguntins. Who having in fight of all men yeelded up his offenfive arms, to the warders of the enemies, and passed the rampiers was brought (for so himfelf defired) before the Governor and Provost of Sagunum. Thither came running presently, a number of all forces of people : but after the rest of the multitude were commanded to void Aloron was called into their Councel house, and having andience given, m dethis or the like peech unto them. " If Alcon your countryman and fellow citizen, as he came from you to Anmbal for The Oration 60 treat about peace, had likewise brought back again unto you from Annibal the conditions of Alarma "and articles of peace, Inceded not to have takenthis journey; who am ome unto you neither Spaniard, in as an Orator from Annibal Boryer as a figitive. There are the impositions that your enemy (a conqueror) demandeth: Which albeit they " be hard and grievous, yet your fortune and state is such, as you must allow thereof and be content. For mine own part, I am not out of hope, but when you have put all into his hands, he ce will deal better by you, and remit tomewhat of these conditions. But I think ye were better to "abide all this, rather than your bodies to be murdred, your wives and children to be ravished, " haled and forced before your faces, as the law and manner of war requireth.

To the hearing of this Oration the people had flocked about, and by little and little entermingled their own affembly with the Senators: and all of a sudden the chief of them withdrew themselves and departed, before answer was given: and brought all their silver and gold, as well publick as private, into the market place : and, when they had cast it into a great fire made hastily I for that purpole, most of them threw themselves into it headlong after. Whereupon there being a fear and trouble already throughout the whole City: behold another outcry befides and noile was heard from the Cattle. For a certain Tower that had been a long time battered and shaken, fell down ; land at the breach thereof. a band of Carthaginians made entry, and gave fign to their General that the City was abandoned of the ordinary Watchmen and corps de guard of the enemies, and altogether lay open and naked. Annibal supposing it was no wisedom to neglect and slack so good an opportunity, with all his sorces at once assaled the City, and wan it in the turning of an hand: and prejently gave order that all above fourteen years of age should be put to the iword. Acruel ommandment, no doubt, but yet needful, as afterwards it was well feen in the end and upshot of all. For who would have pared and taken pity of those, that either shut them- M seives with their wives and children into their houses, and burnt them over their own heads, or in their armor, gave not over fight before they died? Thus was the Town won with exceeding ftore of pillage within it. And albeit much was spoiled on purpose by the owners, and that in the massacre and execution they had no respect of age in the sury of their anger : and for all that, the priloners fell to the souldiers share; yet certain it is, that of the goods sold in port-sale, there arole a good round piece of mony: and much rich houshold stuff and costly apparel was fentto

Somethere be that write, how Sagantum was won the eight Month after the fiege began; and that from thence Annibal departed to winter in new "Carthage: as also, that the fifth month after he departed from Carthage, he arrived in Italy. Which being 10, it cannot be, that P. Cornelius N and T. Sempronius should be the Consuls, unto whom both in beginning of the siege, the Sagurtin Embassadors were sent; and who also in their year of government fought with Annibal, the one neer the river * Ticinus, and both together a good while after, at * Trebia. And we must say, that either all these things were atchieved in shorter time a good deal, or else that Saguntum in the beginning of that year wherein P. Cornelius and T. Sempronius were Confuls, began not to be befieged; but finally was forced and won. For the battel at Tretia could not be fo long after, asto fall in the year wherein Cn. Servilius and C. Flaminius were Confuls. For that Flaminius entred his Consulship at Ariminum, and was created by T. Sempronius, Consul, who after the battel of Trebia came to Rome to elect Consuls, and after the Election was ended returned again to his atmy, into the wintering harbours.

About the same time, as well the Embassadors which returned from Carthage, brought word to Rome that there was nothing but war: as also tidings came, of the destruction of Sagumam. And so greatly grieved and sorrowed the Senators, and pitied withal their allies thus unworthily massacred, so ashamed in themselves they were, that they had not sentaid in time, so deeply offended and incented with indignation against the Carthaginians, yea, and so mightily seared the loffe of the very main chance at home, as if the enemy had been already at the gates of the City: that in very deed, having their minds possessed at one time, with so many troubles, they rather A trembled and quaked for fear, than fetled themselves to consultation and counsel. For they confidered and faw very well, that neither a more fierce and warlike enemy ever encountred with them: nor the State of Rome was at any time to refty, fo feeble, and to undisposed to was. Moreover, it was commonly faid, that the * Sardi, * Cors, * Histri, and * Illyrics had rather tha lenged . The llanders the Romans, and made bravados of war, than exercised and toiled them in any hard conslicts: of Sarategna, as for the Gauls, they were but tumults, rumors, and alarms which they made, and no wars indeed: but the Carthaginians their enemies, they were old beaten fouldiers, insured and hardned *Th. people of for this 23 years in most difficult service of war, amongst the Spanish Nations, and went away e- then yet with victory; first trained and practised under Analogy, then under Astrophy. The propie of ver with victory; first trained and practised under Analogy, then under Astrophy. Bunder the conduct of Annibal a right hardy and valiant Captain. Confidering moreover, that Stavonia. now he cometh fresh from the ruin of Sagumum, a most rich City, and passeth straight wayes over Iberus - drawing after him a train of so many nations of the Spaniards, exercised attendy by him in the wars: and will no doubt raise the Gauls, a people at all times ready to take arms: fo as now they were to wage war in Italy, with no more but all the World befides, yea, and under the walls of Rome, for the defence of the City.

Now had the Provinces been nominated and appointed before to the Confuls: but then were they commanded by casting lots, to part them between them. To Cornelius sell Spain: To Sempronius Affrick and Sicily. Likewise decreed it was, that for that year, there should be levied fix Legions of Romans: and of allies, as many as they thought good: also that as great a navy as might C be, should be rigged and set our. So there were enrolled 24000 Roman sootmen, and of horsemen 1800: of allies 44000 foot, and 4000 horie, 220 gallies, with five course of oars on a side, and twenty foists, were set associate. After this, a bill was preserved unto the people, that it might please them to determine and grant, that war should be proclaimed against the people of Carthage. And in regard of that war, there was also a solemn supplication holden through the City: wherein the people adored and prayed the Gods to prosper and bring to an happy end, this war which the people of Rome had determined. And betwirt the Confuls thus were the forces dividea: Sempronius had the conduct of two Legions, confifting of four thouland foot, and three hundred horie a piece; also of allies fixteen thousand foot, one thousand and eight hundred Horse, besides 160 gallies, and twelve barks or foists. With this power for Land and Sea service, was Sempronius fent into Sicily, from thence to palle over into Affrick, in case the other Conful were able to impeach the Carthaginians for coming into Italy. Cornelius had the charge of a finaller power: for that L. Manlius the Pretot, was sent in person into France with a sufficient army: but in the number of ships especially, was Cornelius scanted 60 gallies of five banks of oars he had, and no more, (for it was supposed that the enemy would neither come by Sea, nor fight in that kind of service) and two Roman Legions with the full proportion of Horsemen, and 14000 sootmen of allies, with 1200 men of arms. That Province of France (in those parts where the Car- 1. 300 to a tethagian was expected) had that year two Logions of Roman footmen, 14000 allies, besides gim. 1000 Horse from them, and 6000 of the Romans. When all things were thus prepared, to the end that before war began, it might appear they dealt by order of law, and with justice; and that Ball due complements might be performed, they sent certain grave and ancient personages in Embaffie into Affrick, to wit, Q. Fabius, M. Livius, L. Emplius, C. Licinius, and Q. Bebius, First, to demand and know of the Carthaginians, Whether Annibat by their publick warrant and authority, befreged and affailed Sugumum? then if they avowed the act, and stood to it (as they were like to do) confessing that it was done by the counsel of the State; to give defiance, and proclaim open war against them. The Romans being arrived at Caribage, had audience given in their Senat-house: where, after Q. Fabius had briefly demanded nothing else, but that one thing which he had in charge and commission, then a principal Senaror among the Carthaginians stood up and

"Your former Embassage, my masters of Rome, was even as vain as this, when ye required and The Oration F" would needs have Annibat to be yeelded unto you; as if he had befreged Saguntum of his own of senator in "head, And as for this, that you come with now, how foever in words it feem more mild and Garbage. "smooth, in very deed and in truth it is more rude and rigorous: for then, was Annibal only charged and demanded to juffice; but now are we both urged to acknowledge a fault, and also (forced to make reflitution and fatisfaction out of hand; as if we had avowed and confessed the action. For mine own part, of this mind am I, that the case ought thus to be laid, and the que-"flion brought to this issue, not whether Saguntum was besieged by a privat person, or publick Councel; but whether by right, or wrongfully. For to enquire and examine whether our cirizen and subject have done this by our advice, or of himself, petraineth to us alone, as a so to censure and punish him accordingly: with you we are to debate this point only. Whether it might fland with the league to do it, or no? And therefore fince it pleafeth you, that we should dispute and diffinguish, between the action of a General, warranted by the publick State, and an enterprise proceeding from his own motive; ye shall understand that there was indeed a league between you and us, comracted by Luttatian the Comial, wherein there is a clause, comprising the allies of both parties: as concerning the Saguntins (who as then were none of your confederats) there was not one word at all therein: but in that league, (ye will fay) that was contracted with Afdrubal, the Saguntins are exprelly named and excepted: to which I have nothing to plead, but even that which I have learned of you. And albeit much was spoiled on purpose by the owners, and that in the massacre and execution they had no respect of age in the sury of their anger : and for all that, the prisoners fell to the fouldiers share: yet certain it is, that of the goods sold in port-sale, there arole a good round piece of mony: and much rich houshold stuff and costly apparel was sent to Somethere be that write, how Saguntum was won the eight Month after the fiege began; and that from thence Annibal departed to winter in new " Carthige: as also, that the fifth month after he departed from Carthago, he arrived in Italy. Which being 10, it cannot be, that P. Cornelius N and T. Sempronius should be the Consuls, unto whom both in beginning of the fiege, the Saguntin Embassadors were tent; and who also in their year of government fought with Annibal, the one neer the river * Ticinus, and both together a good while after, at * Trebia. And we must say, that either all these things were archieved in shorter time a good deal, or else that Saguntum in the beginning of that year wherein P. Cornelius and T. Sempronius were Consuls, began not to be befieged; but finally was forced and won. For the battel at Tretia could not be fo long after, asto fall in the year wherein Cn. Servil us and C. Flaminius were Confuls. For that Flaminius entred his Consulship at Ariminum, and was created by T. Sempronius, Consul, who after the battel of Trebia came to Rome to elect Confuls, and after the Election was ended, returned again to his army, into the wintering harbours.

About the same time, as well the Embassadors which returned from Carthage, brought word to Rome that there was nothing but war: as also tidings came, of the destruction of Saquetum And so greatly grieved and sorrowed the Senators, and pitied withal their allies thus unworthily massacred, so ashamed in themselves they were, that they had not sent aid in time, so deeply offen ded and incented with indignation against the Carthaginians, yea, and so mightily feared the loffe of the very main chance at home, as if the enemy had been already at the gates of the City: that in very deed, having their minds possessed at one time, with so many troubles, they rather

A trembled and quaked for fear, than fetled themselves to consultation and counsel. For they confidered and faw very well, that neither a more fierce and warlike enemy ever encountred with them: nor the State of Rome was at any time to refty, fo feeble, and so undisposed to wat. Moreover, it was commonly faid, that the * Sardi, * Corfs, * Hiftri, and * Illyrici had rather tha lenged 'The llanders over it was commonly laid, that the Sarah, Corps, 111/111, and 111/11/11 had rather than the Romans, and made bravados of war, than exercised and toiled them in any hard conflicts: of Saratagna, the Romans, and made bravados of war, than exercised and toiled them in any hard conflicts: of Saratagna, the Romans, and and the war in 111/11 had saratagna, and the war in 111/11 had s as for the Gauls, they were but tumults, rumors, and alarms which they made, and no wars indeed: but the Carthaginians their enemies, they were old beaten fouldiers, inured and hardned Th. people of or this 23 years in most difficult service of war, amongst the Spanish Nations, and went away e- thin.

The proper or ver with victory: first trained and practised under Analese, then under Asserbal and now issuity Bunder the conduct of Annibal a right hardy and valiant Captain. Confidering moreover, that Sitatonia. now he cometh fresh from the ruin of Sagunium, a most rich City, and passeth straight-wayes over Iberus drawing after him a train of io many nations of the Spaniards, exercised already by him in the wars: and will no doubt raife the Gauls, a people at all times ready to take arms: fo as now they were to wage war in Italy, with no more but all the World befides, yea, and under the walls of Rome, for the defence of the City.

Now had the Provinces been nominated and appointed before to the Confuls: but then were they commanded by casting lots, to part them between them. To Cornelius sell Spin: To Semproning Affrick and Sicily. Likewise decreed it was, that for that year, there should be levied fix Legions of Romans: and of allies, as many as they thought good: also that as great a navy as might C be, should be rigged and set out. So there were enrolled 24000 Roman sootmen, and of horsemen 1800: of allies 44000 foot, and 4000 horie, 220 gallies, with five course of oats on a side, and twenty foilts, were fet aflote. After this, a bill was preferred unto the people, that it might please them to determine and grant, that war should be proclaimed against the people of Carthage. And in regard of that war, there was also a solemn supplication holden through the City: wherein the people adored and prayed the Gods to prosper and bring to an happy end, this war which the people of Rome had determined. And betwirt the Confuls thus were the forces dividea: Sempronius had the conduct of two Legions, confifting of four thousand foot, and three hundred horie a piece; also of allies fixteen thousand foot, one thousand and eight hundred Horie, besides 160 gallies, and twelve barks or foists. With this power for Land and Sea service, was Sempronius lent into Sicily, from thence to palle over into Affrick, in case the other Consul were able to impeach the Carthaginians for coming into Italy. Cornelius had the charge of a finaller power: for that L. Manlius the Pretor, was fent in perfon into France with a sufficient army: but in the number of thips especially, was Cornelius scanted 60 gallies of five banks of oars he had, and no more, (for it was supposed that the enemy would neither come by Sea, nor fight in that kind of service) and two Roman Legions with the full proportion of Horsemen, and 14000 sootmen of allies, with 1200 men of arms. That Province of France (in those parts where the Car- 1, 300 to a Lethagian was expected) had that year ewo Legions of Roman footmen, 14000 allies, befides sim.

1000 Horfe from them, and 6000 of the Romans. When all things were thus prepared, to the end that before war began, it might appear they dealt by order of law, and with justice; and that all due complements might be performed, they fent certain grave and ancient perforages in Embaffe into Affrick, to wit, Q. Fabius, M. Livius, L. Emylius, C. Licinius, and Q. Bebins, First, to demand and know of the Carthaginians, Whether Annibal by their publick warrant and authority, besieged and assailed Sagunum? then, if they avowed the act, and stood to it (as they were like to do) confessing that it was done by the counsel of the State; to give defiance, and proclaim open war against them. The Romans being arrived at Carthage, had audience given in their Senar-house; where, after Q. Fabius had briefly demanded nothing else, but that one thing which he had in charge and commission, then a principal Senator among the Carthaginians stood up and faid :

Se Your former Embassage, my masters of Rome, was even as vain as this, when ye required and The Oration "would needs have Annibat to be yeelded unto you; as if he had befreged Saguntum of his own of a senator in "head. And as for this, that you come with now, how foever in words it feem more mild and Carthage. "smooth, in very deed and in truth it is more rude and rigorous: for then, was Annibal only charged and demanded to justice; but now are we both urged to acknowledge a fault, and also forced to make restitution and satisfaction out of hand; as if we had avowed and confessed the action. For mine own pare, of this mind am I, that the case ought thus to be laid, and the quethion brought to this iffue, not whether Sagantam was befieged by a privat person, or publick Councels but whether by right, or wrongfully. Forto enquire and examine whether our citizen s and in jest have done this by our advice, or of himfelf, pertaineth to us alone, as a lo to centime "and punish him accordingly: with you we are to debate this point only. Whether it might stand with the league to do it, or no? And therefore fince it pleafeth you, that we should dispute and diffinguish, between the action of a General, warranted by the public k State, and an enterprise proceeding from his own motive; ye shall understand that there was indeed a league between you and us, contracted by Luttating the Comiul, wherein there is a clause, comprising the allies of both parties: as concerning the Saguntins (who as then were none of your confederats) there was not one word stall therein: but in that league, (ye will fay) that was contracted with Afdrubal, the Saguntins are expresly named and excepted: to which I have nothing to plead, but even that which I have learned of you. For ye your felves denied, that ye were bound to fland

"to that accord which C. Luctatius your Conful first made with us, because it passed neither by H "confent of the nobles, nor grant of the people. Whereupon, there was another league anew edrawn out, and by publick agreement enacted. It you then, be not tied to observe your e leagues, unleis they be auchorifed by the nobles; or ratified by the people no more can the league " of Afdrubal chige us, which he concluded without our privity and knowledge, Forbear there " fore to speak either of Sacuntum, or Iberus; and what your mind hath so long conceived, let "it hatch now at length, and bring it forth. Then Q. Fabrus the Roman Embassador, having made a hollow lap within the plait and fold of his fide gown, Here quoth he, within this lappet, we present and offer war and peace unto you, take whether ye will. At which word, thevall cryed out at once with as great flomack and boldness: Mary even which you will your left I Whereat he let his robe loofe again; Why then, there is war, quoth he, take it amongst you, Le come fay they all again, and welcome be it; and as willingly as we accept thereof, so thall we follow and manage it as throughly.

This direct demand, and round denouncing of war, seemed more for the honor of the Romans, than to make much dispute and argument about the right of the cause, and of the covepants; a vain matter before, but now especially, after the winning and dellruction of Saguntum. For if the question were to be decided by words and reasoning, that league of Asdrubal which was exchanged for the former of Lucturius, was not the fame nor the tenor thereof to be compared : feeing that in the accord of Luctatius, this bran h and provide was expressely added, [That it should stand good, and be ratified, if the people approved thereof:] but in this of Afdrubal, K there was no inch condition at all: and besides, the covenant for so many years space during his life, was to elablished and confirmed, and no word to the contrary; that when the very maker and author thereof was dead, there was no change and alteration. And yer, put case they should have flood upon the former alliance; the Saguntins were therein well enough compriled and provided for in that the allies of either part were excepted and comprehended. For neither was this clause added [They who at that time were allies] nor yet were they excepted against, who afterwards should become, or be admitted allies. And seeing that it was lawful to entertain new confederats, who is it that would judge it reasonable, either that no man should be received unto amity for any good defert whatfoever; or being once received into protection, should not be defended accordingly: Provided alwayes, that no allies of the Carthaginians should either be solli-L cited to rebellion or received again, if of themselves they once revolted. The Roman Embassadors as they were commanded at Rome passed the seas from Carthage into Spain, for to vifit all the Cities, and to fee whether they could either draw them to their fociety, or withdraw them from the Carthaginians. And first they came to the Bargusians, where being courteously entertained (for weary they were of the Carthaginians government) they thirted up many other nations beyond Iberss, to have a defire to change for a new world. From thence they came to the Volicians, whose notable answer reported throughout all Spain, turned away all other States from banding with the Romans: for thus in a folemn affembly a fage and ancient father a-The answer of mong them framed his answer, With what face can ye (Romans) require us to prefer your friend-"Thip and amity before the Carthaginians? feeing that the Saguntins who did the fame, have been y

Whereupon, they were commanded to depart the borders of the Volcians immediately, and in no Diet or Councel of Spain, had they afterwards any betterentertainment, and more courteous language. Thus having in vain gone through all Spain, they took their way into Gaul: where they faw a strange light, and a seasful sashion: for all in armour (inth was the guise and manner of the country) they came to their publick assemblies : and there, these Embafladors after they had fee out in goodly words the greatness and glory of the people of Rome, N and highly magnified their large empire and dominion, and thereupon made request, that they would not give the Carthaginians leavet who minded to make war upon It aly) for to pass through their Cities and Towns: hereat they fet up luch a laughter, with a certain grumbling and murmuring, that fear ely con d the youth be filled and quieted by the Magistrats and Elders; so sottifh, to foolish, and shameles feemed this demand, in their conceit; that they should once into gine that the Gauls were fuch Asses, as they would be content (rather than to let the war past into Italy) to avert and turn it upon themselves, and to suffer yea, and offer their own territoris

But contrary-wife they were advertifed, that some of their nation, wereby "the people of Remedriven out of the marches and confines of Italy put to pay tribute, yea. 200 " indured other outrages and indignities. The like demands and an ivers passed to and from other Councels and Affemblies of Caul: neither could they meet with any friendly entertent ment, or have peaceab e words given them, before they came to * M. Ifil a: where, after diligni inquiry, and faithful learth made by their allies, they had true advertisements, that Anibit

A aforehand had wrought the hearts of the Gauls to his own purpole, and was possessed of them: but they understood withal, that they were not like to continue long in good terms of kindness and favor even to him, (so fierce and savage, so untractable are they, and untamed by nature) unless their Princes and Rulers be ever and anon well fed and plied with gold, whereof that nation of all other is most greedy and covetous. The Roman Embashidors, having thus gone their circuit over all the States of Spain and Gaul, returned to Rome; not long after that the Coff, had taken their journey into their Provinces: where they found the whole City possessed with the expestation of war: to rife and currant was the rumor and bruit abroad, that the Carthaginians were already passed over the River Iberus.

B Annibal after the winning of Saguntum, had retired himself to winter in new Carthage: and there having intelligence what had been done and decreed as well at Rome, as at Carthage | in Africk and that he was reputed not only the Captain General and Conductor, but also the very author and cause of all this war; so soon as he had divided and sold the rest of the booty and pillage that remained, thought good now to make no longer delayes, but affembled the fouldiers of the Spanish Nation, and to them he spake in this manner. "My trust y friends and loyal consede- The speech of rats, I am periwaded, that ye your felves do fee as well as I mow that all the States of Spain are in Annibat to his es peace and quietness, that either yeare to make an end of fouldiery, and all our forces to be caffed Spanish foul-"and discharged from service; or else that ye must remove the war into other Lands. "Sin etherefore we are to war shortly far from home, and doubt it is, when you shall see again " your houses, and whatsoever there is deer unto you : if any of you be desirous to visit home, his wife and children, kinsfolk, and friends, I give him licence and free parport. But I command " you withal, to shew your selves here again before me, in the beginning of the next spring; that "with the help of God, we may in hand with that war, whereby we shall purchase both worship "and wealth. There was not one in a manner but well accepted of this liberty fo frankly offered by himself, and were desirous to have a sight of house and land both for that every one already longed for their friends and kindred, and forefaw in farther time to come, a greater mifs, and canfe of more longing after them. This rest all Winter time, between their travels past, and those they

D were foon after to endure, refreshed as well their bodies as their minds, and prepared them to abide and endure all new pains what loever. So in the very prime of the spring, according to the Edict aforefaid, they all affembled together again. Annibal having taken a muster and survey of the aids that were fent unto him from all those Nations, went to * Gades; and there to Hercules * Cadigo, or Cahe paid his old vows, and bound himself to new s if the rest of his enterprizes should speed well be Makes, or and have good success. After this, dividing and casting care indifferently, as well for offensive as Cales. defensive war, doubting left whiles he went by Land through Spain and France into Italy, Africk should lie open and naked to the Romans from Sicily fide; purposed to fortifie and make that part fure with firong garrifons. In lien whereof, he fent for fresh supply out of Africk, specially of Archers and Javelotiers, and those lightly armed: to the end, that the Africans might serve in E Spann, and the Spaniards in Africk: like (both the one and the other) to prove the better fouldiers, far from their own countries, and being bound as it were, with mutual and reciprocal pledges. So he sent into Africk 13850 footmen, armed with light targets, and 870 slingers of the Islands * Balcares, 1200 Horsemenalio out of sundry Nations, Which forces he disposed, partly * Two Islands, for the defence of Carthage, and partly tobe divided through Africk, for the guard thereof. He Maiorica and fent withal, certain Commissioners into all their Cities to take up fouldiers, and enrolled 4000 of Minerica. Of their chosen youths, who should be brought to Carthage, there to lie in garrison, and to serve for some, columba hoftages, And supposing that Spain was not to be neglected, and the rather, because he was not and Nura. Ignorant how the Roman Embassadors had visited the same round to see how they could sollicit and work the Princes and rulers to their mind, he committed the charge of that Province to his Forother Afarubal, a valiant and hardy man; and furnished him with good forces, especially out of Africk, to wit, 11850 Africans footmen, 300 Ligurians, 500 Balear Islanders. To this power of footmen, three hundred Horse of the * Libyphænicians, a Nation mixt of Carthaginians and * Within the Africans. Of * Numidians and Mores, that coast upon the Ocean, 1900. with a small cornet of Kingdom of 200 Horlemen of Ilergetes out of Spain. And because he should want no manner of Land help, Trans. fourteen Eschants befides. Moreover, there was a fleet allowed him for the defence of the Sealinhabitants coalls. For by what forces and service the Romans had before got victory, thereby it was likely, that they would fill maintain and continue their wars, so Gallies therefore of five banks of oars, he had at Sea, two of four, and five of three. But of the five oared gallies aforefaid, he had no more but two and thirry, fitted and well appointed with rowers and marriners, and so were the G five of three banks.

his mind, what it might be, that he was forbidden to to fee behind him, he could not hold and H rule his eyes, but mun needs look back: and then he beheld behind him, a terpent of huge greatnels coming amain. and ali the way as it went, to bear down trees, groves, and thickets: and after alithat, he per cived a great florm and tempest ensuing, with mighty thunder-claps. Now when he was delirous to know what this fo great confusion and strange sight night signify, he heard a voyce, saying. That it betokened the ruins and watting of Italy: willing him therefore, to go fill forward with his voyage, and fearch no further into the fecrets of the Gods, but leave them to the hidden destinies. Annibal right joyous at this vision, passed over Iberus with his whole power, divided into three parts having fent certain before him with gitts and rewards into all parts whereas he should mar. h with his army, to gain the hearts of the Gauls; and withal, to I feek out and discover the passages of the Alpos. So he crossed the River Iberus with 90000 foot, and 12000 Horse, strong. A ter this, he subdued the Hergetes, the * Bargusians, * Aulelans, and Aquitain, which lyeth under the hills Pyrenei. The government of all these Nations, he set over to Hanno that he might have at his command the fireights which joyned France and Spain toge. ther. Unto whom neallowed 10000 footmen, and 1000 horse, for to defend and keep in obedience thole countries. After that his army was on foot and began to march through the forrest Pyreneus, and that there ran amongst the barbarous people a more certain bruit, That they were to make war with the Romans; three thouland footmen of the Carpenats, returned back: and for certain it was known, that they departed not, for lear to much of the war, as the tedious journey and unpassable wayes of the Alpes. Annibal considering that either to recal them or to keep K them by violence, was a dangerous matter; for fear left thereby he should provoke the fier estomacks of the reft; fent home again above 7000 of tuch, as he perceived to be weary, and to have no mind to the service; and made semblance withal, that the Carpetans were by his leave difcharged. And doubting left long stay and ease there, might tempt his fouldiers and give occasion of mutinies, with the sell of his forces he passed Pyrenaus, and pitched his camp before the Town * Illiberis. The Gauls, albeit they were advertised; that it was Italy, at which Annibal shot; yet because the bruit was blazed, That the Spaniards beyond Iberus, wereby for e subdued, and frong garrifons placed in their Cities: certain Nations of them, for fear of fervitude and bondage, role up in arms, and attembed together at 'R feine. Which being related to Annelal, he fearing more that they wou d stay him in his journey, than endanger him in fight; fent certain L Orator or Embassadors to their Princes and great Lords, to fightly unto them. "That himself in person would gladly parie with them, and that it should be in their choice whether they would ome neerer to Illi eris, or himself go forward to Rufeino: where, being neer together, they might more early meet and confer. For as he was willing to receive them into his camp, "and would be glad to fee them there: fo he would not think much of his pains, to repairunto "them himself, as one that was thither ome as a friend and guest unto France, and not as an enemy; and would not by his good will draw a fword (if the Gauls would let him alone) "before he were entred within It. It. And thus much verily passed by messengers and courriers between. But so soon as the Lords of France, who presently removed their camp to Il-liberis, were come willingly enough to Annibal, as being bribed and corrupted with money M and presents, they gave his army good leave to pass through their confines along the Town In I. It this while, the Embassadors of Marfeilles had brought no other word to Rome, but that

Annibal was only gone o er Iberus: but, by that time, the Boil had firred up the Iniubrians to mutiny, and were revolted themselves, even as if he had passed the Alpes already; which they did not fo much upon old rancour and matice to the people of Rome, as for that, they took it ill and were discontented, that there were Colonies brought lately into the Gauls country, to be planted about * Palus, * 11 :cen 14 and Cremona. Whereupon they arose suddenly, took arms, and entred by force into those parts, and made so foul work and fearful havock, that not only the country people and villagers, but a so the three Roman Commissioners called Triumvirs, to wit, Cain N Luck tius, Aul. Servilius, and Titus Annius, who were come to fet out the Lands and territory to the faid Colonies, not trusting the walls of Placenia, fled to * Mutina. That Luctatius was ore of them, it is not doubted: but some records have Q. Acilius and C. Herennius, instead of A. Servilius and T. Annius: and others again, nominate P. Cornelius Afina, and C. Papirius Mafo. It is uncertain also, whether they were the Embassadors sent to the * Boil, to reason or expossulat the matter, that had abuse offred them, and were evil intreated; or that the Triumvirs above faid, were fet upon and affailed as they were measuring out the Lands. But whiles they were thus besieged at Mutina, and those Boians lying at siege (a nation unskilful altogether in the feat of assaulting Towns, and like wife of all other most cowardly, to attempt any martial exploits) whiles they lay idly about the wals, and never once advanced against them, they began to make shew of 0 a treaty for peace. Whereupon the Roman Embaffadors or Commissioners, being by the chief of the Gauls called out to parle, were not only against law of nations, but with breach also of their faithful promise, and word which they had given that time, apprehended: and the Gauls said plainly, they would not let them go, unless their hostages were delivered them again. These news touching the Embassadors being reported and Mutina with the garison in danger: L. Marlins the Precor, in great anger and indignation, brought his army in more hast than good order, before

Mutina. There were in those dayes great woods about the high way, and most part of the country

A wilds and wasts, not inhabited: where he having engaged himself without his espials, was intrabped within an ambush slott many of his men, and hardly recovered the open champain country, There he incamped himself strongly: and for that the Gauls had no heart to assault, nor hope to winthe camp, his fouldiers courages were refreshed; albeit it was well known that they had received a shrewdfoil, and knew their forces to be much impaired. Then began he to march on, in his journey afresh. And so long as heled his power through the open country the enemies were not in light; but when they were entred the forrests again, they set upon the rereward of them: where, besides the great fright and damage of all the rest, 800 Roman souldiers were left dead in the place, and the enemies went away with fix enfigns, But afterwards the Ganis cealed to moleft B and trouble, and the Romans gave over to fear. fo foon as they were passed, and escaped the rough, umbrous, and unpassable forrests. And the Romans being now able in the open and chainpian ount; y to march with latery , made half to get to * Townerns a village neer unto the Fo. * Tanedo. There within a fort which they made for the time, with the help and provision of victuals by the There within a fort which they made for the time, which the defended themselves against the energy and the aid also of certain Gauls cailed * Brixians they detended themselves against the energy of Brista. mies whose number daisy encreased. After this sudden tumust was reported at Kome, and that the I.L. of the Senat were advertised, that befides the war with the Carthaginians, the Gauls were up in 17ms : they gave order, that C. Attilius the Pretor should go (with one Roman Legion, and four thousand aslies, who were enrolled by the Confus in a new levy) to aid Manlius: who without any skirmish (by reason that the enemies were fled for fear) came to Tanetus. Also P. C Corn:lins having newly levied one Legion in lieu of that which was fent with the Pretor, departed from the City of Rome, and passing with 60 Gauss along the coasts of Tuscam, Liguria, and so forward of the S tree, shortly arrived at Wasfilia, and encamped near the next mouth of * Rbo- * Rhofut. da n: (for the river is divided into many branches, and so dischargeth it tell into the Sea) being not fully of belief that Annibal as yet had passed over the mountains Pyrenas, But when he underflood, that he was ready even then to pais Rhod anus asio; and doubting in what place to encounter and meet him. his people as yet not well recovered, after their being lea-lick: he fent before, 300 elect men of arms, guided by the Mashiians, and certain Gauls that came to aid; for to discover all, and to take a full view of the enemies infely without danger. Annibat having appealed the reft of the country, either for fear or by means of mony, was now D come into the country of the "Volcans, a pulifant people and a valiant. These inhabit a long " Avignon. both the banks of Riodanus and mittrulting that they were not able to detend their Lands against the Carthaginians, on that side of the River which lay to them: became they might have the whole River to lerve them for a good defence and rampier, transported over the Rhofne all in manner that ever they had, and kept the bank on the other fide. The rest of the inhabitants neer to the River, and even those also in whose territories Annibal had set foot already, both he himfeit with gifts allured to gettogether from all parts (hipping, and to frame new veffeis: and they of themiel, es likewife were as willing to have his army transported, and their own country eafed and delivered (they (ared not how foon) of fo great a multitude of troublefome guests. Whereupon, there was got together an huge number of lighters, barges, and boats especially, which E Were made in half without great workmanship; in which the people inhabiting thereby used to transport wares and commodities from one to another. Other new whitries allo, the Gauls began hift to make of the hollowed trunks of trees; and after them, the fouldiers for that they had both thore of timber and faw the workmanship but sleight and easy, made in half certain bottoms, in has they were, like troughs without form or fashion, regarding no handsomeness at all, fo they would but flote on the water, and receive burden, in which they might convey over themselves and that which they had.

Now when they had prepared and made all ready for their passage, the enemies on the other fide right against them, kept and covered all the bank along with men and Hotle, putting them to much trouble and fear. Annibal therefore to withdraw them from that place, commanded Hanno the fon of Bonnlear, at the first watch of the night, to go up the stream along the river side, one dayes journey, with part of the forces, and those most of them Spaniards: and wheresoever he fuff could elpie a convenient place, to crois the river, and to land as fecretly as he could: and then to fetch about with his men, that when need were he might charge upon the back of the enemy. Hercunto were appointed certain Gauls for guides: who from theme conducted them some 25 miles above, to a little Iland compafied about with the river, which here fored out in bredth, by reason that it divided it self, and thereby the channel was not so deep: where they shewed him a place of passage. There, in all hast they cut down and hewed timber, and made boats to set over Hor e and man and other burthen. The Spaniards made no more ado, but fallning their apparel to vessels of lether like bladders, full of wind, and laying their bucklers thereupon, sat alost and passed over nimbly. The rest of the army also, with joyning planks and troughs together, was fet over. Where having encamped neer the river, as being weary with their night journey, and toilfome work, they rested one day to re resh themselves, whiles their Captain studied and was occupied to execute his commission and his intended service in good and convenient time. The morrow after they removed from thence, and gave knowledge by finoke that they were paffed over and not far off. Which when Annibal perceived, for that he would not loe the vantage of that time, he gave fignal to his men alfo to get over the water. Now had the footmen already their boats prepared and fitted. And the course and ranks of barges (which to receive and break the force of the current from above, transported the Horiemen, besides the Horses that swam is after) made for the imall boats that passed beneath, a gentle and calm water. For a number of Horses swam after the ships, haled by the bridle reins which were tied to the poups, besides those, which being sadled and bridled, and fitted to serve the men of arms to soon as ever they were landed, were bellowed in barges and ferry boats. The Gauls flood upon the bank with loud hooping, hollowing, yelling and finging after their manner, who shaking their targets over their heads, brandishing and florishing their iwords in their right hands, shewed themselves ready to receive them, albeit to great a number and World of barges and boats full in their eye over against them, together with an hideous roaring of the water, might have leared them: befides fundry noiles of mariners and fouldiers, who laboured and thrived to break the power and force of the I water, and who being on the other fide of the bank encouraged their fellows that were passing over. And thus frighted enough as they were, with the tumult and noise presented before their faces: behold there arose a more searful and terrible outcry behind their backs, upon the forcing and winning of their camp by Hanno. And himself in person came soon after: so that they were put infear on both sides. For not only out of the ships there was a great multitude got to Land, but alio a power at their backs unlooked for, came forward and charged them. The Gauls, alter they had made some resistance, and saw they were easily put back; brake through, where they espied the way to lie most open, and so in great fear they fled divers wayes into their Towns and Villages. Annibal then, having conveied over the rest of his forces by leisure, cared no more now for any French ftirs and tumults, and so encamped himself. But for the transporting of the K Elephants, I suppose there were fundry devices: and certainly, how ever it was, the thing is diverily recorded. Some say, that when the Elephants were gathered together upon the bank, the most couragious and sercest of them all, was chafed, angred, and railed of purpose by his mafter or keeper: and when he was puriued of the beaft, and to fave himtelf fled from him, and took the River, thereupon the Elephant followed after him as he swam, and so drew after him the whole drove of the rest: and as any one of them (tearing the depth) failed to wade, the very force of the River carried him to the other tide. But it is more credibly and certainly reported, that they were conveyed over incertain barges: which as it was a fafer way and furer course before it was practiled, so when it was done and past, it was more easily credited. They cansed therefore one vessel or barge, 200 foot long, and 50 foot broad, to reach from the strand side and L the shore into the River; which because it should not be carried down with the course and ftream of the water, they fastned to the bank above with many strong ropes, and like as it had been a bridge, they covered it over with earth, that the beafts might boldly go thereon as upon the firm ground. Now there was another barge full as broad, but of length only 100 foot; firted and appointed to pass the River, and was tied and coupled thereto: and when as the Elephanis (driven after the females going beiore) upon the fleady barge, as it had been upon a causey, were gone over into the letter which was fall ned unto it; then prefently was it looked from the bonds wherewith it was flightly tyed, and so haled and drawn by certain galley boats, directed withouts through to the other bank. Thus when the first were landed, they went for more fill, until they were all fet over: and verily, folong as they were driven on still, as it were upon a long bridge, N they nothing feared: the formost only were afraid when the barge was loolened, and they parted from their fellows, and to were caried away into the wide and deep River, where thronging and firugling together, and juftling one another, they made some trouble, whiles they that were outmost gave back from the water asmuch as they could, until such time as very fear (when they saw all about them nothing but water) caused them to be quiet. Some of them also like mging beafts as they were, and arruly, fell out into the River, but by reason of their heaviness, they flood ture, and calting their Governors, they lought the founds foot by foot, by little and little, and got fafe to Land.

Whiles the Elephants were thus transporting over , Annibal in the mean time had sent 500 Numidian light Horsemen to the Romans camp, as espials to discover the ground, where they N were to learn what forces they had, and liften after their defigns and purposes. This wing and troop was encountred by three hundred Roman Horsemen, sent as is aforesaid, from the mouth of Rhodanus: where there was a more cruel skirmish than for so small a number, for besides many hurt, there were flain on both fides in a manner alike: but in the end, the fear and flight of the Numidians gave the victory to the Romans, being now already much travailed and wearied: whose part (being the winners) were slain 160. not all Romans, but some Gauls: and on the lose fide who were overcome, there dyed above 200. This beginning and prognostication as it were of the war; as it portended and prefaged an happy end and fuccels of the whole unto the Romans so it shewed plainly, that the victory would hang long in equal balance, not without much effefion of bloud, and danger of their part. The conflict being thus determined, they returned each one to his own Captain. As for Scipio, he could not refolve to take any course himself; but according as he saw the plots and enterprizes of the enemy, so to frame his own. And Annibal 2gain being uncertain whether to go forward with his journy begun, into Italy, or to give battel unto the first army of the Romans that came in his way and met him: was drawn away from all present conflict by occasion of the coming of the Embassadors of the Boil, and of a great Lord and Potentate, called Matalus; who promising to be his guides unto him in his voyage, and companie ons in his perils, thought it good, and gave advice to invade and fet upon Italy first of all before

The common multitude of the Carthaginians (for that the former war was not clean forgot and out of remembrance) feared verily their enemies, but more their infinit journey, and the Alps especially, the name, whereof to men not experienced, was very fearful & terrible. When in these terms he had exhorted and encouraged his souldiers, he commanded them to E take their repast and repose, to cherish and refresh their bodies, and to prepare themselves for the march. The morrow after he departed crofs from the banks of Rhodanus, and entred the inland parts of France: not for that it was the more direct way to the Alps, but because he thought the further he went from the Sea fide, in so much lesse danger he should be of meeting the Romans, with whomhe was not minded to fight, before he was arrived into Italy. new foords, and casteth up new sheives and whirl-pits, (for which cause also a footman hat his much ado to wade therethrough, and knoweth not the foords) befides, it rolleth down round stones and pibbles, whereby there is no sure not safe footing for him that would wade through, And it chanced at that time, that it swelled and was risen high by fall of rain, and by land-sloods and canfed them to have very much to do, that passed over it: and over and besides all other difficulties, they were of themselves troubled and disquieted through their own fearfulness and sundry cries which they made. Publius Cornelius the Consul, about three dayes after that Annibal diflodged from the bank of Rhodanus, was arrived with his army (arranged in a foursquare bactel) as far as the place where the enemy was lately encamped, purposing without any stay to give him battel. But seeing the hold abandoned, and that he was not like to overtake him, being so I far gone forwards; he returned to his ships at Sea, supposing by that means, with lesse danger and difficulty, to encounter Annibal as he descended from the Alps, But lest that Spain (which was the Province allotted unto him) should be left disfurnished of Roman succours, he sent his brother Cn. Scipio with the greatest part of his forces against Afdrubal: not fo much to defend their old allies, and procure new, as to drive Asdrubal out of Spain. Himself with a very fmall company returned to * Genua, with intent to guard Italy, with that army which was about

Annibal being departed from Druentia, marched for the most part through the champion countries, and came in peace and quietly, to the foot of the Alps, for any trouble from the peafants that there inhabited. And albeit he had some knowledge of the Alps before by report, it (which useth to make things that are uncertain, much more than indeed and truth they are) yet feeing now neer at hand the height of those Hills, and the snows, entermingled along with the skie; the rude and mishapen houses ser upon rocks; the cattel, sheep, oxen, and horses, singed with cold ; the people with long shage'd hair, and without any trimming, both living and liveless creatures, even parched, (tiff and flark with frost and all things else more strange and ilfavoured, than can be spoken: then began his souldiers to sear afresh. So soon as they advanced forward, and began to march up the first cliffs, there appeared over their heads the mountain people, who had seized the Hills: who if they had kept the secret and hidden vallies, and suddenly all at once chatged upon them they would have made a foul flaughter of them, and put them to flight. Then Annibal commandeth the enfigus to stand still, and sent certain Gauls afore, as espials; by whom L he understood, that there was no passage that way: whereupon, he pitched his camp amongst those craggy and steep rough places, upon as large a plain and valley as he could find. Then by the same Gauls (who much differed not in tongue and manners from the other, and had entermingled themselves in talk with the mountainers) he understood, that they kept the passage, but in the day time, and flipt away in the night every one to his own harbour. So at the break of day he mounted those steep hills. as if he would openly in the day time march through the streights. Thus having spent the day in making semblance and shew of one thing, and intending another, he encamped himself strongly in the place where he had rested and staid: and so soon as he perceived, that the mountain people were departed from the steep hills, and kept not so streight watch and ward; after that he had made shew of fires, more than for the number of those that se y mained behind; and left with the Cavalry all the bag and baggage, with the greatest part of the footmen: himself in person took unto him the nimblest, most active, and valiant souldiers lightly appointed, and with all speed passed through the streights aforesaid, and encamped on the very hills which the enemies before held and befer. Then in the morning betime his camp dislodged: and the army behind, began to march and fet forward. By which time the mountainers, at the ordinary figual given, came forth out of their Castles and Forts, and met at the usual place of their accustomed guards: but then all at once they might see some of the enemies overtheir heads, to have gained their own fortress, and others also marching in the way. Both which objects at one time presented to their eye, made them blank and to standstill in a muse a good while But afterwards, when they faw Annibal his army, diffressed in the streights, and in great trouble N and disorder among themselves in the march, by reason especially the horses were so affrighted: supposing, that the least fear and terror (besides) that they could procure, would be enoughfor their enemies overthrow and confusion, they crossed the rocks overthwart, and (as they were accustomed and used to them) ranto and fro, up and down through the blind and unhaunted by wayes. But then verily, the Carthaginians were much encumbred, as wellby their enemies, as also by the disadvantage of the place, and more ado there was among them (whiles every one strove who should first escape the danger) than with the enemy. There was nothing that disordered and troubled the army in the march, so much as their own horses, which (by reason of the dissonant and divers cryes, that the ecchoes between the woods and vallies redoubled) were affrighted: and also if any of them chanced to be fricken, galled, or wounded; they kept fuch winfing, and flinging a 0 bout them, that they overthrew and made great havock of men, and of all forts of carriage. Befides, the press was so great, and the streights of both sides so steep and craggy, that many a man was thrown down head-long a mighty height: yea, and some of them armed: and the sumpter horses and beasts for carriage especially tumbled downamain with their load, as if a house or Cafile had come down with a mischief. Which, although it were terrible to behold, yet Annibal for a while flood fill and kept his own men together, for fear of encreasing this disorder and affright. But after that he faw his army disbanded and marching in difarray, and that it was to no pur-

The one and twentieth Book of T. Livius.

A pose to lead his army safe through the streights, if he lost the carriages: for fear hereof, he ran down from the higher ground, and albeit, with the violence of his charge, he discomfited the enemy, yet he encreased the trouble and fear of his own people. But that was soon appeared in a very moment, after the wayes and paffages were once cleared, by region of the Mountainers that were fled: fo that within a while the whole holi passed through, not only at ease and leifure, but also in a manner without any noise at all. This done, he seized upon a Castle, which was the chief strength of that country, with other villages lying about it: and for three dayes pace he victualled and maintained his whole army, with the Cattel of his prisoners. And for that he was now neither molefled with the Mountainers, who were at the fifl discomfited, nor B greatly encumbred with the difficulties of the wayes, in thoie three dayes he rid a good deal of ground, and journeied a great way into the country; until at the length he came to another coast well peopled (for such Mountain and Hilly quarters;) where he had like to have been overtaken, not by open force, but even in his own professed cunning: first, by a subrile pra title, and after by a secret ambush. Certain ancient men, the Rulers and Governours of the Castles, repaired unto Annibal as Orators, faying, That they having been taught and made wife, by the profitable example of other mens harms, made choice, rather to trye the amity, than prove the force of the Carthaginians; and therefore were willing to do his commandment, and be at his devotion: requesting him to take at their hands victuals and guides for their journey, yea, and hostages also for better assurance of promises to be performed. Annibal neither overhastily be-C lieving them, nor yet churlishly distrusting and refusing their offer, lest being rejected and case off, they might become open and professed enemies; gave them good language, and a courteous answer, received the hostages whom they gave, accepted victuals, which they had be ought with them to maintain his army by the way, and followed their guides, but so, as his army was not disarraied in their march, as if he had been amongst his friends, and in a peaceable countrey. First, went in the van-guard the Elephants, and the Horiemen; himseif marched after with the flower and strength of his Footmen , looking all about him with an heedful eye. So foon as he was entred a narrow passage, which of the one side lay under a steep Hill that commanded them aloft, the barbarous people rose out of their ambush from all parts at once, both before and behind, and charged upon him both a far off and neer at hand; yea, and rol-Dled down mighty huge stones upon them as they marched. But the greatest number came behind upon their backs: against whom he turned and made head with the power of his footners and without all peradventure (if the tail both of his army, had not been strong and well fortified) they must needs have received in that lane and streights; an exceeding great overthrow. And even then, as it was, they came to an extremity of danger, and in manner fell into a profent mischief. For whiles Annibal made long stay; and doubted whether he should engage the Regiment of footmen within the regights, for that he had not left any fur cours in the reregard to back the footmen, like as himself was a defense to the Horsemen; the mountainers came o erthwart, and flanked them; and breaking through the files of the battel, befet the way, and croffed upon him. So that Annibal took up his lodging for one night, without his carriages and Horica Emen, The morrow after, when as the barbarous people ran between them more coldivition before, he joyned his forces together, and paffed the streight not without great dammige and io... but with more hurt of the jumpter Hories than of men. After this, the Mountainers (lewer in number and in robbing wife rather than in warlike fort) ran in heaps one while upon the vanguard, other while upon the rereward, as any one of them could either get the vantage of ground, or by going one while afore, and by staying another while behind, win and catch any occasion and opportunity. The Elephants, as they were driven with great leiture, because through these narrow streights, they were ready ever and anon to run on their notes: so what way societ they went, they kept the army fafe and fure from the enemies; who being not used unto them, durit not once come neer. The ninth day he won the very tops of the Alps, through by-lanes Fand blind cranks: after he had wandred many times out of the way, either through the deceitfulnels of their guids; or for that when they durit not truft them, they adventured rashly themfelves upon the vailies, and gueffed the way at adventure, and went by aim. Two dayes abode he encamped upon the tops thereof, and the fouldiers wearied with travel and fight refled that time: certain also of the sumpter Horses (which had slipt aside from the rocks) by following the tracks of the army as it marched; came to the camp. When they were thus overtoiled and wearied with these tedious travels, the snow that fell (for now the star Vergily, was set and gone down out of that horizon) in reased their fear exceedingly. Now when as at the break of day the enfigns were set forward, and the army marched flowly, through the thick and deep snow; and that there appeared in the countenance of them all, flothfulness and desperation: Annihal ad-G vanced before the standards, and commanded his souldiers to stay upon a certain high Hill, (from whence they had a goodly prospect and might see a great way all about them) and there shewed unto them Italy, and the goodly champian fields about the Po, which lie hard under the foot of the Alpine Mountains: faying. That even then they mounted the wals not only of Italy, but also of the City of Rome; as for all befides (faith he) will be plain and easy to be travelled; and after one or two battels at the most, ye shall have at your command the very Castle and head City of all Italy. Then began the army to march forward: and as yet the enemies verily themselves adventured nothing at all, but some petty robberies by stealth, as opportunity and occasion served.

How-

Howeit they had much more difficult travailing down the hill, than in the climbing and getting H up; for that most of the passages to the Alps from Italy fide, as they be shorter, so they are more upright: for all the way in a manner was freep, narrow, and slippery, to as neither they could hold themselves from fliding, nor if any tripped and flumbled never to little, could they possibly (they flaggered fo) recover themselves and keep sure footing, but one fell upon another, as well Horse as Man. After this they came to a much narrower rock, with crags and rags so fleep downright, that hardly a nimble fouldier without his armor and baggage (do what he could to take hold with hands upon the twigs and plants that there about grew forth) was able to creep down, This place being before naturally of it selfsteep and pendant with a down-fall, now was choked and dammed up with a new fall of earth, which left a bank behind it of a wonderful and monitrous! height. There the Horsemen flood still as if they had been come to their wayes end: and when Annibal marveiled much what the matter might be that stayed them so, as they marched not on: word was brought him that the Rock was unaccessible and unpassable. Whereupon he went himfelf in person to view the place, and then he saw indeed without all doubt, that although he had fetched a compass about, yet he had gained nought thereby, but conducted his army, to passe through wilds, and such places as before had never been beaten and troden. And verily that (of all other) was such, as it was impossible to pass through. For, whereas there lay old snow untouched and not trodden on, and over it other fnow newly fallen, of a small depth; in this soft and tender fnow, and the same not very deep, their feet as they went, easily took hold : but that snow, being once with the going of so many people and beasts upon it, fretted and thawed, they were faintog go upon the bare ice underneath, and in the flabbery fnow-broth, as it relented and melted about their heels. Therethey had foul ado and much strugling, for that they could not tread fure upon the flippery ice: and again going as they did (down hill) their feet sooner failed them : and when they had helped themselves once in getting up, either with hands of knees i if they chanced total again, when those their props and stayes deceived them , there were no twigs nor roots about, whereon a man might take hold, and rest or stay himself, either by hand or foot. And therefore all that the poor beaits could do, was to tumble and wallow only, upon the flippery and glaffe ice, and the molten flabby inow. Otherwhiles allo, they perished as they went in the deep inow, whiles it was yet foft and tender: for when they were once slidden and fallen, with slinging our their heels, and beating with their hoofs more forcibly for to take hold, they brake theire! through; fo as most of them, as if they had been caught fast and fettered, fluck still in the deep, hard frozen, and congeated ice. At last, when as both man and beast were wearied and overtoiled and all to no purpose they en amped upon the top of an hill, having with very much ado cleule the place aforehand for that purpose : such a deal of snow there was to be digged, shovelled, and thrown out. This done, the fouldiers were brought to break that rock through which was their only way: and gain the time that it was to be hewed through, they felled and overthrew many huge trees that grew there about and made a mighty heap and pile of wood; the wind ferned fully for the time to kindle a fire, and then they fet all a burning. Now when the rock was on fire and red hor they powred thereon throng Vinegar for to calcine and diffolive it. When as the rock was thus baked (as it were) with fire, they digged into it, and opened it with picke-axes, and made they deicent gentle and easy, by means of moderat windings and turnings: fo as not only the Hories and other bealts, but even the Elephants also might be able to go down. Four dayes he spent about the levelling of this rock: and the beafts were almost pined and lost for hunger. For the hill tops for the most part are bare of grass; and look what forage there was, the snow overhilleds, The dales and lower grounds have some little banks lying to the sun, and rivers withal, neer note the woods, yea, and places more meet and befeeming for men to inhabit. There were thelebouring beafts put out to grafs and pallure, and the fouldiers that were wearied with making the wayes, had three dayes allowed to rest in. From thence they went down into the plain count try, where they found both the place more easy and pleasant, and the natures of the inhabitants more tractable.

In this manner and by this means principally, entred the Carthaginians into Italy, five months after they departed from new Carthage (as some write:) and within fifteen dayes overcame and passed the Alps. What power Annibal had, when he was arrived in Italy, the historians do not agree. They that speak with the most, write that he was 100000 foot, and 20000 horse strong! they that make the least of it, say they were 20000 foot, and 6000 horse. L. Cincius Alimentus who hath delivered under his hand, that himself was taken prisoner by Annibal (a writer of great authority / would induce me sufficiently to believe him, but that he setteth down the number of confusedly, by adding to the reft, the Gauls and Ligurians. He recordeth, that counting them the Infantry was 80000, and the Cavalry 10000, which was conducted into Italy (but likely) is that from all parts there came more thither than fo, and fo some Authors do report) and that hell heard from Annibal his own mouth, that after he had pasted Rhodenus, he had lost 36000 men and a great number of Hories and other beafts of burden, when he was come down into the Taurins Country, which was the next Nation in Italy, adjoyning to the Gauls. Which being a thing agreed upon amongstall, I marvel to much the more, that there is any doubt, on which fide he went over the Alps: and that commonly it is believed that he passed by a place called Penninum, and that thereupon the top of the Alps took the name, and was so called. Celina faith, he took his way over by the top of Cremen: both which passages surely would have A brought him not into the Taurins country, but through the mountain forrests, unto the Gauls called Libni, But neither is it probable, that in those days the same passages were open into Frances considering, that the wayes which lead to Pennium were environed with nations half Germans. And certainly, the Veragrians, who inhabit this very top (in case a man may build ought upon this conjecture) never knew that these mountains took the name of any passage of the Carthaginians, that way: but of some one place consecrated in the top of the hill, which the peasages and mountains that way:

tainers called Penninum.

Very happily and fitly it fell out for the enterprise of his first designments, that the Taurins 💉 🗡 the next nation he came unto made war upon the Insubrians. But Annibal being busied in refresh-Bing his army (that now had most seeling of their harms which they had caught before) could not arm the same to the aid and gratifying of either party: for ease after travel, plenty upon scarcity, good keeping and delicate, after loathsome nastines, did by a sudden change greatly alter and dithemper their lean and pined bodies, well neer favage and wild grown. Which was the cause that P. Cornelius the Conful, being arrived and landed at Pife, after he had received of Manlius Attilimean army of new and raw fouldiers, fearful for some shameful disgrace and defeat lately received, made hatte and highed him to the Po, for to give battel unto the enemy before he were well refreshed and in heart again. But by that time that the Consul was come to Placentia, Annibal had dislodged and removed his camp, and won by affault the chief City or Town of the Taurins, because it willingly yeelded not to accept of his amity and protection; and surely not by fear only, c but also of voluntary good will, he had gained unto him the Gauls that inhabited about the Po, but that the sudden coming of the Consul interrupted and surprized them, as they were casting about to spie some opportunity of rebellion. So Annibal dislodged, and removed out of the Taurins country, with this opinion, that the Gauls especially, being doubtful as yet what part to take, would follow him being present in place. Now were the armies in manner one in fight of the other, and the Generals approached nigher together: and as they were not yet well known one unto the other, so they had already both of them a great opinion, and teciprocal admiration one of the other. For as Annibal was much renowned, and his name right well known among the Romans, even fince before Saguntum was loft: fo Scipio was taken of him, and reputed for some fingular and excellent man, in that he especially above all other, was chosen General against him. b Which mutual conceit and impression they had, they augmented themselves one to the other: for that Scipio, albeit he was left behind in France, yet he met Annibal, and was ready to make head against him, so soon as he was passed the Alps: and Annibal again, because having enterprifed so great an adventure, as to pass the Alps, and now brought the same to good effect. But Scipio to prevent Annibal in croffing the Po before him, removed his camp to the river Ticinus: and for to encourage his fouldiers, before he hrought them forth to battel, he made an Oration unto them, and began in this manner.

"My valiant fouldiers and trusty friends, if I were now to lead that army into the field, which "I had with me in France, I would have forborn to make any speech at all unto you ; forto what "purpole needed I to exhort, either that Cavalry, which so valiantly had vanquished the horie-E" men of the enemies at the river Rhodanus: or those legions, with whom I followed in chase as it "were, even these very enemies, and whose falling off and resufing battel, I take to be a confession "of victory? But now for as much as that army, being indeed levied for the province Spain, " ferveth with my brother Cn. Scipio, under my name and commission, where it pleaseth the Senat "and people of Rome, they should be employed, to the end that ye might have a Consul to be "your Captain, against Annibal and the Carthaginians, I have willingly offered my self to this war. If being then, your new Captain, and you my new fouldiers, meet it is and convenient " I should nse a sew words unto you. And to the end you should not be ignorant, either of the "manner of this service, or quality of your enemy; with those menye are to fight, whom in the "former Punick war ye overcame both by land and sea; of whom for these twenty years ye have " received tribut; from whom ye have won (as the due wages and reward of the war) Sicily "and Sardinia both, and them do hold and occupy. In this battel therefore, both you and they are to catry that mind, and to to be affected, as winners and lofers are to be for never think that "it is valor and hardinels that provoketh them now to fight, but meer necessity and compulsion " enforceth them to the field. Unless you wil believe, that they who when they had an entire army "and unfoiled refused battel, should now have greater hope, and take more courage, after they "have lost two parts of their horse and soot, in the very passage of the Alps; and of whom, there "havemore perished in a manner, then remain alive. But will some man say, True it is, sew they "are in number, but flout in beart, and tall of hand, whole flrength & puissance, no force is hardly "able to abide. Images they are nay, to fay more truly, the very shadows of men, and no better; with hunger bitten. with cold starred, lost for want of keeping, spoiled with nastiness, and filthy. ordure, bruifed and weakned amongst hard rocks and craggy cliffs: over and besides, joints and marrow dried up and burnt, their finews shrunk, hard, and stiff again with cold and chilling snow, their lims singed with bitter frost, their armor crushed, brussed, and their weapons broken; their hories, no other then lame jades and poor hide-bound Tits. See what horiemen, lo what footmen ye are to fight withal. Beleeve me, ye shall have the very reliques and last rem-"nants of enemies and not enemies indeed. And I affure you, nothing fear I more than this, that before ye shall skirmish with this kind of enemy, it will be thought that the A/ps already have

When by these Orations, the fouldiers hearts of both sides were inflamed to fight, the Romans made a bridg over licinus: and for defen e of the bridg, crected a sconce and fort thereupon, But Annibal while the enemies were butle at work, fent Maharbal with a Cornet of Numidians, to the number of 500, light horiemen, to overrun and waste the territories belonging to the allies of the people of Rome: commanding him withal to make as great spare of the Gauls as he could, and to iollicit and periwade their Nobles and Lords unto rebeliion. After the bridg was finished, the Roman army passed over into the Insubrians country, encamped themselves upon certaine I hills, five miles off from a village where Annibal also lay in camp: who seeing there was abattel toward, sent speedily for Maharbal back again, and the horsemen: and thinking belike, that he could never say enough to his souldiers, and admonish them sufficiently to do well and animate them to fight, he called them all again together to an audience; where he proposed, and promied unto them openly, certain affured rewards, the hope whereof might incite them to fight inemely, Imprimis, that he would endow them with fair lands in Italy, Africk or Sp.un, where they would themselves, to have, and to enjoy to him and to his heirs for ever, as free hold in trank tehnie, without service: if any one would chuse to have money rather then land him he would content with filver, Irem, of the allies, as many as hereafter were defirous to be enfranchifed Citizens of Carthage, they should have their free burgeosie: & those that had a mind rather to return home again, N he would endeavor and bring about that he should live so well, as not one of them would wish for to exchage his state with any of his neighbors and countrimen what soever. Last of all look what bond fervants attended and followed their masters, to them he promised freedom; and that in lieu of them, he would deliver again unto their masters, two for one, of the slaves taken captives in war . And that they might be affured, that he would perform all these promises, heheld with his left hand a Lamb, and in the right a flint stone, and prayed solemnly, That if he failed herein, Jupiter and the rest of the gods, would so kill him, as he slew that Lamb: and presently after his prayer done, he smote the Lamb on the head, and dasht out the brains. Whereat they all every one, conceived and embraced affured hope unto themselves, that the godssaid Amenand were on their fide and supposing that the only stay of enjoying their hopes, and obtaining their N rewards, was, because they had not fought already; with one heart and voice they called for

The Romans for their part were nothing to lufty: for befides other things, they were affrighted with new prodigies and fearful fights. For it hapned that a Wolf entred their camp, & after he had worried and torn those that came in his way, escaped unhurt. Also a swarm of Bees setled upona tree that grew over the General's pavilion. Which strange tokens being purged and cleared by explatory facrifice, So pio with his Cavalry and darts lightly appointed, went toward the camp of the enemy to view their forces, and to observe how many and of what condition and quality they were; and there he encountred Annibal, who also was gone forth with his horsemen to discover the country about. At the first they saw not one another but afterwards, by reason of the thick dust that rose upon the march of so many men and horses, they knew that enemies approached neer. On both fides the battaillons made a ftand, and every man buckled himself to the skirmish. Sa pio placed his Archers and horsemen of the Gauls in the forefront: the Romans and strength of Allies, he best owed behind for succours in the reregard. Annibal set in this battel, his great but bed horses with his lances and men of arms, and strengthned the wings with Numidian horsemen. The very first charge and shout was scarce done, when the Archers aforesaid retired among the

A qual battel: yea, and afterwards, because the footmen that were intermingled among troubled and dilordered the horses, many either fell, or else alighted from their horses, to go thither where they faw their fellows to be environed and overcharged. The conflict became very doubtful in many places until fuch time as the Numidians (who were in the wings) wheeling about by little and little, shewed themselves behind the backs of the Romans: this fearful fight troubled them greatly, and the fear was encteafed by reason of the Contul his hurt; the extream danger wherof, was put by and avoided by the rescue of his son (then a very stripling as yer, and scarce had any hair upon his face) this youth is he, who had the honor of happy ending this war, furnamed alterwards (upon the noble victory and memorable conquest over Annibal and the Curthagini-Bans) Africanus, But the Archers were they that fled fallett away, even those whom the Numidians let upon first. The rest that were horsemen, keeping thick and close together, recovered their Conful within their files into the midft of them: and protecting him not only with their weapons, but also with their bodies, brought him back safe unto the camp : retiring all the way neither disorderly nor like fearful men over hastily. The honor of laving the Consul, Calius attributeth unto a bondstave of Ligaria. But I verily would rather believe it of the son: which also the greater number of authors do affirm, but the common tame goeth of the faid bondflave. This was the first battel with Annibal: wherein it easily appeared that the Carthaginians were better in Cavalry. and therefore the open plain field fuch as were between the Po and the Alps, were not to good for the Romans to fight in. The right following therefore. Scipio commanded his fouldiers fecretly C without any notice to truis up bag and baggage, and to diflodge: and removed from Ticinus, and made halte to Po: that whiles his boats were not yet unloosed one from the other, in which (as upon a bridge) he had brought over his army he might without any trouble and puriou of the enemy, conduct the same back again. And they came to Placentia before that Annibal knew they were departed from ficinus; howbeit, he took tome of them that made flay on the hither fide of the bank, as they were too flow about disjoining and loofening the forefaid bridg of boats : upon which he could not pass over, by reason that when both ends were let loose, the planks and all, went down the water with the fiream. Colins writeth, that Mago with his horses, and Spanish footmen, prefently, fwam over the river; and that Annibal himself led over his army at the upper foords of Po: for which purpole, helet the Elephants along on arow to break and bear off the D violence and fiream of the current. A thing jurely that they were hardly able to do, who were skillul and by long experience knew the nature of the River very well. For it foundeth not like a truth, that horsemen with their armor and horses safe, could overcome so great a rage of the river, although we should grant that all the Spaniards gat over upon blown bladders or leather vesfels, and bendes, they had needed many days to fetch a compass for to find the foords of Po, over which, the army (laden with carriage) might be conveighed. But those authors carry more credit and authority with me, who write that scarcely in two days they found a place to make a bridge (of planks joined together) over the river, and that Mago and the Spanish light horsemen were fent that way over before.

Whiles Annibal on this fide of the River, staid in giving audience to the embassages of the Gauls, the conducted over the regiments of footmen more heavily armed: in the mean while, Mago and the horiemen, after they had passed the river, mirched one "days journey apace toward the enemies at Plazentia. And Annibal (few days after) encamped himself strongly six miles from Pla- English wiler, centia: and the morrow after in the fight of the enemies he put his men in array, and made them as appeareth offer of battel. The night following there was a petty massacre committed in the Romans camp before in this by the Gauls that came to aid: but greater was the garboil and tumult, then the harm indeed For book. about 2000 footmen, and 200 horiemen, having flain the warders at the gates, fled away to Aznibal: whom he spake courteously unto, and when he had drawn them on, inhope of great gifts and rewards, he dismissed every one into his own City and Country, to sollicit and perswade their countrimento fide with him Scipio taking that massacre as a foretoken and overture to the Gauls revolt in general; and supposing, that now being once guilty and tainted with this offence, they would in a madness run all to take arms and rife. Although till he were fore of his late wound, yet the night following at the relief of the fourth watch, he marched (tilly, and removed his camp neer the river Trebia, into the higher countries, and hills, that were more troublesom for men of arms. But he wrought not so closely and without the knowledge of the enemy, as he did at Ticinus. For Annibal having fent out, first, the Numidian light horse, and then all his Cavalry; without question had disordered and endammaged the rereward, but that the Numidians for greedsnels of prey and booty, diverted afide, and turned into the tents, abandoned and for laken of the Romans. Where, whiles they spent time in ransacking and rifling every corner of the camp (and when all was done, could find no pillage worth the stay) the enemy escaped their hands. And G when as they had espied that the Romans were newly got over Trebia, and pitched out a plot for a camp, they intercepted a few of them that lingred about the river, and flew them. Scipio not able now to abide any longer the grief and pain of his wound, by reason of the shaking and shogging of his body as he travelled, and thinking it good to expect the coming of the other Conful his Collegue, (whom he heard already to be tent for out of Sicely) chose out a place neer the river which seemed most sase for to encamp in, and it be fortified. Annibal also lay not far off in camp; who as he was proud upon the late battet of horsemen, so was he perplexed for want of victuals, which scarcity encreased upon him every daymore and more,

as he travelled through the enemies country, finding in no place provision aforehand. Whereup-H on, he went to Cliftidium, a town wherein the Romans had bestowed and laid up great flore of grain: where, as he prepared with violence to force the town, there appeared some hope of treason, by corrupting of P. Prundisinus, the captain of the gartison there, and that with no great fum of money; for in confideration only of 400 peeces of gold given unto him, Claffidium was betrayed unto Annibal: the very storehouse and garner of corn that the Carthaginians had, all the while they were in leaguer neer Trebia, Upon those prisoners that were taken when the garrison and fort was betrayed, he exercised no cruelty, because that in the beginning of his affairs. he would win himself a name and opinion of clemency.

Twenty gallies with five ranks of Oars and a thousand armed men, were sent from the Carthaginians to invade and waste the coasts of haly. Nine of them arrived at * Lipara: eight fell with the Island of * Vulcan, and three were driven by tempel into the straights of Sicily. Against them being descryed within kenning, there were twelve ships let out from " Messane, by Hiero King of the Saracusans, who hapned at that *Vulcano, ano- time to be in Messara attending the Roman Consul his coming; and without any resistance made he boorded those three thips, and brought them away into the Haven of Meffina, By those that were taken prisoners, it was known that besides the twenty ships aforesaid, sent against Italy (of which Fleet they were) 35 gailies of five course of Oars, made fail for Sicily, to follicit and per I fwade the old allies there to revolt, Item, that the elpecial point and defign that they shot at, was to seizeupon * Lily Laum: but they thought verily that by the same gust or tempest wherein they were feattered, that other Fleet also was call upon the Island Egates, And according to this intelligence, the King from M fa a writeth to Emplius the Roman Pretor or Governor of Sicily, adviling him to keep altrong garrion in Libeaum: whereupon the Lieutenants and Colonels about the Pretor, were tent from him with all speed to all the Cities about, to give order, that their people might be in readiness, to keep good ward, and above all, to hold Lilybaum sure. And for preparation of war, there went forth a proclamation, that the failers and marriners should bring into the ships ten days provision of victuals and meat ready dressed, to the end that upon the fig nal given at an hours warning, without all delay, they should a shipboord: Also that all that dwelt I along the coast, should from their sentinels, watch-towers, and beacons, espy when the enemies fleet approached. Now (albeit the Carthaginians of purpose stayed the course of their ships, that they might come just before day to Lilybaum) they were discovered, both for that the Moon shone all night, and also because they came under sail which they had hoised up. So soon therefore as the fignal was given out of the Sentinels and watch-towers, & alarm cried in the town, the mariners were foon imbarked the foundiers also were bestowed, some to man and guard the wals, and guard the gates, others toter e in the ships. But the Carthaginians perceiving, they were to deal with them that were provided for them, (as being advertised of their coming) forbare to enter the havenuntil day, and imployed the time in firiking fails, in untackling their ships, and preparing them for a battel, When it was broad day light, they retired into the deep, to have sea roomenough to fight and that the enemies thips might have free egress out of the haven. The Romans for their part refused not battel, comforting themselves with the remembrance of the valianterploits performed in that very place, and trutting also upon the number and valour of their souldiers. They were not so soon lanched into the open sea, but the Romans were desirous to grapple, and to come close to hand fight: but contrariwise, the Carthaginians held off aloof, willing to proceed by cunning and policy, more then by strength and meer force; and to make trial rather of the nimbleness and agility of their ships, then either of the prowess of men, or goodness of armor: for as their Fleet was infliciently furnished, and to the full, with a multiude of marriners, so was it ill provided of fouldiers: and where loever they grappled together, and came to hand-fight, they had not an equal number of men armed to hold play with the enemies: which being once perceived the Romans gathered heart, and redoubled their courage, by reason of their number; the other fide again were discouraged and out of heart, for their default of souldiers. Insomuch as seven Carthaginian gallies were soon invested round and boorded, the rest fled. Of souldiers and marriners together, 1700, were in them taken; amongst whom, there were three great Gentle men of Carthage. The Roman fleet still entire and whole, save one vessel only that was bouged and pierced (yet able to be brought back) returned into the haven,

Presently after this battel, and before that they of Messana had knowledge thereof, T. Sempronins the Conful arrived at Meffana: and as he entred within the found King Hiero met him with a fleet well furnished and richly decked and coming forth of his royal ship into the Admira of the Con uls he welcomed him and rejoyced for the lafe return of his men and ships, and pray of ed God that his voyage into Sicily might prove happy and fortunate. Then shewed he unto him the present estate, and the affairs of the Island; opened the designments of the Carthaginians; and promised withal, that with as good a mind and sound heart, as in the former war against the Carthaginians when he was a young man, he had aided the people of Rome; so nowin his old age he would affift them: and for proof hereof, he would of his own tree coft furnish both the Confuls legions, and also the marriners with corn and rayment. Among other matters heel, formed him how Lilybaum, and other Cities on the sea coast were in great danger, by reason of

A some among them that desired a change and alteration. Whereupon the Consul thought good to make no delay, but to fet fail with all speed to Lilybaum, whom the King and his royal fleet accompanied: and as they were failing, tidings came of the foresaid battel before Lilybaum, and how the enemies ships were either scattered and put to flight, or boorded and taken.

The Coniul having bid King Hiero adieu, with his fleet feetfall from Lilybaum, leaving behind him the Pretor to defend the coast of Sicily, and crossed the sea himself to the Island * Melita, * Malta, which was held by the Carthaginian. At whose coming, Amileur the son of Gifeo, Captain of the garrilon there, rendered himfelf, and 2000, fouldiers within a very few, together with the Town and the Island. From whence, within few days he returned to Llyleism: where the prippiers B (excepting certain noble persons of high parentage) were by the Contuit and the Pretor both sold openly in port-fale. When the Consulthought Sicils on that coast fure enough, he fet fail from thence towards the Islands of Vulcan, for that the bruit went that a fleet of Carthaginians there lay atroad: but there were no enemies to be found about those Islands: for it chanced they were already passed over to waste along the river and coast of Italy; and having for raged the territory of Vibo, they put the City also in great fear. As the Consul returned back again to Sicily, tidings a Bivona, or came that the enemy had made rodes into the country of Vibora: and he received letters also from Vibora. the Senat, concerning the coming of Annibal into Italy, and therefore that he should with all speed possible aid and succour his Collegue. The Consulbeing at once troubled with many cares. presently embarked his army, and by the Adriatick sea, sent them away to * Ariminum. To Sext. Pomponius his Lieutenant, he gave the change of 25 Gallies for the defence of the territory of Vibo and the sea-coast of Italy, With M. Employs the Pretor he left a fleet augmented to the number of fitty fail : which done, and all things fet in order in Sicily, himself with ten ships coasted along lealy, and arrived at . Ariminum, from whence he put himself in his journey, and marched * sellerio. with one army to the river Trebia, where he joined with his fellow Conful Now were both Consuls, and the whole puissance and force of the Romans opposed against Annibal, so as it appeared plainly, that either with that power the Empire of Rome might be defended or elfe all their hope was gone. Howbeit, one of the Consuls being weakned and discouraged with the defeat of his horsemen in one battel, and dismayed besides with the hurt he had received in his body, desired to have the fight deferred: but the other coming fresh and lusty, and therby more hardy, would abide no delay.

It tell out so at that time, that the Gauls inhabited all the Country between the two rivers Trebia and Po: who whiles these two most puissant nations were at strife and warred held off as neuters, and favoured neither fide, making full account of the good will and grace of that part which should have the better. The Romans because they would now make no stir, and have no more irons in the fire, took the matter well enough: but Annibal was very much thereat offended, giving out very often, that he was sent for by the Gauls for their deliverance and liberty. Upon this indignation and displeasure, and for that also he would feed his men with booties, he commanded 2000 footmen, and a thousand horsemen, most of them Numidians, and some Gauls among, to overrun and spoil all the country forward, even to the banks of Po. The Gauls standing in need of help, and having until that time kept themselves in doubtful tearms, were forced to turn from those that offered them wrong, and to encline and cleave unto the Romans that should revenge their injuries and protect them. Whereupon they fent Embassadors to the Confuls, requesting the Romans help for their land, which by reason of the exceeding fidelity, and too much loialty of the inhabitants toward them, was now endangered. Cornelius liked neither the cause, nor yet the time to deal in such affairs: he had the nation besides in suspition and jealousie, as well for many treacherous parts, as also (in case he would or could forget all ot her lewd pranks of theirs) for the same disloyalty and falshood of the Boians. Sempronius contrariwise thought it the furest bond to keep their allies in faith and allegeance, to defend those that came first to band and fide with hm. But no withftanding his Collegue cast doubts and held off, yet he sent his own Cavalry, and a thousand well neer offootmen darters amongst them, to guard the country of Gaul beyond Trebia: who coming suddenly upon the enemies, and chatging them at unawares, as they came scattered asunder, and out of order, yea, and most of them laden with spoil, mightily affrighted them, and made a foul flaughter and pursued them in flight, as far as to their flanding camp, and corps de guard. From whence (nevertheless) they were beaten back by the multitude that iffued forth: but by new succors from their own companies, they renued the fight again. The fight afterward was doubtful and variable: and although they made a faving bargain on both parts yet the common voice gave the honor of victory (luch as it was) to the Romans rather then the enemies. But no man made a greater matter of it, and reckoned it more to the full, then the Cof. himself. "He joved, he made his boast, that he had got the better, with the help of the same for-"ces, which under the conduct of the other Con'ul, came by the wor'e. And now (faith he) the "fouldiers are comforted and refreshed wel enough, and none there is but my brother Consul that "would have the battel deferred: who no doubt is more hen-hearted than bodily hurr; and for "the remembrance and imart of a little green wound, quaketh to hear of the field & of all things annot away with edg-tools, But we must not thus fit still here and wax aged for the pleasure of one craise and fickly person. For what reason is it, that we should drive off longer, and spend more time in vain? What other Conful expect we to make up the third? or what army besides should we look for? The Carthaginians lie encamped in Italy, and well-neer within the view and fight

"of the City of Rome; and it is neither Sicily nor Sardinia taken from them by conquest, nor H "Spain on this side Iberus, which they shoot at, to win again: but that the Romans should be "thrust out of their native soil and country wherin they were born, that is their drift and defignment. Oh how deeply (quoth he) would our Fathers figh, how heartily would they groun. "they who were wont to mannage war about the wals of Carthage, if they should see us their off-spring and children, two Consuls with Consular and roial armies in the midst of Italy, friehr ed thus and panting torfear within our camp? And that Annibal hath subdued and brought under his subjection all the country between the Alps and Appenninum? These and such like speeches uttered he to his Collegue, as he fat by his beds fide, where he lay fick : thus spake he, as in an open audience, in the Cost, pavilion and all that quarter, to the fouldiers. The time also of the E- I lection of magistrates at Rome, being so neer at hand, set him forward, for fear, lest the war should be deferred unto the new Coss, and the opportunity withal, of winning all the honor to himself whiles his Collegue continued tick, pricked him on. Whereupon, for all the contradiction of Cornelius, which he nothing weighed and regarded, commandment he gave to his fouldiers to be ready, to give battel anon unto the enemy. Annibal as one that knew and law well enough what was belt and fafelt for his enemy, could hardly imagin or conceive any hope to himself, that the Consuls would enterprize any thing rashly, or without advisement; but when he understood by hear-fay, that which afterwards by good proof and experience he found true, namely, that the one of them by nature was hot halty, proud, and furious: and supposing, that he was the prouder and more furious for the late good hand he had of his forragers; made no doubt and diffull K of the happy success and issue of ab ttel, whensoever it should come. Marry, careful he was, that no good time and opportunity presented unto him should be overslipt: but to try the hazzard and fortune of the field, whiles the enemies fouldiers were raw and untrained; and the betterand wifer man of the two Generals, was unmeet for lervice, by reason of his wound as yet uncured; and the courages of the Gauls lufty and forward: for well he with, that a mighty number of them would the more unwillingly follow, the further they were drawn from their own home. Annibal, I say, hoping that by these and such like or casions, a battel would be soon offered; desirous also himself to bid battel, if the enemy staid long: and being advertised besides by the Gauls, his cipials (whom he employed to hearken out and learn what he defired to know, and thought them more fure, because they served in both camps) that the Romans were ready sorthe L field ; then began he (crafty Carthaginian as he was) to leek out a convenient placefor an ambush. Now there was in the mid way between, a river running within the borders, having very high banks of either fide, and therefore lying close hidden, and all about overspred with moory weeds, with briers, brambles, and brush-wood as for the most part, such for et places are overgrown withal. Which when Annib lin perion had ridden about, and well viewed, perceiving that it would afford lurking holes handtom enough even for horfemen there to be hidden, This shall be the place (quoth he to his brother Mago) which you shall keep. Chuse therefore out of all the horse and foot a hundred lusty tallfellows of each; and see you repair with them to me at the first watch, for now is it time to take repatt, and to refresh your bodies. And with that helent out to the camp the Criers, to call the fouldiers to supper. And long it was not, but Mago WAS M come with his chosen men. I see (quoth Annib 1) ye are goodly men of person, and sufficient, And that ye may be as able in number, as hardy in conrage, elect ye also out of the Cornets of of horie and iquadrons of foot nine a piece in h as your felves to fort withal. Mago shall shew you the ground where ye must lie in ambush you shalfind the enemy as blind as beetles, altogether unacquainted with these seats and cunning devices.

Thus Annib. I having committed unto Mago a thouland horsemen and as many footmen himfelf betimes in the morning, willed the Numidian Cavalry, when they were passed over the mer Trebia, to ride braving before the gates of the enemies, and by darting and shooting into their guards, to provoke and draw them forth to fight: with this ditection moreover, when the skirmish was begun, to fall off, and seem to retire by little and little, and so to train them on this side N the river, This charge had the Numidians. But the other Captains as well of foot as horse, were commanded to et their Companies all to their breakfast : which done, to arm themselves, and with their horses ready sadled, to attend the signal of battel. Sempronius upon the alarm and hurliburly of the Numidians, as being forward and defirous of fight, first brought forthallhis horsemen, and bare himself bold and confident in that service; after that six thousand sootmen; and at last, all his whole forces; and sed them to a place which before he had defigned and appointed in his mind. It fell out to be in Winter, about the midft of December, and a Inowy day it was in those parts lying between the Alps and Apenninum. Now by reason of the rivers and moots so neer both horie and men were exceeding cold: also for that they were hastily on a sudden, called forth talling, and unprovided of all means against the cold, they had never a whit of heat lest in 0 them: and the neerer they came to the air and vapour of the river the sharper cold pinched and pierced them through. But when as once they followed upon the Numidians that gave back, and were entred into the water (which by reason of the rain that fell by night was risen brest-high) they were not so soon gotten out again of the river, but all their bodies begun to chill and be fiff again for cold that scarcely they could hold their weapons: and withal, as the day went surther on, for very hunger they fainted, But Annibal his fouldiers, who in the mean time had made fires before their tents, and had oyl tent them to every company, for to supple and toften their joints,

A and lims, and taken their repast, and eated at leasure; when they heard say, that the enemies were naffed the river, with hearts couragious and bodies fresh and lusty, take them to their weapons, and come forth to fight in ordinance of battel. The Baleares, and light armed men, to the number almost of 8000, he ranged before the standards in the front: after them he placed the footmen, better appointed and armed to the proof, even the very strength and manhood of all his forces : about the wings he let 10000 horsemen, and behind those wings, he divided and appointed his Elephants both on the one fide and the other.

The Contul Sempronius feeing his horsemen following the chase on the sour, and out of order; and how at unawares they were charged again by the Numidians, who upon a sudden turned and B made head upon them, founded the retreat : and when they were rallied about him, he compaffed his footmen with them. The Romans were in number 18000. of Allies and Latines 2000. besides the aids of the * Cenomares: which Nation of the Gauls only, continued faithful and true * Deside Main. to the Romans. With these forces came they into the field, and began the battel. The first charge of the skirmish was given by the Islanders of Baleures, upon whom, when the legions made head with greater violence, their light armed men were quickly brought into the wings: which was a cause that the Roman horiemen presently were surcharged and distressed. For whereas of themfelves they were but 4000, horse, and hardly able to withstand the shock of ten thousand horsemen of the other, the Romans also were wearied, but most of the Carthaginians fresh and untainted: over and besides, they were overwhelmed with a cloud (as it were) of darts, flung and c fhot by the Beleare Islanders: Moreover the Elephants which appeared aloft from the hindinost ends of the wings frighted the horses especially, and not only with the thrange fight, but also with as uncouth a fcent and favor, made them flie every way. The battel of the Infantry was equal in courage of heart, rather then in strength of body: which the Carthaginians, (as having a strete afore taken repaft) brought fresh with them into the field : but contrariwise the Romans were fafling and weary, and for cold even (tark and benummed, Howbeit their (tomacks would have ferved to have held out and withflood to the end, if they might have fought with footmen onely. But both the Baleares, having difordered the horsemen, flanked them with their shor, and also the Elephants by this time were entred into the middle battailion of footmen: and withal, Mago and the Numidian light horse (so soon as this battaillon was unawares gone past their am-D bushment and lurking holes) start up and arose from behind, and put them in exceeding trouble and fright. Yet for all these inconveniencies and disadvantages (so many on every ide) the main battel a good while flood unmovable and stirred not, but kept the array, and especially (beyond the expectation of all men) against the Elephants. For certain sootmen placed for the purpose by flinging of darts forced them to turn head; and when they were once turned fromwards, they followed hard upon them, pricking and galling them under the tails, in which place by reason of the tender skin they are soon wounded. Whom when Annibal saw thus feared and ready to turn upon their own part, from the main battel to the flanks and outfides, he commanded them to be driven unto the left wing upon the Gauls that came to aid, and presently enforced them to tun away. The Romans feeing their auxiliary Gauls put to flight, were driven into a new fear. Wher-E upon fighting now as it were in a ring and round on both fides, there were among them to the numberallo of 10000, who feeing no way elfe to escape, brake through the middle b traillon of the Africans, which was strengthned with the aid of the Gauls, and that with a great slaughter of their enemies : and feeing they neither could return into their camp (the river being between) nor for the rain well difcern how to inccour their fellows, they took the way straight to Plicentia. After this, therest brake forth in all parts. They that took the river either perished in the fireams and whirl-pools : or fuch as made flay to enter, were by the enemy overtaken and flain. But as many as here and there fled scattering through the fields, following the footing and tracks of the battaillon that retired back came to Placentia, Some for fear of the enemy, adventured boldly to take the river, and being once over, recovered the camp. The rain and snow together, and the intolerable cold killed many, as well men as beafts; and in manner all the Elephants. The Carthaginians followed the enemies in chase as far as Trebia, and there gave over: and returned into the camp to clumfie and frozen, as scarcely they felt the joy of their victory. By reason wherof, the nightfollowing, whenas the guard of the Roman camp, and the remnant of that great compamy of fouldiers passed Trebia with float-boats and flat barges, the Carthaginians either perceived them not indeed for the noise the temperatuous rail made, or for weariness and fore wounds were not be charged with the wintering of two armies at one time. Upon this defeat and overthrow, there arrived such fearful tidings at Rome, that they believed verily and looked for no other but that the enemy would come with banner displayed straight to the very City: and that there was no hope nor help left behind to defend their gates and walls from affault and violence. For feeing that the one Conful was vanquished at Ticinus and the other allo, who was called unto him out of Sicily; fince both Confuls, and two confular armies were thus defeated, what other Captains, what Legions remained now to be fent for, to aid? As they were in this agony and fear, Sempronius the Conful came home: who with very great danger had passed through the enemies Cavalry, which was spread here and there all about, to fetch in booties; not able to flir, and therefore made femblance, as though they knew not of it. And so whiles the

Carthaginians were at reft, the army was by Scipio the Conful brought (in a ftill march) to Placentia: and from thence having croffed the Po, came to Cremona, because one Colony alone should

and more by venturous hardiness then good advice and hope, either to miss them uncipied, or to resist it he had hapned upon them, he got away. And after he had held the assembly to relet. If ction of the Confuls (the only thing above all other for that prefent most deired) he returned into his standing camp to winter in. Now there were created Consuls, Cn. Servilus, and Cn. Fl. minius the second time.

Howbeit the Romans were not in quiet within their wintering camp for the Numidian horse. men ranged about, and made excurñons into every quarter, and (those who troubled and empeat hed them, more then they) the Celtiberians and Portugals. Whereby all convoy of victuals from every part was stopped, but only that which came by the Po, in Keels and such like vessels. Neer to Placentia there was a merchants town, both fortified firongly, and also well turnified I with a good garrison : upon hope to force that castle or town, Annibal went with his horse and foot, lightly armed; and supposing that to carry the matter covertly, would avail much to the effecting of his purposed enterprise, he came upon them in the night; howbeithe was not so close and secret, but he was descried by the watch : who suddenly set up such an alarm, that it was heard as far as Placentia. Whereby, the Conful formewhat before day was there with his Cavalry, having commanded the Infantry to march on after, ranged in a square battailion. In the mean while the horsemen skirmished, wherein Annibal was hurt, and departed out of the skirmish, by which means the enemies were frighted, and the Castle and hold manfully defended. After few days that he had taken his eate, before he was well cured of his wound, he went forward to affault Vicumvic. That was a town also of mer handize (or mart town) and had been fortified by K the Romans in the Gauls war. Whereupon the people bordering there about on every fide, nied thirher to make repair, and much frequented the same: and even then for fear of rodes and excursions many of the Peasants and rural people retired themselves thither for refuge. This multitude (fuch as they were) upon the report of the valiant holding and defence of the fort by Tlacemia were encouraged, and took arms, and went for h to encounter Annibal. And in the midway they chanced to affront him and skirmish, in no battel array, but as they marched disorderly: whereas they were on the one fide, wone but a rude and confused fort; and on the other fide, both a Captain that might trust his fouldiers and fouldiers also that might reckon upon their Captain, there were to the number of 35000, discomitted and put to flight, even by a few of their enemies. The morrow after, they yeelded themselves and received a garrison within the wallstand L fo foon as upon commandment to give up their armor, they had obeyed and so done; presently a fignal was given unto the conquerors to fack and spoil the town, as if it had been forced by affault: where there was not forgotten and omitted any calamity what loever, that might afford in fuch a case memorable matter & sufficient argument for writers to record, So pitiful examples were practifed upon the poor filly wretches of all loofness and luft cruelty and inhuman pride and outrage. And there were the expeditions and enterprises of Annil al atchieved for this winter time.

After this the foundiers took repole, but no longer then the intollerable cold lasted: For immediatly upon the very first and doubtful tokens of spring; he departed from his wintring hold, and led his army into Tulcany purposing to adjoin unto him (either byforce or love) that nationalio, as well as the Gauls and Ligurians. But as he patied over Apenninum, there arose so terriblea M florm and tempelt, and furprised him, that it formounted well-neer the foul trouble and encombrance endured in the Alps. For the wind and rain together did beat and drive upon their very faces. At the first, for that either they were to lay away their armor, or else in striving and labouring to march on against the weather, and by the whirt-puffs of wind turned round about, and ready to beborndown, they flood ftill but when as now the violence and fury of the florm, flopped their breaths, suffered them not totake their wind at will, they were fain to turn their backs, and fit them down on the ground for a time. Then fee, the skie thundered amain, and made an hortible noise, and amid those terrible cracks redoubled, it lightned thick. Whereupon, they lost their hearing and feeing; and for fear, all of them became aftonied. At length it poured down and thereby the wind and florm encreased more forceably upon them. Whereupon they were driven N to this necessity, even to pitch their camp, even in that very place where they were so suddenly caught and overtaken by tempest. But that was to them the beginning of a new toil and travel: for neither could they spread and display ought, nor pitch any thing surely: neither would that which was pight down continue and abide the wind, which rent and tare, and broke every thing, and hurried it clean away. And within a while, the water that fell, and by reason of the wind was railed aloft, being congealed once upon the cold tops of the hills, turned into a kind of hailand fnow together, and came upon them with fuch a force, that leaving all things elle, the men were forced to lie along, groveling upon their faces, rather stifled and smothered, then covered with their hillings. Hereupon enfued a frost, to violent and outragious, that of that miserable and pitiful heap of men and beafts, that lay there along, there was not one for a good while could raile 0 and lift up himself when he would, by reason, that for stark cold their sinews were benummed, that they could hardly bend and bow their joints. Afterwards, at length, when with beilining and chafing their limbs, they gat some heat, and came again to themselves, and that here and there in some places they began to make fires; every one that had no means so to do, ran and fled to the fuctor and help of others. Thus for two days they remained there pinned up as if they had been besieged. Many a man and beast, and seven Elephants also of them, that remained after the battel at Trebia, were starved and perished.

A By occasion hereof, Annibal departed from Apenninus, back again toward Placenta: and when he had marched ten miles on his way, he fat him down and encamped. The morrow after he led against the enemy 1 2000 foot, and 5000, horse. Sempronus the Consultatio, being now returned from Rome, refused not battel : and the same day, the enemies were distant but three miles asunder. The morrow after they fought on each fide most fiercely and couragiously, and with variable event and fortune. At the first-on let, the Romans had the better hand, so far forth, as that not only in fight they overcame their enemies, but also after they had discomfitted them, and put them back, they chased them into their camp, and anon assailed the same. Annibal having ordained some few to defend the rampart and the gates, retired the rell thick and close together into the midli of B the camp, and commanded them to give ear and be intentive to the fignal, when he would have them iffue forth, Now was it the * ninth hour of the day, when the Roman Conful having toiled * Tiree of and wearied his fouldiers to no purpole, and feeing no hope to win the camp, founded the retreat. the clock af-Which to foon as Annibal heard and faw the fight withal to flack and wax cold, and the enemy ter noon, tetired back from the camp, prefently fallied forth himfelf with the whole firength of his Infantry, for he had tent out his horsemen both on the right hand and the left after the enemies. There had not been lightly a more fierce and cruel battel strucken, and more memorable, for the final mischief of both parts, if the day would have given them time to have fought longer. But the night parted

ting and charging one of another, was more eager then the flaughter bloody between them; and Cas the fight in manner was equal, so they parted with loss alike. For of each side there died above fix hundred footmen, and half as many horsemen. But the loss on the Romans side was greater than in proportion of the number, because certain of the degree and calling of Knights, and five Colonels, and three Captains of the Allies, were flain.

the fray, which was hotly begun with exceeding stomack and courage. Whereupon, the confron-

After this journey, Annibal went into the country of the Ligurians, and Sempronius to Luca. To welcome Annibal at his first coming into Liguria there were deli ered unto him two Roman Questors or Treasurers, Cn. Fulvius, and L. Lucretius who were intercepted by the Lightian ,& taken in a train of ambush, with two Coloners, and five others beindes, whole fathers by calling were as good as Senators fellows: and this was done, because he should assure himself the better, that the peace and amity contracted with them, would be faithfully kept and observed,

Whiles these things thus passed in ital Co. Sopowho was sent into pan with a fleet and army for sea and land; having set fail from the mouth of R'oda 15, and ompassed the mourtains Pyrenei, arrived at a place called Empor a: where he disbarked and landed his for es and redu ed unto the Roman Empire all the country, beginning at the Las et ans and fo from thence all the fea coast as far as to the river Iberus, partly by renewing their ancient leagues, and partly by deviling mens to contract new. Whereupon, there arose a great name of him for his clementy, whereby he prevailed not only with the States by the sea side but also amongs the inlander; and mountainers, even to the nations that were more fier e & favage: with whom he not only made peace, but also wrought them so, that they took arms in his quarrel; and there were levied from among them, certain frong cohorts and bands for to aid and fuccour him. Hanno, whom Annibal had Eleft for defence of that province, was not ignorant hereof: and therefore, before all was gone, and the country alienated, he thought good to meet with this mischief: and having pitched his camp in fight of the enemies, fet his men in ordinance of battel. The Roman Captain likewise refolved not to defer the fight; knowing that fo, he might beforced to encounter both with Hanno and Asarabal, and rather yet he defired to deal with them one after the other fingle, than at once with both. But this battel was not so much dangerous, Six thousand enemies were left behind flain, and two thousand taken priioners, together with those that were lest for the guard of the camp. For both the camp was forced and won, and also the General himself with certain guards was taken priloner. Moreover Stiffum, a town neer unto the camp, was won by affault : howbeit, the spoil and pillage of the town were matters of small worth and value; namely, the houshold stuff, and such pelf and trumpery of barbarous people, and certain poor base slaves. It was the camp that enriched the fouldiers: by reason that not only the army which was now vanquished, but that also which with Annibal served in Italy, and left behind them about Pyreneus, ali good things to speak of, that they set store by, because they would go lightly, and not be encumbred with carriages. Before any certain report of this overthrow came to Afdruba!, he had passed over Iberus with 8000, footmen, and 1000 horsemen, as purposing to make head against the Romans at their first coming: but when he heard how the sie'd was lost, and the camp withal, he turned his journey to the fea And not far from * Tarracon, he found the fouldiers of the Armado, * Tarragona, and the marriners besides, wandring and stragling over the fields (for usual it is, that happy succels should breed careless negligence) whereupon he sent out his horsemen every way, and with Ggreat flaughter and flight he chaled them to their ships: and not adventuring to make any longer stay thereabout, for sear to be surprised of Scipio, he retired backto the other side of Iberus. Scipio also upon the first report of these new enemies, having rallied his forces together in great haste, after he had slightly chastised a few Captains, and lest behind him a small garrison at Tarracon, returned with his fleet to Emporia, He had no fooner departed from thence, but Afdrubal was there in his place; and having induced and incited the State of the Ilergetes (who had given hostages to Scipio) for to revolt and rebel, even with their own youth wasted the territories of all those that continued faithful confederates to the Romans. Afterwards, when Scipio was roused once out of the place where he wintered, the enemy retired again, and quit all the country on that fide Iterus. Then Scipio having in hostile manner invaded the countries, abandoned and left by him that was the author and cause of their rebellion, and by that means the nation likewise of the Hergetes, after he had driven them all within Athanagia, which is their capital town, he laid fiege unto it round about, and within few days brought the whole feignory of the Ilergeres under under this obedience : and besides a greater number of hostages then before (which they were confirmed to deliver) he condemned them in a good round fum of money, From thence he went forward against the Auseranes, neer to Iberus, being associats also to the Carthaginians: and having beleaguered their City, he fore-layed and intercepted the Lacerans as they came by night to succour their neighbors, not far from the town, even as they were at the point! to enter in. There were flain of them 12000, and the rest being well-neer all disarmed, fled every way scattering here and there over the fields home to their houses. All the help and defence that they had who were within, was only the foul and cold winter weather, evermore naught and hurtfulto affailants that lie forth. The fiege lafted thirty days, during which time, feldom fell the now less then four foot deep, and so covered the pentiles and mantilets of the Romans, that when the enemies flung firefundry times thereupon that alone faved the fame & nothing elfe, *3750 pound upon condition to pay twenty talents of filver & fo Sopio returned to Tarracon, thereto winter, flerling, acBut that year, at Rome and about the City. were many fleatone and and the city. Also in the beatls market, an Ox of himself undriven, climbed up to the third lost or story of an house, and from then e being frighted with the fir and noise of the dwellers by, cast himself down, Moreover, there was feen in the welkin or element, the refemblance of a navy of thips; and the Temple of Lady * Spes, standing in the herb market, was smitten with lightning. Likewife at Lanuvium the spear of Juno shook and brandished of itself: and a Raven flew into Juno's Church, and lighted upon the very Shrine or Altar of Juno. In the territory of * Amiternum, in many places were teen men, as it were, in whitegarments, but only afar off; for as folk went neerer and neerer, they appeared not, and could not be met withal In Picenum it rained flones: 1 and at Cere the lots were found diminished; and in Gaul, a Wolfe drew forth a watchmanhis fword out of his scabbard, and carried it away. For other prodigious tokens, order was given to the Decemvirs to peruse the books of Sibylla. But for the raining of stones in Picenum, there was ordain a Novendial scaff for nine days: and for the explation of the other prodigies, the whole City in manner was occupied in their devotions. And now above all other things the City was folemnly purged, and greater beafts killed in facrifice in the honor of those gods, for whom they 1640.l.fler, were ordained, and a present of gold weighing * 40. pound, was carried unto Tung at Languium. And the dames and matrons of Rome erected a molten image of brafs for Juno in Aventinum: and at Care where the lots were diminished, was appointed a Lectistern, and a procession or supplication to Fortune in Algidam. At Rome also there was a Lectiliern solemnized to Juventa [the N goddels of youth and a folemn procession at the church of Hercules, Moreover, express commandment was given to all the people, to make procession and supplication at every Altar and Shrine of their gods. And to god Genius, they factificed five greater beafts. And C. Attilius Serranus the Pretor, was commanded to pronounce a folemn vow, in case the Common-weal continued in the same good estate, ten years, and decayed not. These portentous prodigies thus expland, and vows made according to Sibyls books, eased mens hearts mightily of their religious fear. Then one of the elect Confuls, to wit, Flaminius, to whom were allotted those Legions which wintered at Placentia, fent an Edict with Letters to the Conful, that the Army should bein camp at Ariminum, upon the * Ides of March, His purpose was, to enter into his Consulhip in the Province, remembring the old contentions and debates which he had with the Nobles, N first when he was a Tribun of the Commons, and afterwards when he was Conful, as well about the Consulfhip (of which, they would have deprived him) as also, about the triumph, which they denied him. Hated he was befides of the Senat, for the new Act or Law, which Q. Claudius (a Tribun of the Commons) had made, so prejudicial to the Senat; and only C. Flaminius) of all the Nobles, supported it and set it forward:namely, That no Senator, or father of a Senator, should have a Ship at Sea, bearing above * 300. Amphores: for that was thought sufficient to transport their commodities and fruits to Rome, rifing out of their Lands and livings. And as for all other gain by traffick, it was not befeeming a Nobleman and Senator. This matter having been debated with great contention caused the proposer of this law (Flaminius) to incur much evil will and difpleature with the Nobility, but it procured him the affection and love of the Commons, and in 0 process of time a second Consulship. Supposing therefore, that with iterating the Auspices, and putting him to take the prefages anew by the flight of birds, and by finding other delays, upon occasion of the Latine holy days, and one business or other belonging to the Consuls charge, they would detain and keep him back fill in the City; he fet a countenance, as though he would take a journey like a private person, and so departed secretly into the Province. Which things when it was once blazed abroad, made the Nobles who were afore maliciously bent against him, to be angry anew; and they gave out, that it was not the Senat only, that C. Flaminius warred

against, but the immortal Gods also. For he, who before time had been made Cos. without regard of taking Auspices, and having the approbation of the birds, when he was reclaimed and called both by God and man out of the field, obeied nor: and now, having a heavy confcience. furcharged with offences past, hath fled from the Capitol and the solemn nuncupation and making of vows, for that he would not upon the ordinary day of entring his Magistracy, visit the Temple of Jup. Opt. Max, nor (because he was odious to the Senat, and they likewise hated of him alone) fee them, and ask their advise and counsel; nor proclaim the Latin Holy-dayes, and celebrate to Jup. Latialis, the solemn yearly sacrifice upon the Alban Hill: nor yet, after he had entred into the Capitol by the lucky flight and token of birds, pronounce his vows there, and depart from 8 thence in his rich coat-armor toward the Province. They faid moreover, that he was flipt and floin eccetly away like a drudge that followeth the camp, without the enigns and ornaments of authority, without Sergeants and Officers, as if he had been banished, and so left his country, minding belike to enter his government more for the honor and dignity of Ariminum than of Rome, and to put upon him his purple robe of effate, embroidred with scarlet rather in an hostelry and common Inne; than in his own house. They all every one opined and judged that he should be recalled and brought back again peremptorily, yea, and be forced personally at home to perform all duties belonging to God and man, before that he went forth to the Province and to the army, About this embassage (for they thought meet to send Embassadors) went Q. Terentius, and M. Antifius: but they prevailed no more than in his former Consulship the letters missive had done, which were fent from the Senat. A few dayes after he entred his office, and as he was facrificing, the Cair or young Bullockbeing already flickt, got away from the hands of the facrificers, and spotted many of the standers by with bloud. But they that stood far off, not knowing what the matter was of that ftir, fled away, and ran to and fro: which of most men was judged a foretoken and prefage of some great affright and trouble. After this, when he had received the two legions of Sampronius the Conful of the year before, and other two, of C. Attilius the Pretor, he began to conduct his army into Tuscany by the way of Apenninum.

Nnibal came into Hetruria, after he had lost one of his eyes by occasion of continual watching in E A the marifhes, through which he marshed four dayes a id three nights without taking his retofe & fleep. C. Flaminius the Conful a rash and inconsider at man, went forth, contrary to the warrant and approbation of the Auspices, and cansed the stellad-ensigns to be digged out of the ground, when otherwise promutes of the expect, and engine mounted on Horsel ack, fellwith his head form a difrom his horse. His fortune was to be surprised in an ambish by Antibal, which he had laid for him neer the Like called Thiasymenus: where he and his army were defeated, and fell upon the edge of the sword. Six thousand Romans, who brake through and made an escape, notwithstanding the faithful prom se that Maharbal had made unto them; were by the fallhood of Annibal put in prison. When upon the news of this overthrow, there was great mourning and forrow at Rome, therefortuned two mothers to die for very joy, that beyondtheir hope and expectation, they recovered their fons, and saw them alive, whom they E supposed to have been flain in the field. Invegard of the forefuld defeat, there was vowed a sacred spring, according to the books of Sibylla. After this when Q Fabius Maximus the Dictator fent against Aunibal, would not come to a fee battel with him, for fear he should hazard in fight the souldiers lately terrified and danned with adverse overthrows, against an enemy lusty and proud of so many victories, and by making head, and opposing himself only against Annibal, empeached his attempts and enterprises: M. Minutus the General of his Horse, a man of a proud spirit and brain-sick humour, with charging the Diltator, and accusing him uniothe people for a fearful and comardly person, prevailed so much that by vertue of their power and authority, he was joyned in equal commission and command with the Dictator. By means whereof, the army and the forces were parted indifferently between them, and Minutius gave the enemy battel in a place of great disadvantage, whereupon his Legions were distressed & in great ha-G zard: but F. Maximus came in time to his rescue with his part of the army, and seved him out of the prefent danger. By occasion of which good turn he was overcome, and his stomack come down insonach, as he was content to som in campraith him, and faluted him by the name of Father: commanding all his own foul diers to do the same to their fellow souldiers under F. Maximus. Annihal after he had we fted and overrun Campain, chanced between the Town Cassimum, and the mountain Calicula to be inclosed and compassed about by Pabins; but her a device of sping lettle be vins of drie stick units one storm and setting them on the spin to stips and of an arther some strong the Romann; which kept the strengths of Calicula, and he he was a start of the Romann which kept the strengths of Calicula, and he he was a start of the Romann which he put the strengths of Calicula, and by that means gat through the passage of that forrest. havock and burned all the territory about forbare to touch the Land of Q. Fabius Maximus the Ditta- H tor, to the end that he might bring him into sufpition of treason to the State. After this when Emylius Paulus, and Terentius 1 arro were Confuls and Generals of the army, there was a battel fought with Annibal, to their exceeding loffe and mier overthrow, neer unto a village called Canna. As which field there were flain of Romans, 45000, logether with Paulus the Conful, and four core Senators, befide thirty other brave personages that had been Confuls or Pretors, or at leastwife Adiles of State. After this d feat, when the noble young Gentlemen of the City (for very defair of the State) were in counjelto abandon Italy, P. Cornelius Scipio (a Colonel, who afterwards was surnamed Affricanus) held bunaked foord over their heads, as they fat in confultation, and for are a great outh, that he would repute him te a mort al enemy that world not five a dier him and hereby effected thus much at their hands, that for a mort al enemy that world not five a dier him and hereby effected thus much at their hands, that by vertue of an oath, they oldiged them felves not to depart out of Italy and for fake their native country, This book containeth besides, the fright and lament aron made within the City, and the affairs and exploits archieved in Spain, with more happy success Opinia and Febonia, wo professed vestal Virginians convitted of Incift, and condemned. By reason of smal number of souldiers and serviceable men for the wars, there were 8000 flaves put in arms. The Captives taken prisoners in the wars, when they migh have been redeemed, were not ranformed for all that, A folemn meeting there was for Vatto his velcome home, with great thank giving, because he had not despaired of the Common-weat.

O W approached the spring, when Annibal removed out of his wintering holds, after he had assayed belore to pass over the Apennine, but in vain, by reason of the incokeable cold; where also he stayed in great sear and danger of his own person. By which time, the Gauls, who having rien up in arms on his ide, for hope of spoil and pillage, feeing now in flead of harrying and carrying away of booties ont of other mens Lands, that their own country was become the place of the war troubled and moiefied as we.l with the one smy as the other which abode there all winter turned their hatred and malice from the Romans back again upon Annibal 1 Infuch fort, as after he had been fundry times forelaid by the fecret trains of their Princes, and in danger to be murdred, he escaped only by the deceiptfulness and fallhood pradified among their own felves. For with what in conftant y and levity they had compired together, with the same they bewrayed one another, and detected the comparacy unto him. By mean whereof, as also by changing one while his apparrel, another while the bonet and attire of his head, by errour allo and mittaking, he avoided the peril, and faved himself. But so it was, that even this fear in which he flood, caused him to remove the sooner out of his wintering harbour, About the same time Cn. Serviling entred into his Confulship at Rome, on the I des of Marit where, after he had propounded to the Senat concerning the affairs of the Common weal, the hatred and malice which the LL, had conceived against C. Flaminius, was renewed afresh, For they faid, that they created two Confuls, and had out one. For that lawful government and asthority which Flaminim should have had, that auspice of Magistracy which was meet and due, hey ought to have carried with him from the City, from the publick and private habitations, after he had celebrated the Latin holy-dayes, and offred facrifice upon the mountain Albar, and made his folemn vows accordingly, within the Capitol. But fince for default herein, he departed from the City a private person, the Auspices of government could not follow and accompany him and being gone without them, he might not lawfully take the same anew in forrein soil. Now there were lundry strange prodigious tokens besides, reported from many places at once, which much encreased their sear: namely , that in Sieils certain souldiers javelins were on fire: and in Sadinia, a Horsemans walking staff, as he went the round, and visited the watch upon the wall, burned in his hand: That upon the firand and Sea shore, there were seen many light fires, soas all the coasts shone again withal: That two shields sweat blood: That there were some souldiers y fmitten dead with lightning: That the circle and body of the fun appeared in fight less incompais and eclipied: Alio. that there fell from the skye burning stones, at Prenesse: And at Asp there were feen in the Element , Palm or Date Trees: and the sun fighting with the moon: Moreover, at Capena two moons arole and shewed in the day time: that at Cere, the waters an mingled with blood: That the very fountain of Hercules yeelded and caft up water besponted with blood: That as folk reaped in Assium fields, certain bloody ears of corn light into their baskets: At Falerii the heaven feemed to cleave in funder and open, and to fhew as it were a great chink; and out of the place where it gaped, there shone a great light: That the lots of their own selves diminished, and one fell out of the pitcher, with this inscription, Mays brandishes and flur keth his fpear. And about the fame time or Rome the Statue of Mars (wet in the high way April 10 neer to the images of the wolves : and at Capsa the welkin feemed to be on fire, and the form of a moon to fall down in a rain or shower. After this, meneave belief also to prodigies offarks importance: namely, that fome mens goats, in flead of hair bare wooll: that a hen turned into cock, and a cock proved to be a hen. These things as folk reported, were declared abroad, and the authors brought into the Senat: where the Consul propounded before the LL, and required their advice, as touching matters of Religion. Whereupon, there passed a decree that these strange tokens, some should be purged and explated with greater facrifices, other with young suching

A and that for three dayes, there should be supplications at all the Shrines and Altars of the Gods. As for other matters, afterthat the Decemvirs had looked into their books, such provision was to be made, as the Gods in their veries should foretel to stand with their pleasure and contentment. So, by the advertisements and directions of the Decemvirs it was decreed as followeth: First, and foremost, that to Jupiter there should be made of gold a thunderbolt or form of lightning weighing * 50 pounds, and another of filver, presented unto June and Mineree, Item to June * 1800 listin. Regina there should be facrifice offred in the mount Aventine, and to Iano Helpita in Lanuvium, ofgreater bearts: Irem, that the dames of Rome, making a contribution (every one to their avility) of a lum of money, should offer an Oblation unto Iuno Regina and bring it into Aventine, and B there folemnife a Lectiflern: Item, that the very Libertin or enfranchised women elto, should according to their power, lay their money together and make a present for the goddens Feronia. These things accomplished, the Decemvirs ta rificed in the market place of Arden, and for that purpole killed greater beafts. Last of all, by direction out of the books of Sybilla, now in the month December, they celebrated a factifice at Rome in the Temple of Swarn: and commandment was given that a Lectitlern should be solemnized. (which bed and table the Senators theruselves spred and set our with all the surniture) and a publick scatt besides, in any hand: and throughout the City both by day and night were proclaimed the folemn Saturnaha: and order dirested, that the people should hold and observe that day, as holy and settival, for ever,

Whilesthe Conful was buffed at Rome in pacifying the Gods, and levying fouldiers, Annibal C (who was departed from his wintering fort, because the rumor ran that Flaminius the Consul was come as far as Aretium) albeit he faw another way more ready and commodious (though it were somewhat farther about) yet chose that which was the neerer through the marishes, whereas the River Arnus at the same time had overflowed his banks more than mually. As for the Spaniards, Affricans, and all his old beaten fouldiers (the very flower and strength of his army) he commanded to march formost together with all their baggage and carrages among them, to this end, that if they were forced any where to stay, they should not fail and want necessaries about them: the Gauls he appointed to follow next: and because he was defirous that those kind of people, should be in the middle ward, and the Horsemen likewise to go after them hindmost in the reregard, he charged Mago with the light Horsemen of the Numidians, to guard the army D and keep them close rogether in their march, but especially to have an eye to the Gauls, and keep them in, for fear left they for tediousness of travail, and weariness of long way (as they are a Nasion tender enough and not able to abide any hardness) should either slink away, or else stand fill. They of the vantguard; what way foever the guides led them and went afore; puffed through thick and thin, waded through great Rivers and deep quicklands; and albeit they were mired and in a manner overwhelmed and swallowed up of bogs and muddy quagmires, yet they followed fill their colours. But the Gauls, if their feet chanced, to flip, could not hold themselves, and when they were down, they were not able to arise out of the durty sloughs and holes: neither could any of them comfort his corps with courage, nor help his heart with hope of better. Some of them hardly haled their heavy hams, and drew with much adoe their lazie legs and lagging lims after them: others, whose hearts were done for tedious toil and travail, when they were once down, lay dying amongst the jades and other beasts, which also were conched along every where, Butthat which hurt and undid them most, was their want of sleep, for they had watched four dayes and three nights continually without a wink. Now when as the water had to covered and overspred every place, that they could find no drieground, to lay their wearied bodies on, they were fain to pile their packs one upon another in the waters, and to call themselves aloit upon them. All the way as they went, they might see the beasts and Horses lie every where on heaps overthrown and dead: which served them a while, instead of Couches for want of other means, who lought but only for some thing or other, that appeared above water to repose themfelves upon, for to take a nap. As for Annibal himself, (who had already an infirmity in his eyes, r which came first by the distemperature of the spring season, now hot and then cold) he was mounted upon an Elephant, the only Elephant that was left alive: this beaft bare him a good way above the water : but by reason that he had overwatched himself, and the moist nights besides together with the damp and mift of the foggy fens stuffed his head and filled him full of thewms, and because neither time nor place served for any cure and to take Physick, he lost one of his eyes

Thus after many a man loft, many a Ho fe piteoufly perified, when he was got out at length of their foul fens and miry marishes, in the first dry ground that he came unto, he pitched his camp: and was certified by his epials and vantcourriers whom he had fent out before, that the Roman army lay about the walls of Arctium. Then with great diligence and careful enquiry he endcavoured, to found the intent and the defigns of the Conful; to know the coafts and fire of the country; to hearken what wayes he travailed; to learn what forces he had; to be advertifed how he was stored and provided of victuals; and to understand all other things expedient for his purpose in such a case, and necessary to be known. The countrey was most fertile and miful, ssany one in all Italy, to wit, the goodly champian fields of Tufcany, lying between Fefale, and Agetium, plentiful in corn, abundant in cattel, and richly flored with all good things. The Coniul was front and proud, by reason of the former Consulting that he had born: little account hemade of the Majesty of Laws, and authority of Senators, and as small regard and reverence he had of the Gods themselves: which rathrels, as it cost him nought, but was ingrafted a in him by nature, to fortune had nonrished and mainteined the same with prosperous success in his affairs at home, and wars abroad; to as it appeared evidently, that I nie he respected neither God norman, and deigned not to take their countel and advice, he would go rathly to work and do all in haft, hand over hand, without dicretion. And to the end he might be more forward to plunge himself headlong into these his infirmities and imperfections, Annil al deviled to anger him, and to move his patience. Leaving the enemy therefore on his left hand, he put him. tell into the way to Fefula for to wall and spoil the country of Tuftary; and shewed to the Conful a far off, what foul work and havock he possibly could make, with fire and sword. Then Fleminius, who of himlest would not have refled and fate fill, in cafe Annibal had been quiet; feeing once the goods of his allies and triends, harried and driven away even before his eyes, and thinking it tended greatly to his shame and dishonor, that a Carthaginian should march thusat his pleasure, through the mids of Itair, and without any empeaching and controulement, to pass on forward, even to befrege and a flault the walls of Rome; when all others about him fitting in counfail, gave advice for profit and fafety, ruther than for shew and bravery; namely, to pauleawhile, and expect the coming of his Coileague, that they might with joynt armies, without heart, and with common accord of counfel, conduct and manage the war: and in the meantime, with the Cavairy, with Auxiliary or aid fouldiers lightly armed, reprets the enemy, and flayhim from spoiling so licentiously at his pleasure; in a great chase and choler he role up, and depaned out of the Councel, and prefently founded the march, and gave the fignal of battail : and withal, it "Nay we were best (quoth he) to remain and fit here still before the walls of Aretium : for this, be like, is our native countrey, and here is our place of habitation: as for Annibal, let him " cleape forth of our hands, and woft all Italy; let him spoil afore him, and over-run all with fire and fword, until hebe as far as Rome walls : and let not us, in any case once stir from hence, be-" fore that the Senators fend for C. Flaminius from Aretium, as fometimes they called Camillus from Ven. With the e and fuch like reproachful and taunting words, he commanded in all halt the flandards and enfignt to be plucked up, and called for his Florie. He was not fo foon mounted on his back, but the Hor'e fell presently, cast the Rider over and over with his his head forward; and there by Flaminius the Conful under foot. As they all, that attended about him, were arighted and troubled in mind, at this unlucky prefage and fore-token, in the very beginning of [his enterprise; word moreover was brought unto him, that one of the port-enfighs was not be to pull up his enign, do what he could, and putting his whole firength unto it. The Confultum ing to the messenger. What ? hast thou any letters besides (quoth he) from the Senat, to prohibit me for giving battail? go thy wayes and bid them dig up the enfign, with help of spade and martock if their hands be so benummed for fear, that they can not pluck it up: and with that began the army to march. The principal Leaders and Captains, besides that they agreed not, but gainfaid this courle, were much difmayed and terrified with this twofold prodigious fign: but the common fouldiers rejoyced and took great pleasure, to see this forward reis and animosity of their General: having an eye rather to the end of their hope, than to the cause which they had to hope 10. Now Annibal wasted in all manner of hostility that he could devise, the territories between the Town Cotons, and the lake Threfimenus, and all to whet the edge of the Confuls flomack, to chafe his hot bloud, and to provoke him for to be revenged, for the harms and wrongs done to his good friends and allies. And come already they were to certain places, naturally made as it were for an ambush, whereas the lake Thrafymenus lieth hard at the foot of the Hills of Cute ma: for there is between, but a very flraight and narrow passage, as if there had been left so much space of ground, only for that purpo'e, and nothing else. For if a mango but a little further, the plain lieth more open and groweth larger, and from thence the hills begin to arite aloft. Annibal in the open ground pitched his camp, for himself with his Africans only and the Spaniards to lodge in, and made abode. The Balcarians, and the other light armed fouldiers, he led about behind the Mountains: the Horsemen he placed at the very gullet of the streight passage, where s the little hills handlomely covered and hid them close; to the end that so soon as the Romans were entred in, when he had put forth his horsemen against the gullet of the streight, all might be enclosed within the lake and the Mountains. Flaminius being come to the lake the day before at the Sunsetting; the morrow after, before it was full day light, without discovering and cleering the coasts by any icours and espials sent out before, passed through the streights. After that his army began to be forcad and displayed more at large, as the plain opened wider, he elpied and perceived those enemies only which he had before his face: for the ambushes lay close hid den , both behind his back , and over his head. Annibal having once got the enemy (ashe would) enclosed thus within the lake and the Mountains, and environed with his forces, ga the fignal to them all for to charge: who came down every man the neerest way he could: and so much the more were the Romans affrighted and troubled with this sudden occurrent, byresfon that the mift which arole out of the lake, was fetled thicker in the plain, than upon the hills: whereby the Companies and Squadrons of their enemies coming out of many Vallies, were fee well enough one of another, and therefore more joyntly gave the charge all at once together. The Romans hearing the cry and shout which arole from all parts . before they could well dicern and fee, perceived themselves compassed all about and surprised, and were assailed both affront, and on their flanks, ere they could put themselves in battail-ray, as they ought, make

A their armonr and weapons ready, and draw their fwords. When all the tell were thus amazed, and at their wirs end, the Conful alone, for all this imminent danger, the wed himself nothing daunted or airaid, but fer in order the ranks and files which were shuffled and blended rogether, according as time and place would give him leave; and marshalleth his souldiers, (who turned every way as they heard the fundry and divers noises), and in the best manner he could devise, he comforted and encouraged them, willing them to stand to it, and fight like men, forthat there was now no means elie to escape. "All the vows and invocations upon the Gods for their help, would not ferve, but only it was mereforce and mere manhood mutt do the deed and they were "to make way by dint of tword, through the midft of their enemies battaillons; and the less men " feared, the lefs danger commonly betided them. Howbeit, by reason of the noise and hurlibur-B ly neither counsel nor command could be heard: and (of ar off were the fouldiers from knowing their own Enligns, their ranks and places, that scarcely their heart would serve them to take arms, and to buckle them, as they should, fitly for fight: in such fort, as some of them were surprised and born down laden rather with their harnes, then covered and defended therewith, And in fogreat a milt and darkuels, more use they had of cars than eyes; for at the grones of their wounded fellows, at the blows and frokes upon the bodies and armour refounding again, at the confused shouts and shrikes of hardy and fearful men one with another, they turned their faces, and cast their eyes every way. Some as they would have fled, light into the press of those that were fighting, and there were fet fast: some again as they returned for to fight, were born backward by companies that ran away. Afterwards, when they had affayed in vain every way to get forth, C and saw well, that on both sides and slanks the mountains and the lake; that assont and behind, the enemies battailons hemmed them in then they knew evidently there was no hope of life but in their right hand and force of arms. Then every manbecame a Captain, and encouraged himself to fight manfully: so as the battail began afresh, not in order by the Principes, Hastati, and Triarii, nor according to the accustomed manner, whereby the vanguard should fight before the main battail and the standards, and behind them the reregard, and that the fouldier should keep his ownlegion, his own cohort, band, and company; but at a venture, even as it hapned, so they went to it and buckled, pell mell: and as every mans heart served him, so he marshalled himself to fight, either before or behind. Their courage and animofity was so ardent, their spirits and minds to intentive to the battel, that being as there was, a terrible earthquake at the very inftant, D which overthrew and turned upfide down, a great part of many Cities in Iraly, turned afide the couries of great Rivers out of their channels, and dravethell fiteams againft the current, forcedthe Sea into fresh Rivers, yea, and overturned Mountains with mighty falls, and laid them flat; yet there was not a man who fought in that battail, that once heard or perceived it. The conflict lasted almost three hours. Sharp it was in every place; but about the Consul most cruel; and look in what pare foever he faw his men diffrested and in hazard, there courageously he aided them. By reason that the flower and bravest gallants sollowed him, and was himself for his own person goodly beseen in his rich armour, he both affilled the enemy most furiously, and alio defended his own citizens as valiantly; fo long, until a certain Insubrian, a man of arms (Dacarius was his name) one that knew his vilage well enough, This is (quoth he) to his coun-E try men the Conful that defeated our army, put to the fword our Legions, wasted our territories, and he that destroyed and sacked our City. Now will I offer him as a sacrifice out of hand to the ghosts and spirits of those our fellow citizens, who by his means have been piteously slain: and therewith setting spurs to his Horse, he rode through the thickest troop and presse of his enemies: and when he had first slain his Esquier outright (who opposed his body between, and tet himself against him, seeing him coming so surrously) he can the Conful quite through the body with his fance. And when he would rather than his life have difarmed and rifled him, the Triarii stept with their targuets over his corps, and so kept him off. Hereupon from hence first many began to flie; but anon, neither deep lake nor high mountain, could impeach and flop their fear ul flight: like blind men they ran and fought means to make escapes, were the lane never fo F narrow, were the Hills never to fleep and craggy, horse and man, man and armour, fell headlong one upon another. A number of them seeing no way else to escape, entred into the Lake by the first cages and shallow brists thereof, waded so far, and went up so high, that they lest their heads and shoulders onely above the water. Some there were, who unadvisedly (such was their fear) 1 fonghir to fave themselves by swimming. Which being an endless piece of work, and beyond all hope, their wind and breath failing them, they were either stifled and swallowed up of the gulfs; or after that with too much haft, they had over-laboured and toiled out themfelves, they did what they could to swim back again, and with much ado to recover the Land: and there, by the enemies Horsemen who had taken the water, were they killed every where, and cut in pieces. Sixthousand or thereabout, of the vanguard, who lustily brake through G the mids, mangre the heads of their enemies, unwitting of all that was done behind, escaped (afe our of the guller: and having seized the top of a little hill, there they stood, and might hear only the outcries of men, the rathing and ruftling found of their armor, but how the battel went of sped, neither could they know, nor yet discern for the thickness of the dark mist. But now, when they were come to some ods and one side went down and had the worse, by which time the heat of the fun had broken and dispatched the mist, and the bright day appeared; then through the clear light, the hills and dales shewed evidently the havock & overthrow that was made, and how the Roman army was fouly discomfitted and defeated. For fear therefore, that the enemy (having H delt ried and feen them a far off) should fend out against them the Cavalry, up they went with their Enfighs in all haft, and got them away with all speed possibly they could. The morrow after, when over and besides all other calamities, they were in danger of extream famine, and that Maharbal (who with all his power offlorie purised them by night, and overtook them) had given his faithful word and promile, that if they delivered up their armour, he would inffer them to depart in their fingle garments, they yeelded themselves. Which promise Annibal saw performed as truly, as all Carthaginians ule to do, and falle Carthaginian as he was, he clapt them all into prison, and hung irons upon them. This is that noble and famous battel fought at the Lake Thrasymeans, and of those few overthrows that the Romans had, the most memorable of all others, 15000 Romans were there flain in fight: 10000 were scattered: and lying [through fundry parts of Tulcany, gat to Rome. 1500 of the enemies loft their lives in the field. But many more of both fides afterwards died of their wounds. Others there be that report much murder and slaughter on both sides. For mine own part (besides that, I love not to write vain untruths, nor any thing without good warrant, and yet the humour of writers for themost part is too much given that way) I have followed for mine Author Fabius especially, who lived about the time of this war. Annibal having enlarged without ransome as many of his prisoners as were Latins, and put the Romans in freight ward, culled out from among the heaps of his enemies that lay one upon another, the dead bodies of his own men, and commanded they should be buried: and having with great care and diligence made search also, for the dead coms of Flaminius to inter it, he could never find it. At the first news in Rome of this overthrow, the people ran together in exceeding fear and trouble into the common place of Assemblies. The Wives and Dames of the City, went up and down to and fro in the freets, and enquired of whomfoever they met, what fuddain calamity this was, whereof the bruit went; and what was become of the army? And when as the multitude affembled thick (as it were) to a publick audience, turning to the Comitium and the Senat-Houle, and called upon the Maguitrats: at length fomewhat before the iun-let, Marcus Pomponius the Pretor came forth and faid, A great battel hath been fought, and we have loft the field (And albeit they heard of him no more than this of certainty, yet they filled one anothers ears with rumors, and caried home with them these news to wir, that the Consul was killed, and a great part of his army with him flain; that there were but a few left alive, and those either fled and scattered up I and down in Tuscany or else taken prisoners by the enemy. And look how many casualties & misfortunes follow the overthrow of an army, into to many cares and perplexities were the spirits and minds of all those plur ged, who had any kinsfolk that served under Flaminius the Cof, all the whiles they were ignorant, what was the fortune of their friends, And no man knew for certain, what he was to hope for or to fear. The morrow and certain dayes following there flood at the gates a fort of people and those were women more than men, waiting to see their friends themtelves or those that could tell tidings of them: and ever as they met with any they would flock about them, and be very inquintive: neither could they be plucked away from them of their acquaintance and knowledge before they had questioned everysparticular circumstance from point to point in order. There might a man have feen an alphabet of faces, in those that departed from w the messengers, according as the tidings was joyful or woful: there might a man have seen a number coming about them to accompany them as they returned to their houses, either rejoycing for their good hap, or comforting them for their misfortune and calamity. The women especially, as well in joy, as also in torrow, were in their extremities. One above the rest (as it is reported) flanding at the gate upon the fuddain fight or her fon alive & fafe fell down dead at his very feet, Another who had received an untrue report of her long death, as she sat mourning at home within her house in great forrow of heart to foon as ever she saw him coming into the house, for erceeding joy yeerded het last breath, and died. And for certain dayes the Pretors kept the Senators together in Councel from the fun-rifing to the fetting, confulting under whose conduct, and with what forces they might be able to withit and the puillan e of their victorious Carthaginians. But N before they were throughly rejolved of any determinat purpose and courseto be taken, suddamly. there are ived other news of a fecond lofs, namely, that 4000 horfmen under the leading of C.Controng the Propertor, lent from (, Servilies the Col, unto his Collegue, were inclosed by Annibal In Wateria. For this her they had taken their way, upon the news they heard of the battail at Thafimenus. The brute and rumor hereof hammered diversly in mens heads. Some, whose minds were pollefled already with grief of a greater calamity, thought the loss of that Cavalry but small, in comparison of the former defeat: Others effeemed that which hapned, not according to the importance of the thing it leif but like as it falleth out in the natural body of man, that if it be craft and weak every occasion be it never to small and light, is more offensive unto it and soonerfels than a greater cause and object in, a found and fireng conflitution even fo, when any crofs or ad-0 verfifty hapneth unto the politick body of a City or C.W. difeated (as it were) and fickly, weath not to meature as weight the lamp by the greatness of the accidents but according to the feeble and declared the feeble and de what foever, And therefore, the Giry, of Rome took her felf to the feveraign falve and approved remedy, which the had long defired, and yet not applied and nied of late, namely, to the nomination of a Dictator. A might be named; and by reason that Italy was so overspread and sorlated with the Punick for es. there might no courier be well dispatched, nor letters faiely sent unto him and for that the people had not authority of themselves to create a Dictator, they therefore elected a Pro-dictator(a thing that was never feen and practifed before that day) namely, Q. Fabius Maximus, and for his General of the Cavairy, M. Minutius Rufus. These had commission from the Senat, to fortity the walls and Towers of the City, to plant and beflow guards thereon, where they thought meet and to cur up and break down the bridges upon the great rivers: shewing hereby that fince they were not able to keep and defend Italy, they were now to fight for house and home and to guard the very City. after he had grievously wasted and spoiled the territory, he assaid to give assault to that City: but B from thence he had the repulse with the lots of many of his men. And gueffing by the firength of that one Colony (where he feed but badly in the attempt of it) how great and difficult the enterprile might be of affailing the City of Rome; he turned another way into the " Picene country, " Marca Antonot only abounding in plenty of all kind of corn and grain, but alto affording rich spoil and pillage: which the hungry and needy fouldiers for aged and caried away a greedily, beyond all meafire. And therefor certain dayes he kept a standing camp, and retreshed his souldiers, toiled as well with winter journies and boggy wayes as also in the late batter, which was more joyous and fortunate in the looie and parting, than light and easy in the conflict and fighting. Cn. Jervilius the other Con ul, having had some light skirmishes with the Gauls, and won from them one mean Town of small importance, after he was advertised once of the death of his Colleague and the defeat of the army learing even then what danger might betide the walls of his native country, left peradventure he should be absent in the hazard of the main chance, put himfelf in his journey toward the City of Rome. Q. Fabius Max, the Pro-dictator aforesaid the same day that heentred his office, aftembled the Senate, and began first with matters of religion, and concerning the Gods: and after he had laid open unto the LL, of the Senat, that the Conful Flaminius had laujted more in the neglect and contempt of Divine ceremonies, and the Auspices, than

n otherwise in rashness and for want of skill in seats of war; and that the Gods themselves were to be consulted about the purging and expiation of fins and offences, and what might appeale their wrath; gained and obtained this one point. That the Decemvirs were commanded to repair unto the books of Sibylla, (a thing not usually decreed: but when strange signs and prodigious wonders are reported) who having peruled the books of destinies made relation and informed the Scnators, first, That the vow made unto Mers for the good success of that war, was not performed with due complements, and therefore ought to be a accomplished anew, and in more ample manper : allo, that the great Games and Plaies should be vowed unto Jupiter, with Temples likewife to Venus Erycina, and to Mens. Moreover, that a folemn supplication and a Lectiflern should * The goddes be celebrated, and a facred Spring vowed, if the Gods granted them an happy end of war, and of Understan-

E the Common weal to remain in the same estate, wherein it stood before the war began. The ding-Senar gave order, that for a smuch as Fabius was to be emploied in the wars, M. Amplius the Pretor, should have in charge to see all the premisses performed with all good speed, according to the will and mind of the Colledge of the Bishops or Prelats. These Ordinances of the Senat being enacted, Lucius Cornelius Lentulus the Arch-prelate, with the advice of the whole Colledge of the Prelates, thought good and gave advice, that first above all other things the opinion and pleasure of the people (as touching the sacred spring) should be known, for that without the voyces and consent of the people it could not be vowed; And in this form of words was the bill propounded unto the people. Pleaseth it you, that this grace may pass and the thing done with your affent in this wife ? if the fine of the people of Rome and the Quirites for five years next enfuing, con-

Ftinue safely preserved in these wars, as I desire it should, then that the people of Rome, and Quirits perform an oblation and effi vowed and promised namely, in the war between the people of Rome and the Carthaginians: and in the wars with the Gaulson this fide the Alps: to wit, that the encrease which the spring shall reeld and afford out of sheep and swine, goats and kine, and all things that shall be prophane, be facrificed unto Jupitet, accounting from that day that the Senate and people [hall foordain: Item, that he which shall sacrifice, may do it when he will, and in what manner he will and in what fort so ever he shall savifice, that it may stand for good and rightful. If haply it die, that should be savisiced let it be counted prophane, or not as wick d. made accordingly, the supplication was proclaimed & in procession there went with their wives & children, not only the multitude of the City, but also of the country, so many as had their private H chate, any way depending upon the publick. The Lectiftern likewise was prepared and trimmed, and continued for three dayes: and the Decemvirs deputed for holy ceremonies had the ordering thereof. The facred beds were openly to be feen one for Jupiter and Juno, another for Neptune and Minerva: a third for Mars and Venus: a fourth for Apello and Diana: a fifth for Vulcan and Vifta: and a fixth for Mercury and Cores, Then were the Temples vowed: unto Venus Erycina, Q. Fabius Max, the Dictator, vowed one Temple. For fo it was delivered from out of the books of * The goddefs destinies that he should vow it, who had the soveraign rule in the City, and unto * Mens, Atilius tinderstan- the Preter vowed another. Thus when Church matters touching Religion were finished the Di-Ctator propounded concerning war and the State: namely, with what Legions and how many the Senat thought good to withstand the victorious enemy. And a decree passed, that he should re-1 ceive the army at the hands of Cn. Servilius the Col. and enrol befides of the citizens and allies. as many horimen & footmen as he thought convenient , and that he should do and order all things at his own differetion, for the good of the Common-weal, Fabius faid, That he would adjoin unto the army of Servil sa, two Legions more: which being levied by the General of the horiemen, he proclaimed that they should meet together upon a certain day at Tybur: and when he had published a proclamation, That who foever inhabited within any Towns or Cattles untenced, should depart into places of fafety; and that all should remove out of the villages of that country through which Annibal was to go (but first to fet on fire their houses, and spoil their corn, that he might find nothing there when he came the went himself forward by the high way or causey Flaminiato meet with the Conful and the army. And when he discovered them marching about Otriculum K by the river Tyberis, and law the Conful with his horiemencoming forward to him, he fent a Sergeant, to give warning to the Conful, for to come without his Lictors to the Dictator, who obered his commandment. And as their meeting together, represented an exceeding great shew of the Dictatorship unto citizens and allies both, who by reason of discontinuance so long time, had welneer forgotten that government: behold, there came letters from the City importing news, that certain ships of burden transporting victuals from Hostia into Spain for the army there, were by the navy of the Carthaginians boorded and taken about the found or haven of Coffa. Whereupon immediatly the Contul was commanded to go to Hoftin, to take up all shipping at Rome or at Hoffia, to furnish them with saylers, and man them with souldiers, and so to pursue the Armado of the enemies, and to keep the coafts of Italy. A mighty number of men was levied at Rome, The L Libertinsalfo, who had children, and were of lawful age to ferve, fware allegeance unto him. to be histrue fouldiers. Out of this army of citizens, as many as were under 35. years of age, were shippedi the rest were left behind tognard the City. The Dictator having received the Confus army at the hands of Fulvius Flaccus his Lieutenant; went through the Sabins Country, and arived at Tybur, whither he had commanded the new fouldiers to repair at a day. From thenceby crois wayes he returned into the high way or causey Latina, even to Preneste: from whence (having learched diligently by his espials, all the wayes) heled forward toward the enemy, purpoing in no place to hazard the fortune of battail, but upon necessity. The very first day that he encamped not far from Arpi, within the fight of his enemies; there was no ho with Annibal, but without further delay, he came forth into the field in battail array, bad him battail, and offied M fight. But feeing his enemies quiet, and no stirring in the camp, he fell to taunting and reviling them: faying, That now at length yet, the martial hearts of the Romans were daunted and tamed; and seeing they refused fight, they confessed plainly, and granted themselves inserior unto him in valor prowels, and glory: which faid, he retited into his camp. Howbeit, chafing and fretting fecretly in his mind for anger that he had to deal hereafter with a Captain far unlike to Flamining and Sempronius : and that the Romans now at last, being schooled and taught by their OWD harms, and so their great coft, had fought out and got a Captainto match Annibal : streightwayes he begin to fear the wisedom of the Dictator, and not his force: but having had as yet no tryal of his constant resolution, he fell to disquiet his mind, and to tempt him with often removirghis own tents, and wasting the fields of his allies even under his nose: one while he seemed N to march away apace out of all fight, another while he would of a fuddain ftay, and lie close in some by-place and corner, out of the way, to spie when he could take him in some plain and even ground. Brt Fabius led his army, and marched above on the higher grounds, a prety diftance off from the enemy lo as neither he would let him go clean and abandon him, nor yet encounter with him. He kept his fouldiers for the most part within the camp, save only when necessity otherwise constrained. For purveyance of forage and fewel, they went neither few in number, nor stragling afunder. The wards of Horsemen and those that were lightly armed, standing always in order of bartail, and ready prepared and furnished for suddain impressions and tumults, yealded both security to his own souldiers, and also danger to his enemies, as they ranged all abroad and foraged the Countrey. In this manner never was the main chance put to the venture all at once () of fortune: and the small tryals of eight scuffling and skirmishes (begun in safety and security, by reason of the recourse of rescue so neer) inured and heartned the souldiers, frighted with formet foils, and made them at length to diffrust less either their own valour, or fortune. But Annie bal was not more discontented and displeased, nor more ready to crosse and thwart these so wholiome policies and countels of his, as his own General of horimen: who wanted nothing elfe but soveraign command, to overturn headlong the Common-weal; a man in all his defignThe two and twentieth Book of T. A ments violent and halfy, and of tongue intemperate. And first secretly among some sew, but afterwards openly in the hearing of all men, he termed Fabrus, in flead of a stayed and fober man flow and dull: in itead of wary and heedful, timorous and tearful: attributing unto vertues the names of vices of neer fembiance: and having a fingular dexterity to debate his betters and fuperiours, exalted himself thereby: a cunning cast, of all others the worst, and yet hath mightily prevailed and sped too well in many that have used it. Annibel from Arpi passeth into Samniam, wasteth the country of Bengentum, winneth the City Telefin, and fill provoketh (of fet purpose) the Roman Captain, if haply he could incense him by to many indignities and losses of his allies, and to draw him to fight on even hand,

B Amongst a great number of Italian consederats and allies, whom Annibal had taken prisoners at Throfimenus and dismissed, there were three Campane horsemen, whom Annibal even then had tolled on, and allured with girs and fair promifes to win unto him the hearts of their country-men. These brought word unto him, that in case he would lead and bring his army into Campania, he should foon be Lord of Capaa. And albeit the thing in it self feemed greater than the quality of the perions that counfelled him thereto; and therefore flood in mammering, one while in good hope and affurance, another while in fear and dittrift: yet they pertivaded him at laft to remove out of Samaium into Compania. After he had admonished them very often, to fee that they made their word and promites good by deed, and commanded them withal to return unto him with some of their principal Citizens and Country-men, besent them away, C Himself gave commandment to his guide, to conduct him into the territory of * Casinum: being * S. Germano advised by those that were skilled and acquainted with the coults of those parts, that if he could gain aforehand that pase and forest, he might exclude the Romans from coming to reicue and fuccour their confederats. But the ambiguity of the name, and the Carchaginian language far differing from the Latine, cauled the guide to mittake Cufilinum for Cufinum: and to milling of his intended journey, he came down, through the Alifans, Calatiae, and Calene Countries, into the plain champian region of Stella. Where feeing all the coalls environed round about with Mountains and Rivers, he called the guide unto him, and demanded where he was: and when he answered, that he should that day lodge in Cassimum, then and not before, the error was found; and he knew that he was far out of his way, for that Cafinum was distant in another D Countrey far off. And after he had beaten the guide with rods, and hanged him up by the head, for an example to terrifie all others, he fortified himself within camp, and tent out Maharbal with the Horsemen into the Falern Country, to fetch in booties. So they wasted and spoiled as far as the waters of Sinuessa. Much harm did these Numidians, but the slight and fright of the people was iar greater. And yet not with lianding that great fear, when all was on a light fire as it were, and nothing but war, the Roman allies continued till firm in their faithful allegeance: and the reason was, because they were ruled under a just and moderat government, and neither refused, northought much to be subject unto their betters, the only bond of loyal fidelity. But so foon as he had pitched his camp by the River Valturnin, and that the most goodly and pleasant Pulturne. Country of all Italy was on fire, and the Villages every where burned and smoked again; whiles E Fabius led his power over the ridge of the Mountain Massicus, the sedition was like to have broken out again, and certain Captains of the mutiny began to be enkindled afreth. For there had been great quietness, and all was still for some few dayes; because seeing the army march father than their usual manner was, they supposed verily, that they made more speed and hastned, to fave Campania from being spoiled and wa'led. But when they were come to the formost edge and point of the Mountain Massicus, and that the enemies were within fight, burning the dwelling Houles of the Coloners and inhabitants of Sizues and likewise of the Falern Country, and all this while not one word of battail; "And are we come hither indeed quoth Minutius, to behold only and to fee, and feed our eyes with looking on our allies, confumed and walled "with fire and (word? and if we bash at nothing eife, can we for shame abide to see the Calamity p" of these Cirizens here, whom our fore-fathers planted in Size. Our forces must be put into arms, and brought down into the plain that man to man · may cope and buckle together. By adventuring boldin, by action and execution, hath the Roman " Empire grown to this height; and not by these conceits and devices, which fearful cowards K "term the wary policies of war. As Minutius spake these words in preaching wise, a number of Roman Cotonels and Horsemen came flocking about him. Yea, and these lusty and rash speeches of his, came even unto the ears of the footmen: So as, if it had lien in the voyces and election of the fouldiers, out of all question they seemed willing to prefer Minutius before their General Falim. But Falin again regarding alwayes with good eye his own men, no less than his enemies, carrying a resolute mind, invincible ever before of any other; albeit he was well ware, that not only within his own camp but also now at Rome, he heard ill for his temporizing and flow proceedings; yet drew he out the reft of the immer, and held on flifly the fame courle and purpole. never aftered his former manner: until that Annil al being clean disappointed of long defired battail bethought himself anon and looked about for some places of winter abode, considering, That L the country where now he was, rather yeelded plenty for the prefent, than store for long cominuance: as flanding upon Hortyards and Vineyards, and all things planted, rather for fruits of pleature and delight, than for necessity and profit. Intelligence hereof being given to Falian, by hisespials, for that he knew well enough, that Annib. I was to return through the same streights, by which he had entered the Falern countrey; he holdeth and keepeth the hill Calicula, with fufficient garrifons and likewife Cafilinam, a City divided by the river Vulturmus, and parteth the Falem and Campane countries afunder. Himfelf bringeth back his power through the fame hills, having fent out to differer and espie 400 Horsemen of consederats, under the conduct of L. Hostiliu Minicipus, who being one of the crue of those lusty youths, that oftentimes heard the General of the Horsemen giving our abroad brave words and stout speeches, at first went forward in manner M of an efpial, to differer and espie the enemy from a place of safety and security: and when as he taw the Numidians ranging all about the villages, and flew some of them also whom he took at a vantage, streight-wayes his mind wholly possessed and set upon sight; and so forgat the charge and direction of the Dictator, who had commanded him to go forward as warily and as closely as he possibly could, and to retire himself again before he came within fight of the enemies. The Numidians charging and recharging him afront one while, and flying from him another while drew him almost unto their very camp when as both horse and man were outwearied. From whence Cartiels, who then had the conduct and command of the Cavalry, fer out against him lustily upon the fpur, and before they came within dart. thort put the enemies to flight, and followed them continually in thate almost five miles, Mancinus seeing neither the enemy to give overpursute, nor any N hope to efface away, exhorted his men, and turned head upon them, overmatched as he waserery way: where he himself and his choicest Horsemen were beset round and slain: the other taking themselves again to slie for life, first came to Cales, and after through by-lanes and difficult wayes, to the Distator. That day, as hap was, Minutius had joyned himself to Fabius; having been afore fent to keep with altrong guard, the forrest or pale, which above Tarracina, groweth into a natrow gullet, and reacheth to the lea; for fear lest if the advenue of the way Appia, were without defence. A. n. b. I might enter and invade the country of Rome. When the Dictator and the General of Horsemen had joyned their forces together, they encamped upon the very high way, that Annibal was to passe with his army. Now were the enemies two miles off. The morrowaites, the Carthaginians took up with their army all the way between the one camp and the other. 0 When as the Romans were quarted even under their very trench and rampier, in a place no doubt of great advantage, yet for all that approached Annibal with his light Horsemen: and to provoke his enemies, fought by starts and fits, charging upon them, and retiring back again with great nimblenette. The Romans kept ftill their standing, embattailed as they were. The fight was cold and lingering to the mind and liking of the Dictator, rather than of Annibal: and where there were of the Romans part 200 flain, there dyed 800 of the enemies. Then feemed Annibal * Caffillazo. after, to be enclosed and thut up as it were and befreged within * Caffinum, feeing that Capus,

A Sannium, and many rick and mighty Nations confederate with the Romans, were on their backs to furnish them with flore of victuals. And Annibal contrary-wife was like to take up his wintering place, within the crags and rocks of Formis, amid the Sands of Linternam, and the mostly standing pools. Well will Annibal now that he was laid unto hardly, by the fame cunning fleights. that he had used himself. And therefore when as he could not escape away by Casilinum, and seeing that he must needs to the Mountains, and passe over the top of Callicula: for fear left that the Romans should fet upon his army enclosed in the vallies between the Mountains, he devised a stratagem, by way of a ridiculous illusion, to beguit the eye-fight of his enemies, and to fruitrate and deceive them of their expectation: by means whereof, he purposed in the beginning of the night, Beloiely and by flealth to gain the Mountains. The manner of his crafty device was this. He caufed to be gathered out of all the villages thereby many fire-brands ; then took he certain bavins or imall fagots of buth-wood, dry flicks, and fuch like trafh, and tyed them fait to the horns of the Oxen, whereof he had tame and wild, a great number that he drave before him amongst other prizes gotten out of the countrey : fo as he might make wel-neer two thousand head. To Afdrabal he gave in charge, that fo foon as it grew to be dark night, he should drive those Oxen with their horns let a fire toward the Mountains, and especially if he possible could, to the very streights and gullet which the enemy kept. It began no sooner to be dark, but Annibal with great filence diflodged and removed his camp, and the Oxen aforeisid were driven a good way before the entigns and the army. When they were come to the foot of the Mountains, and to the Areight passages, immediatly the signal or watch-word was given to fire the Oxes horns, and to chale them up against the Hill. The beasts, what with fear to fee a light fire blazing over their heads, and what with pain to feel the heat now come to the quick fielh and the roots of their horns, fell running up and down, as if they had been mad. By this their gadding thus all at oned every way, all the coppiles and iprings thereabout were let on a light fire, and feemed as if the whole woods and hills had burnt withat : the shaking of their heads also to and fro without stay, made the blaze greater, and gave thew and temblance of men running from one place to another. They who were appointed and fet to keep the passages of the streights, so soon as they law certain fires upon the tops of the Hills, and over their heads, supposing themselves to be entrapped and enclosed with fire on every fide, abandoned their hold, and kept their standing no longer: and whereas the flame shone most out, thinking that to be the fatelt way, they sped them this ther, even to the top and ridge of the Mountains. Then and there, they light upon certain of the Oxen wandring aftray from their company, and at first seeing them a far off, but not well discerning them, they imagined that they lpit fire, and breathed their blazing flames out of their mouths; and wondering at the ftrange fight, ftood ftill amized and aftonied. But when as afterwards they discovered the device, and found it out to be a subtile and decentul invention, proceeding from mans brain, they miltrulted withal fome fee et trains and ambuilt, and with an exceeding noise fled away as falt as ever they could, and flumbled upon the vantcurriers of their enemies, that were lightly armed. But they were affraid as well of the one tide as the other, to begin any skirmifts in the night seaton, and stayed until day light. In the mean while, Annibal having conducted his whole army through the threights, and killed some of his enemies in the very pale, encamped himself in the territory of Alifat. Fabine described this tumult well enough, but doubting tome privy ambuth, and abborting urrerly all night barrails, kept his men within the thrength of their rampiers. At the break of day there began a skirmish on the fide of the hills in which the Romans as being far more in number, had environed on every fide the light-armed fouldiers of the enemies, and foon defeated them, but that a band of Spaniards, fent back of purpole from Annibal, came to rescue them : who being better acquainted with the Mountains, and more light and mimble in running among the croggs and cliffs, by reason of well of the agility of body, as the fashion of their light harnesse; easily in that kind of skirmish, avoided and shifted from their enemy, heavily armed at all pieces, and used to fight upon the plain, and to stand firmly and keep their ground. Whereupon in the end they parted afunder one from the other, but nothing neer on even hand f for the Spaniards in a manner all, went eleer away inhurt, the Romans loft fome of their men; and to on both parts they returned to their camps, Fabrus likewise removed, and having bassed over the streights of the forest, encamped in an high ground, and strongly situate even over Alifai. Then Annibal making as though he would march through Sameium toward Rome, returned back, walting and spoiling the country as far as to the Paligns. And Fabius hovered still upon the Hill tops between the army of his enemies and the City of Rome; leading his holt fo. as neither he departed far, nor yet encountred and affeonted his enemy. Then Annibal turned his way, and departed from the Peligni, and retired himfelf into Applia, until he was come as far as Gerion, a City abandoned and forlorn of the inhabitants, by reason that a part of their wall was fallen down. decayed and ruined. The Dictator fortified his camp in the territory of Larinum. Now was he fent for home from thence to Rome, by occasion of certain solemn facrifices : whereupon, be conferred and dealt with the General of the Cavalry, not only by way of absolute commandment, but also with advice and perswalions, yea, and as one would say, by prayer and intreaty That he would truft more upon confiderate counsel, than doubtful fortune; and be directed "and guided rather by him , than follow the steps of Sempronne and Flaminian; and not "think there was nothing done and effected, and make no reckning of this, That the enemy had

" been dallied withal, and trifled out, mocked and deluded, almost all the summer long. Why, even # "Phylicians (quoth be) many times do more good to the lick body of the patient, by giving reft " and repose, than by firring and disquieting the humors therein. And no small matter is it, that "We are vanquished and overcome no more, at an enemies hands to often used to victory. And st after continual foils and overthrows, to have had reft, and a time of breathing. Having in this wife admonished the General of Horse aforehand (but all in vain) he took his way to Rome,

In the beginning of this summer, wherein their exploits were performed, war began also in Spain both by Sea and Land. Afarubal to that number of ships which he had received ready ng. ged and well appointed of his brother, joyned other ten. To Himileo he gave the charge of a fleet of forty fail : and fo, looling from Carthage , whiles his ships kept neer to Land, he conducted his army along the River upon the strand, ready to give battail to the enemy, howsoever he should hap to encounter him either by Land or Sca , Cn. Scipio after he had intelligence that the enemy was removed out of his wintering harbour, at the first had likewise the same intention and purpole, but afterwards doubting to encounter by Land, upon the exceeding great report that went of new aids, he embarked his best and most choice fondiers, and with a ficet of 35 fail, set forward to meet the enemy. And the fecond day after that he had looked from I aracene, he came to the rode diffant ten miles from the mouth of the River Iberus. From whence, two Punness of the Massilians were sent out afore, and brought word, that the Carringunan Armado todein the mouth of the River, and that the tents were pitched upon the bank. And therefore to the end that he might surprise them at unwares, and unlooking for them, with all the fearful terroura's once, that he could possibly, he weighed anchor, and set sail toward the enemy. In Spain there are many Towrs standing upon high grounds, which serve the inhabitants of the country in good flead, both as watch Towers to discover, and also as sconces to withit and Theeves and Rores, From whence the enemies thips were descryed first, and a fignal given to Afarubat: in such fort, as the tumult and trouble arole upon the Land , and in the camp, before any was feen on the Sta and amongst the ships: for as yet neither noise of oars, nor any ordinary fur else of marinen, was heard; nor yet the capes and promontories between suffered the fleet to be feen. Buthen, all on a fuddain, certain Horfemen fent from Afdrabal one after another, commanded the folldiers (who either wandred along the strand, or fate quiet within their pavilions, looking for nothing leffe than fight that day) prefently in all hafte to go aboore, and to arme, for that the Rol man fleet was not far from the haven. This commandment the Horfemen that were lent, gue every where. And within a while Afdrabal came in person with the whole army. All was on a hurry, and full of fundry alarms ; whiles both mariners and fouldiers, made haft to be shipped, rather like men that fled from Land, than went to fight. Scarce were they all embarked, when some of then loosed from the shoar, and plucked up Anchors, others cut the Anchor Cable, for that nothing should stay them : and all that they did, was with such haste, that whiles the fouldiers were occupied in making themselves ready to fight, the mariners were hindred in their bufinels: and whiles the mariners made ipeed; the fouldiers were kept from taking their armour, and firting themselves therewith. By which time Scipio was not only approached ner, but allo had marshalled and ordered his ships ready to fight, So as the Carthaginians were trong bled as well with the hurly burly and tumuit of their own people, as with the assault and but tel of their enemies. And having (to lay a truth) made an affay and proffer of fight, rather than begun any indeed, they turned away their fleet, and fled. And feeing, when they were oncept to flight (by reason they were parted asunder all abroad, and lay open to so many of their on mies, following them upon the poop all at once) that they were ready and easy to be bouged and pierced, they rowed on all hands to the shore. Some were fain to wade to Land, others leapted drye ground ; one fort armed, another fort unarmed ; and to escaped to their company, embatuled along the strand. Howbeit, in the very first encounter and onice, two Carthaginian hips were taken, and four funk. The Romans, abelethey law the enemies, mafters of the Land, and might behold them it and in battail array all along the River fide upon the banks, yet made thy all ftay, but chaled the featful fleet of their enemies ; and to as many thips, as either had not cracked, fplitted, and broken their items, with dashing upon the shore, or were not run a ground, and finck fait by their keels in the shelves, those they drew up, and warped into the deep, with opes faitned to their poops; and to of thirty they took five and twerty. And yet, the taking of there welfels was not the belt and goodlieft work of their victory: but this passed all, that wishood light skirmith they became L.L. of all the Sea along these coafts. And therefore arriving with * Pilla loyola. their whole navy before " Honofea, they landed their men, wonthe City by forcible affault, and it; shif from thence went forward toward Carthage. And after they had foraged and wanted the retritory about, at the last, they fired the very honies that joyned to the walls and gates of the "Gundama", City. From thence the Atmada laden now and charged with rich pillage, lailed as far as " Long of the case of "Atmada" or the cape of the Where they found great flore of Spare [to make Cables] provided and laid up there by fi disabilito ferve the navy : and when they had taken thereof atmuch as they needed, they make light fire of all the reift. Neither coafted the Roman fleet along the continent and main only, and feoured those parts which lay out into the Sea, but passed also unto the Isle* Ebajas: where the affinited hotly for two dayes space, the head City of the Island, with much ado, and sales

A and got a greater booty & pillage than they had out of the main, they retired themselves to their thips: and thither came Embashadors from the Islands Baleares unto Scipio, Craving peace, From thence he came back with the fleet, and returned into the hither part of the Province, whither rejorted unto him, the Embassadors of all the Nations that inhabit about Iberus, yea, and of many ailo from the fartheil part of all Spain. But of States, that absolutely came under the obedience of the people of Rome, doing fealty and homage unto them, and giving hostages for assurance of their abegeance there were above 120, Scipio therefore, taking himself throng enough in land forces, went on as far as to the chale of " Castulo, And Asdrutal retired himself into " Lustraria, near . C. st. na la the Oceaniea. Hereupon the rest of the summer was like to be quiet : and quiet had it been, for vera Bany thing that the Carthaginians did to the contrary, But, (over and besides the naturall diposition of all Spaniards unconstant, buse and evermore destrous of novelties and alterations. Mardomina a Nobleman, who before time had been the Lord and Prince of the Hergetes, feeing the Romans retired pack from the forrest, toward the sea-coast, stirred up the the people of his counirey, and invaded the peaceable Territories of the Romansafio, iates, for to spoil and walle the fame, Against whom there were sent from Scipio three thousand Romans, besides certain auxiliary fouldiers also, lightly armed; who in a right skirmish discomfitted his forces: (as being a power gathered in halte, and difordered flew many, took some prisoners, and disarmed the greater part of them. Nevertheless the rumour of this alarm caused Astrabal as he departed to the Ocean, to cross the river Iberus back again, for the refere and defence of his friends and Allies. The Car-C thaginians were encamped in the territory of the Hercaonians, and the Romans near the new Armida, when inddennews diverted the war another way. The Princes of the Celtiberians, who had fent the Embassadors of their country and hostages unto the Romans upon a messenger dispatched unto them from Scipio, arose up in arms, and entred the Province of the Carthaginians with a strong and putiliant army, won three towns by affault; and afterwards, in two battels which they fought with Afdrubal right variantly flew 1,000 enemies, and took 4000 priloners, and many muitary enigns they bare away.

Whiles Sp. in flood in these terms, P. Scipio came as L. Deputy into that Province, continuing flill his government after his Confulfhip expired, and was fent from the Senat with thirty thips of war, eight thousand souldiers, and great store of victuals. This great fleet, in regard of D many hulks and thips of burden which accompanied it, was kenned and discovered afar officies the great joy both of Romans, and also of their friends and associats, and astrived within the port and haven of Tarracon. Where the foundiers were disbarked, and Scipio joyned with his brother; and from that time forward they agreed together, and with one accord managed the war, And whiles the Carthaginians were amnied with the Celtiberian war they made no flay but paffed over Therus & iceing no enemy they marched on toward Sagantum; for that the bruit went, that the holtages of all Spain, delivered unto the custody of Annibal, were kept there in hold within the Cattle, but with a small guard about them. That was the only pledge which staid all the Cities of Spaine; whose minds were well affected and enclined to entertain league and society with the Romans, but they feared left if they should revolt, it would cost the lives of their E children. This bond which held Spain in awe, one man eased them of, by means of a device and practile more witty and inbtile than honest and loyal. There was at Saguntum, one Acedur a Nobleman of Spain; trufty and faithful aforetime unto the Carthaginians : but then (as the nature is for the most part of these Barbarians) as fortune altered her countenance, so changed he his allegeance. And supposing, that if he should the unto the enemies, without performing tome notable treaton and delivering into their hands one thing or other of great importance, he should be counted no better than a vile, base, and infamous creature, he cast about how he might wind himself into these new Allies, and win them by some good service, unto their best and greatest behoof. And confidering all the means that Fortune might bring within his compais to effect, he employed himself especially at the length, to set free and deliver those hostages; thinking that the only way to win and procure unto the Romans the amity of all the Princes and great men of Spain. But knowing assuredly, that without warrant from Boff ar the Contable of the Castle, the keepers of those hostages would do nothing, he setteth in hand and cunningly goeth to work with Boffar himlelf. Now lay Boffar in Camp without the City by the water fide, to impeach the Romans for entring the haven. Thither came Acedus to him withdrew him apart into afever place, and declared into him as a man ignorant, in what state things stood. Namely, "That it was fear and nothing elfe, that kept the Spaniards unro that day in obedience, because "the Romans were so far off: bur now the Romans were encamped on this side Iberus, as a sure "fortreis and place of reinge unto them; if they minded any innovation and change of State: "and therefore leeing they could not long be kept by feer. they were to be obliged and bound G "unio Annibal by some favour and good turn. When Bost or marvelled and demanded what sudden demerit this might be, and of so great consequence. "Mary (quoth he) send back "the holtages into their own Cities. An acceptable present that will be both particularly to "their parents, who are of greatest calling and reputation in their own countries, and allo ge-"Inerally to all the Cities and Nations, Every man (you know) is defirous to be truffed: and "for the most part, credit given frankly unto one, bindeth him surely to be most faithfull. The "ministery and charge of conducting the hostages home to their own houses, I will require to "have mine own felf, that I may farther a plot and device of my own, with mine own proper

"fervice and employment: and the thing which of it self in nature is acceptable, I will in what IN "can grace and commend the same, and make it more meritorious. Having thus perswaded the man being not altogether to wily as other Carthaginians naturally are he went by night lecretly as f.r as the Corps deguard of the enemies, and after he had met and talked with some Spaniards that were auxiliary fouldiers in the Camp and by them was brought before Scipio, he declared unto him his whole intent and defignment, and the caute of his coming. And after they had given and received faithful promise mutually between them, and agreed of time and place for the delivery of the hostages unto Scipio, he returned again to Sagumum. The day following he spent with Beff ir, in receiving Commission from him, for the execution of this matter. And thus being dilmited and having his dispatch, he purposed to go in the night, to the end that he might (for I footh) avoid the watch and wards of the enemies, the Romans: and at the hour appointed he raifed those who had the guard and custody of the children, and put himself on his way; and (simple manhe) as if he had been altogether ignorant of that which hapned, brought them within the compals of an Ambulhment, forelaid beforehand by his own wily and crafty device : and to were they brought into the Roman Camp. All other points befides, converning the rendring of the hoftages, according to the agreement and appointment with Boffar, were performed in the same order, as they should have passed, in case all had been done in the name of the Carthaginians, and to their behoof. But the Romans won much more thank, and gained greater favour thereby, than the Carthaginians could have attained in the like curtefie. For the Carthaginians (whom in their prosperous success the Spaniards had found by experience to be rigorous unto K them and proud) might have been supposed if they had done it now, to have been mollified and made more benign and gracious through adverse forcune and fear: but Scipio the Roman General, at his first coming, and unknown beforetime, began with a notable example and testimony of clemency and liberality. And Acedux besides reputed a wise and priseent man seemed not without great reason to have made exchange of his Allies and Friends. Whereupon they all dehred with one accord to revolt and prefently they had taken arms indeed and rebelled, but for the approach of winter which forced as well Romans as Carthaginians to betake themselves to their

These were the occurrents that fell out also in Spain, in the second summer of the Punick war: whiles in Italy the wife and wary delaies, the industrious temporizing of Fabius in the manner of L his warfate gave the Romans some respit and intermission of their soils and overthrows. Which as it wrought in Annibal no small trouble of mind and perplexity, to see that the Romans at the last had choien for their General, a man who managed war, by discourse and guidance of lound season & not by adventure of fickle fortune; so it was despised of his own Citizens, as wel those that were armed abroad, as gowned at home: & namely when during the ablence of the Dictator, there happed to be a field fought through the rashness of the Generall of the Cavairy, with more joyfull fuccess (to speak truly) than happy and fortunate. Two other things there were befides, that caused the Dictator to be worse thought of, and in great difgrace and obloquy. The one through the deceitful and wily policy of Annibal: who being enformed by certainfugitive Traitors (that fled from Rome unto him) which were the lands and possessions of the Digator; gave expres commandment when he had destroyed the country about, and made all even with theground, totorbear all kind of hostility there only, and to touch nothing of his, either by fire or fword: to the end it might be thought there had been some packing between him and Annibal; and that this was the hire and confideration agreed upon between them two. Theother atole from an action of his own: namely, about the exchange and coursing of certain prilos ners or captives: which peradventure at the first appearance might have seemed doubtful and sufpicious (because therein he staid not for to have the Commission and approbation of the Senst) but in the end and up-shot it turned no doubt, to his singular praise and commendation, Inthat enterchange abovelaid, it was capitulate between both Generals, of Romans and Carthaginians, like as it had been afore in the first Punick war). That whether fide received more Captive N than they gave again, should yield for every one souldier * two pound and a half of filver. When it fell out therefore that the Roman Dictator Fabius, had received more prisoners by 247 than Annib.l, and the paiment of the filver for them due; after much debate in the Senat house, (because he had not direction therein from the LL.) was delaied, and no order taken therefore he fent his son to Rome of purpose, to make sale of his lands, which had not been eudammaged by Annibal: and so to his own cost, and out of his private purse, dis harged a publike debt.

Annibat: and to to this own hand to the Annibat now lay in leaguer before the walls of Gerien, a City which he had won and fet of fire, and referved a few houses standing, to serve him instead of barns and garners for his grain, from thence he sent out two third parts of his forces to purvey corn: and remained himses in guard with one third part, ready in arms, (but lightly appointed and without any bag and bag gage) in a meet and convenient place: both for desence of the Camp, and also for discovery all the roasts about that no assault were made upon the purveyors. The Roman Army lay sha in the Territory of Lawingma, and the Captain General was Minatius, Commander of the both men. because the Dictator (as is abovesial) was gone to the City of Rome. But whereas the had usually encanned before, upon some high hill and front place of security; now they began to draw down into the vale and the plain ground, and to devise trasty means and state gems beyond the natural reach of the Commander himself; namely, how they might still either the control of the commander himself; namely, how they might still either the control of the commander himself; namely, how they might still either the control of the commander himself; namely, how they might still either the control of the commander himself; namely, how they might still either the control of the commander himself; namely, how they might still either the control of the commander himself; namely, how they might still the control of the commander himself; namely, how they might still the control of the control of the commander himself; namely, how they might still the control of the cont

A either the purveyors as they stragled about in the country, or let upon the Camp of their enemies. left with a small power and guard to defend it. Annibal was not ignorant, that together with the General, the whole manner and conduct of their warfare was changed : and that the enemy would fight rather more rashly and hastily, than wisely and warily. And himself (who would have thought it, confidering the enemy was approached nearer) fent out a third part on'y o. his touldiers to provide corn and forrage, and kept the other twain with him in the Camp: he removed also his tents nearer to the Romans, almost two miles off from Gerion, to a little hill within the fight of the enemies, to the end they might know he was minded and ready to refeue and defend the purveyors, if haply they should be charged upon. Then espied Annel alanother hill pearer, and B standing even over the very Camp of the Romans. For the gaining whereof, (seeing that if he should have gone by day time openly, he had been no doubt prevented by the enemies, who would have leized it first, by reason it was nearer unto them) he sent certain Numidians by night, who surprised it and kept it. But the Romans making little or no account of their small number, drave them the morrow after from thence, and thither removed their own tents: to as then there was but a little distance between one Camp and the other, and the same, in a manner wholly takenup and replenished with Romans and withall, at the same time, the horiemen of the Romans with certain footmen lightly armed were fent ont at a pottern gate of the Camp (which opened not upon the Carthaginians) against the forragers, whom they discomfitted, put to flight, and flew a great number of them. Neither durst Annibal issue forth to skirmish; for, having so few about him, he was hardly able to defend his Camp, in case it had been assaulted. So he was driven now to use the policy and shifts of Fabius, (for part of his forces were away) and managed his war, fitting still as it were, and keeping the enemy at a bay and at staves end: and so retired with his fouldiers to the former Camp, under the walls of Gerion. Some write, that there was a field pitched, and a fet battel fought with banners displaied, wherein Annibal at the first encounter was discomfitted and chased to his Camp: but from thence they issued forth who were within and fo the sear turned upon the Romans, who on a sudden were put to the worst but by the coming of Numerius Decimus (a Samnit) with succounthe fight was reenforced and senewed. This man, not only nobly descended, but also of great power and wealth, as well in Bovianum his native Country, where he was born, as throughout all Samnium (by order and commandment from the Dictator) came with a power of 8000 foot, and 200 horse, toward the Camp: and being espeed by Annibal on the backfide, gave both parties good hope of fresh and new aid. But when the .oi.e went, that Fabius at the same time was coming also from Rome, Annibal for fear of being entrapped within some Ambush, retired back with his ownmen, and the Romans made persuit after him; and with the help of Numerius the Samnit, won in one day by force two fortrefles. So there were 6000 enemies flain, and 5000 Romans. And yet as equal in a manner as the iols was of both parts, the rumour ran to Rome of a brave victory, with letters also in post from the General of hortemen, full of folly and vanity, Much arguing there was and debate about these matters, both in Senate, and before the people fundry times. And when all the City befides was joyous, and the Dictator (alone) gave no credit either to the bruit that was blazed, or the letters ; faying withall, That if all were true, yet he feared more the fawning than frowning of fortune: then M. Metelluca Tribune of the Commons stepped forth and said, "That this above all was not to be suffe- The speech of "red: that the Dictator, not only while he lay in Camp, opposed himself against all goodness, and Metellus : "flained all valorous services but also being absent from thence, crossed and disgraced that which gainst Falius. " was well done and worthily atchieved: and that he, of purpose, drew the war in length and pro-"longed the time to the end he might continue the longer in government, and be the man alone "to command all, both in the City and abroad in the Army : for one of the Confuls was flain in " battel, the other under a pretence & colour of purluing the Carthaginian fleet, was fent out of the "way, far enough off from Italy: as for the two Prators, they were employed both in Sicily and "Sardinia: and yet neither of those two Provinces had any need of a L. Deputy there. And M. " Minutius Generall of the horsemen, was kept prisoner as it were, and might neither see enemy, "nor do any martial exploit, And hereupon it is (quoth he) that not only Samnium (whereof the "possession was surrended unto the Carthaginians, as if it were a territory lying beyond Iberns) "but the Campane, Calene, and Falern territories were utterly overrun and wasted, whiles the "Dictator abode still at Casilinum, and with the legions of the people of Rom defended his own "lands & possessions only. And when the Army and General of the Cavalry were desirous of bat-"tel they were kept back enclosed in a manner within the compass of the Camp & their weapons "taken from them, as if they had been captive enemies: & at length when the Dictator was once "departed from them, they issued forth of the Camp, like men delivered from siege, & so discom-"fited & put to flight their enemies. In confideration of all these things, (he said) if the Commons G of Rome were of that courage, as sometimes they had been he would boldly have put up a bil for to deprive C. Fabius of his government. But now for this time, he would propound a more in-

"different & reasonable law, by vertue wherof the Commander of horsemen may be made equal l

"with the Dictator in authority and power, Yet so, as that Q. Fabius might not be sent unto the

"Army, before that he had substituted & ordained another Cos, in the room of C. Flaminius. The

and extolled the valour of the enemy; or rehearfed & reckoned up the losses and foils received for H two years space, through the rashnels and unskilfulnels of the Commanders : and said withall, that the General of the horsemen was to answer and give account for fighting against his edict and express commandment, "Moreover, (quoth he) if I were in place of foveraign rule and government, " & to do all according as I thought good, I would effect and bring to pais, within few daies, that "men should know, that a good warrior was to make small reckning of fortune: but wisdom, wit. " and counsel were to guid and direct all, And for mine own part, I deem it a great honor & glory "to have preserved an army in a time of trouble and danger from shame and ignominy, thanto have flain many thousands of enemies. After he had made these and such like speeches & reasons in vain, and created for Cof. M. Attilius Regulus: for that he would not be present to debate the I question concerning the right and authority of his own government, he departed by night leason toward the army; even the very day before that the forelaid law should be propounded. The morning ame, and the commons were affembled to an audience: wherein men feemed rather fecretly in their hearts to malice the Dictator, & to affect and tavour the General of the horsemen, than durft come forth and be seen to perswade and set forward that which pleased them all in common, And not with flanding the bil was exceedingly well liked of yet there wanted one togive fome credit and authority thereunto, At length, one stepped forth to set it on foot, namely, C. Terentius Varro, who the year before had been Prator, a man not only of obscure degree by calling, but also of vile & base parentage descended His father was (as they say) a Butcher, who kept shop and fold meat himself, and trained up his fon as his apprentice in the same mechanical and service K occupation. This Varro being a young man, and well left by his father (who was grown tich, and gained greatly by his trade) gave his mind and conceived some hope to live more gentlemanlike and took a great liking to the common place, and pleading at the bar: exercising himself in entertaining causes of base persons, against the estart and name of honest Citizens and of good reputation by means whereof he grew to be known among the people, and afterwards was advanced to place of worship and honou. And having been Treasurer of the City and born both Ædileships, as well that of the Chair, as the other of the Commons: and at length gone through one Pratorship, he aspired now higher, in hope to be Consul: and full crastily waited his time, and sought to wind himself within the favor of the people by means of the ill opinion and hard conceit they had of the Dictator: & thus he alone went away with all the affectionate love of the Commons, I All men that were either at Rome, or in the Army, both good and bad, in general (excepting the Dictator himself)received and admitted that bill as made to his disgrace and shameful reproach, But he with the very same gravity and contancy of heart, endured these injurious course & dealing of the people raging against him, wherewith he had born his adversaries slandering & charging him before the multitude: and having received in the way as he journed, letters importing the decree of the Senat for dividing his authority equally with the General of the horsemen, and being affured that not withstanding his commission were parted and communicated with another, yet hisskill and sufficiency of conduct and command, remained ftill with himselfswith a mindinvincible as well against Citizens as enemies, he returned to the army. But Minutius, who before that time was hardly to be endured, both for his fortunare fuccels and also for the favour of the M common fort now verily beyond all mensure and bounds of modesty, vaunted and gloried, in that had conquered & got the mastery over Fabius as well as over Annibal." That Fabius (1 fay) who "in time of diffress and calamity, was the only warrior and Captain that could be found out to " match Annilal: that the superior Magistrate was by the consent & approbation of the people, (a thing ne cr to be found in any record of Chronicles) made but even equal with the infer-"or; to wir the Dictator with the General of horiemen: and in that City, wherein the Comman-"ders of the Cavalry were wont to quake and tremble at the rods and axes of the Dictator, So confpicuous and evident in theeies of the world, was his felicity and prowefs above all others. And therefore minded was he tofollow his own fortune, and to take his time: in case the Dietaes tor fill continued ingring in floth and idleness, condemned in the judgment both of God and N er man. Wherupon the very first day that he & Fabius were met together he said that they weresbove all things to determine & fet down in what fort they might order this their equal authority of government. He for his part thought it best, that each other day (or if longer time between were supposed better) they should one after the other alternatively have the full and whole command of all for the time in their several turns: that if any occasion of fighting a battel were presented, they might be able to countervail the enemy, not only in counsel, but also in power and strength. Q. Fabius liked not of this supposing thet whatsoever lay in the hands and disposition of his raft col que must needs be subject unto the arbitrement of Fortune: Saying moreover unto him." That he was indeed to impart unto him government and rule but not wholly to depart "rherefro, and shut him elf out, And therefore he would never willingly fail, but (to his power)0 "manage by countel and discretion one part or other: neither would he divide with him either "time or daies, but the forces and armies: that Minatius might have one moyty, and himself ano-"ther & fince he might not preserve all by his own counsel & policy, yet he would endeavour (10 Gfar as he could to fave somewhat. And so much he prevailed that they parted the Legions between them, as the manner of the Confuls was. The first and fourth fell to Minuteus, the second and third to Fabius. In like manner they divided the horsemen number for number, and the auxiliary fouldiers of Allies and Latines. The Generall of the horsemen would needs likewise that they should be encamped aiunder.

Annibal conceived hereupon a two-fold joy, (for he was not ignorant of all that was done among the enemies, partly by intelligence given him from thence by fugitives, and partly by means of his own elcouts and ipies) for he made this reckoning both that he should deal weitenough with the lavish rashness of Minutius, and handle him in his kind; and also that the poudent policy of Fabius was abridged and diminished by the one half. Now there was a little hill between the Camp of Minutius and the Carthaginians: and no doubt there was, but that he who could gain it aforehand should have the vantage of the enemy, in regard of the ground. That hill Annibal was not to defirous to get without skirmish, (& yet it had been a matter of good importance) as willing thereby to give fome occasion of fighting and scuffling with Minitius, whom he wist very well to be alwaies forward enough to encounter him and make resistance. The plain all between, seemed at the first fight nothing commodious nor good for men that would lay an ambushment, because it was neither over-grown with any woods, nor yet in any part roughly over-ipread and covered to much as with briers and brambles. But in very deed the ground was naturally made for to cover and hide an Ambuscado: and the rather, because in so naked and bare a valley none would have imagined and suspected any deceitful trains, and forelaying of wait. And yet there were in divers nooks and corners thereof certain hollow rocks and caves, and fome of them of fufficient capacity to receive 200 armed men. In these lurking holes there were bestowed 5000 of horsemen and footmen one with another, some in one place, some in another, according as they might commodiously lie there closely hidden. And yet, lest that the stirring of c any one that might chance to go forth unadvisedly, or the glittering of armour, should be wray the trains in so open a valley, Annibal by sending out at the break of day some sew for to seize the aforesaid hill, withdrew the eyes of his enemies another way. These at the first view were despited of the Romans for their small number, and every man was defirous to be doing with them, and their fingers itched for to fet the enemies back, and drive them from thence. The General himself Minutius, as sool-hardy and forward as he that was most, sounded the alarm, and commanded to go to the winning of the place, braving and threatning of the enemies full vainly. First, he fent forth his light armed men to skirmish, but afterwards, the Cornets of horsemen, set close and jointly together in array: and at the last, seeing the enemies seconded with new fuccours and supplies he advanced forward himself with his Legions in order of battel, n And Annibal, wherefoever he perceived his mento be diffressed, made out continual fresh aides one after another, both of horse and soot, ever as the fight encreased and grew hotter: so as now he had his full army in field, and they maintained battel on both fides with all their power and main forces. First, the light armed Romans, not withstanding the disadvantage of the ground, defirous to get up against the hill, (possessed aforehand of the enemy) were put back, and beaten down again: infomuch as in their revire, they put the horsemen in sear that followed hard upon them, and fled for refuge to the Enfigns of the Infantry. The main battell of the Legionary foormen, among all the reft that were affrighted, only remained without fear, undaunted; and feemed in a plain, set, and downright field without ambush, likely enough to have held their own, and in no respect to have been over-matched; so couragious they were, and had taken such heart upon their late victory, some sew daies before. But the enemies starting suddenly out of their Ambuscadoes, to troubled, disordered, and terrified them, flanking them on both sides and charging withall behind, that neither their heart served any of them to fight, nor their hope remained to fly and escape away. Then Fabius hearing the first cry, and knowing thereby that they were ingreat fear, and feeing befides a far off their battell disordered and in difarray, "Ithought "even as much (quoth he) and no sooner than I feared, it is fallen out: Fortune I see well, hath "over-raught fool-hardiness and taken it tardy. The man, for footh, that must needs be made e-"quall with Fabius in government, feeth by this time, that Annibal is his good Mafter, & his be-"ter by ods inprowes and fortune: but we shall find out some other time to chide and to be an-"gry. Come on now, forth with your standards and entigns, let us wrest from our enemies hands F" the victory and wring from our Citizens mouths confession of their errour and trespals. Now when fome of them were flain, and others looked about which way to make escape and flie: Fabius with his forces shewed himself, as sent down from heaven to rescue them. And before he came to lance one javelin, or began to joyn battelland fight one stroke, he not only staid his fellows from running away, but also his enemies from further heat of fight. As many of the Romans as were disbanded and scattered afunder all abroad, repaired again speedily from all parts, and rallied themselves to the entire battell: the rest who by whole troops had turned their backs, made head again upon the enemy: and one while giving ground and retiring by little and little, another while flanding in a ring and round together flediaft, kept this order by turns: fo as now, both they that were discomfited, and those that were unfoiled became reduced into one body G of a battell, and advanced their enfigns against the enemy. By which time aincibal sounded the retreat, and openly confessed and said, that as he had vanquished Minutine, so he was toiled and overcome of Fabius. Thus when the more part of the day was ipent with variable fortune, and all retired again to their Camps, Minutius called together his fouldiers, and spake unto them after this manner: "I have oftentimes heard it spoken (my good sourdiers) that he is the bestman "and most sufficient, who knoweth himself what is best to do: next to him is he esteemed. that "will be ruled and directed by fage advice & counsel but he that neither hath the skill to advise an-"other nor the grace to be advised by another, is simply of the worst nature, & good for nothing.

"Since that we therefore are not so happy as to attain unto the highest degree of wit, and per-H "fection of nature, let us content our felves with the second place, and keep a mean between: " and whiles we learn to rule, let us fettle our felves and resolve to obey him that is wifer than "our selves. Having thus faid, he gave commandment to pack up bag and baggage, and to dislodge and as they marched in good array toward the Camp of the Dictator, they firm k both him and also all about him into a won-I der and admiration, And having pitched their enigns before the Tribinal: then Minutes the General of the horse went forth before the rest: and after he had greeted Fabius himself as his Father. and the whole Army likewise fainted those about Fabius, by the name of Patrons: "To my pa-"rents(quoth he) O Dictator, unto whom I have made you equall inname only (as much as my congue will give me leave) am bound and beholden for my own life only and no more: but to or you I am indebted for faving both my live, and all these here. The Act therefore and ordinance of the Commons which hath been a clog and burden to me rather than an honour, here of my "felf I renounce, tevoke and abolish and (that which I pray God may prove to the good both of you and me, of mine army and yours, as well that which is preferred, as that which is the pre-"ferver) lo I submit and surrender again my self under your command and government, together I " with these ensigns and legions thereto belonging; beseeching you to pardon me, and to enterci tain me in the room of the General of the Cavalry, and those here with me, every man in his former place. Then interchangeably they gave their hands one to another: and the fouldiers (after the affembly dismissed) were curteoutly in ited, and friendly entertained, as well by them that were unknown unto them as of their as quantance, and so the day, dolorous, heavy, and almost dismall and accursed, turned to be joyful and testival.

So foon as tidings came to Rome of these occurrents, and the same confirmed as well by the letters of the Generals themselves, as also by the common voice of souldiers from both Armies, every man, the best he could, praised and extoled Maximus up to the sky i whose honour and reputation was as great in the opinion of Annibal and the Carthaginians, for then and never before, L they found, that they had to deal and war in Italy, and with Romans. As for the two years space before, they fet to light both by Roman Captains and fouldiers, that they could be hardly perlwaded that they warred with that Nation, whereof there went so great a fame, and of whom their forefathers had reported such wonders and terrible things. They say also, that Annibal as hereturned out of the field, gave out these words, " That the cloud which setled on the hill tops, ho-

" vered fo long in the wind that it proved a tempessious storm in the end.

Whiles these things were doing in Italy, Cn. Servelius Gemens the Conful, having failed about the coasts of Sardinia and Cornea with his fleer, and received hostages both of the one Island the other passed over into Affrick: and before that he landed in the continent and firm land, he wasted the Island * Menina, and having received * ten talents of silver of the inhabitants thereabout, for fearlest their Territory also should be consumed with fire, and spoiled as well as the rest; he came to Affrick, and there set his forces ashore. From thence he led his fouldiers and marriners likewise one with another disbanded and out of orders as if they were to rob and spoil fome defart Islands, unpeopled and void of Inhabitants. Whereupon they fell unadvisedly into an ambush, and being unskilfull of the country, and therewith but few and scattered, they were soon encloted among many, and with much flaughter and shameful flight were driven and beaten back to their ships. The fleet thus having lost a thousand men, and one Treasurer of the Army among them, called Sempronius Blasus, loosed in great haste from the shore (which now was overspread by enemies) and held their course for Sicily, and at * Lilybaum was set over and delivered to T.O. tacilius the Prator for to be brought back again to Rome, by P. Sura his Lieutenant, Cn. Servilus N himself journeyed through Sicily by land, and crossed the narrow seas into Italy: for both he and his Collegue M. Attilius were fent for by the letters of Fabius, to receive the Army at his hands, now that his fix-months-foveraign government was well near expired. All the Annals in a manner do record that Fabius was the man, who during his Dictatorship, fought and waged war with Annibal, Calins writeth alfo, that he was created Dictator by the people. But both Calins and the reft, either knew not, or elfe forgot, that the Conful Servilius, who then was far from Rome, and in the Province of France, had the lawful right and authority only to nominate a Distator: and because the City so affrighted, by reason of that notable overthrow could not stay so long, they were driven to this shift, That there should be created by the people a Pro-Dictator or Dichator his Deputy. But the noble acts and glorious renown of that General, together with the 0 title of his Image, which might recommend his housemore honourable to posterity, gained eastly this point, and caused the Pro-Distator to be reputed Distator and so called.

The Confuls, At. Attilius Regulus, and Cn. Servilius Geminus, having received the army (asis beforefaid) fortified in good time the places for wintering harbour (for it was then the Autumn feafon and mannaged the wars together in great concord, and followed the fame politick courie und a done before them. For as Annibal made rodes at any time to purvey corn, they would meet him just at every turn, in sundry places, and either cut off the tail of his

A men, or intercept and catch them as they went scattering, but never hazard all in one set field : the only thing that the enemy shor ar by all the means he could devise. And so near driven was Annibal, and to those terms of want and scarcity, that but for very shame (lest by his dislodging and departure he might he thought to fike) he would have retired back into Gallia, as being out of all hope to maintain and fulfain his Army with victuals in those parts, in case the new Confuls who next succeeded, should hold on still the same policy and manner of warfare. Winter now approached, and all the war that was, continued and refled about "Gerion: at what time * cir conta. there arrived at Rome Embaffadours from Nuples, who brought with them, and presented into The Embaffathe Council-House, forty massie boles of beaten gold and withall delivered this speech, and said, does of Naples B" That they knew full well, how the Treasure of the people of Rome was wasted and confirmed in the Senate "by long wars. And for a finite as the faid wars were maintained, as well for the defence of the "Cities and Lands of allies, as for Rome, the very head, mother City, and principall Citadel (as it "were of all Italy, and for the loveraign dominion and Empire thereof the Neapolitans thought "it meet and reason, that what flore of gold their ancestors had left unto them, were it for to a-"dorn and deck themselves, or to relieve them in time of need and necessity, with it they were "to aid and help the people of Rosse in their advertity. And if they could have bethought them-"felves of any other means befides, wherein they might flead and befriend them they would as "willingly and frankly have made presentment thereof: faying, moreover, that the Senatofs of "Rome should do them an high pleasure, if they would make account of all that the men of Na-C " ples had, as their own; and judge them worthy, at whose hands they would vouch fafe to accept "a present, much greater, and more precions in regard of the mind and affection of the givers "than the substance and value of the thing. The Embassadors were highly thanked, as well for their liberality and munificence, as for the care they had of them: and that boil was only received About the same time, a Carthaginian spy, who for two years space had walked tinknown and unfulpected, was detected and apprehended now at Rome: and after his hands were cut off, was suffered to depart. Five and twenty slaves were crucified for a conspiracy contrived in Campus Martine. The informer was made tree, and had * 20000 pound of brass bullion given him * 60 pound ?. for a reward. There were also sent Embastadors to Philip King of the Macedonians, to demand in 6.4. Reil. Dagain Demetrius Pharius, who having been vanquished in plain field, was fled unto him. Others likewise were dispatched to the Ligurians, as well to expostulate with them and complain, that they had succoured Annibal with men, money and other murition: as also to hearken and learn (seeing they were so near) what the Boians and insubrians did or went abour. Beildes, a third Embassage was addressed as far as to * Illyricum, unto King Pineus, to enquite and call for the * sclavonic. Tribute, whereof the term was expired and past: and if he were minded to take a longer day, than to receive holtages and pledges of him for fecurity. See how carefull the Romans were, and what a provident eye they had not with thanding the great war which lay heavily upon their necks and shoulders, to their other affairs: insomuch as no one thing in the world, how distant and remote foever, was by them neglected. But as concerning religion, and Church matters, they E made some scruple of conscience, that the Temple of Concord (which L. Marlins, L. Deputy in Gallia, had vowed two years before in time of a fedition and mutiny of fouldiers) was not as yet fet out to workmen for to be built or edified accordingly. And therefore two Duumvirs were for that purpole created by Emylius the Prator, or L. Governour of the City, namely, Cn. Pupius, and Cafo Quintius Flaminius: who gave order, that the Temple should be built upon the Capitoll hill. The same Prator, by vertue of a decree of the Senate, sent his letters unto the Confuls, importing thus much, That if they thought good, one of them should repair to Rome for the creation of new Confuls; and that himself would summon the Parliament against that day which it should please them to appoint. The Consuls wrote back again according to the premises, That they might not depart far from the enemy without damage of State: advising r them to hold an affembly for the Election aforefaid, by anthority of an interregent, rather than that one of the Confuls should be called away from the wars. But the LL, of the Senate thought it better to have a Dictator chosen by one of the Consuls, for the holding of that high Court of Parliament. So L.Vetwins Philo, was nominated Dictator, and he chole for Generall of the Horsemen M. Pimponius Matho. But these men being not duly and lawfully created were commanded at the fortnights end to give over their places, and then the matter grew to an Interreign. The Confuls had their Commission; for government and conduct of the Army, continued and confirmed for one year longer. The Sellators named for Interregents, first Cn. Claudius Cento, the fon of Appins; and after him; P. Cornelius Afina, During whose Interreign, the Parliament was holden; with much contention and depate between the Nobles and the Commons. The G Vulgar people endeavoured to advance unto the Confulship C. Terentius Varro, a man of their own coat and condition, one crept into good liking and favour with the common fort by oppofing himself and contesting against great personages, and by other popular practices and courses that he used to wingface among the people; as namely, by abasing the greatness of Fabius, and the Majesty of the Dictatorship: for nothing was there else in him, to commend him to the world, but a malicious mind to bring others into difgrace. For who feeth not, that in feeking to K " have an Interreign, their only purpole and reach was that the Election might be full and wholly "in the power and ordering of the Nobles? That was the thing which the Confuls aimed at, in to flaying behind in Camp with the Army & afterwards when there was a Dictator created against "their wills for to hold the great affembly for the Election their drift was, and they wrought lo, "and brought it about in the end, that the Augurs should give it out and pronounce, that there " was an errour committed in creation of the Dictator. And therefore, faith he, the Commons canon not of all things away with these Interreigns: and verily, one of the Consulships (at least) aper pertain of right to the Commons of Rome; and no doubt, the people in their free election would "more willingly make choice of one to be Conful, and confer the dignity upon him, that loved 66 rather to win the victory at once, than to continue commander in the Army a long time, When L the Commons were once enkindled and fet on fire with these speeches and remonstances, albeit three of the Patritii Were competitors, namely, Pub Cornelius Merenda, L. Manlius Volfo, and M. Emplius Lepidus, and two * new Noblemen who were already familiar and aquainted with the Commons, to wit C. Attilius Serranus, and Q. Elius Parus, of whom the one had been High Prief, and the other Augur: yet at length was C. I erentius only created Conful, to the end that theelelection should be in his power, that he might choose unto him a Collegue at his pleasure. Then the Patritians having a sufficient tryall, that their Candidates and Competitors were of smallforce and not able to prevail, urged and put forward L. Emylius Paulus, who fometimes had been Conful with M. Lalins, in the condemnation as well of himself as of his companion, elcaped the peril of being burnt and was well finged and fcorched, as it were in the fire: a man of all others most mitchievously bent against the Commons: him they urged, I say, to stand for a Confullhip notwithstanding he refused a long while, and alledged many reasons against it. And so the next Comitiall or Parliament day, by occasion that all the concurrents and competitors aforesaid that flood with Varro, gave place and left off their fuit, he was chosen to match with the Conful elect, for to thwart and cross him, rather than to be assistant unto him in the government. This done, they proceeded to the election of Pretors, wherein M. Pomponius Matho, and P. Furins Philus were created Unto Pomponius fell by lot the jurisdiction within the City of Rome: and unto P. Furius Philus, between the Citizens of Rome and forreiners. Two other Prators befides were chosen, M.Claudius Marcellus, to be sent L. Deputy into Sicily, and L. Posthumius Albinus into Gallia. All were created in their absence, and excepting Terentius the Consul only, there was no N Magistracy conferred upon any, who had not aforetime born and exercised the same: for divers valorous and hardy men were passed over and lest out, because in such a time of trouble, it was not thought good to prefer any man to a government, wherein he was raw and unexperiened. The Armies also were augmented; but to what proportion they arose, either in Cavalry, or Infantry, I dare not fet down any thing or certainty; lo greatly do authors vary both in the number and quality of the forces. Some lay, there was a new supply of 10000 souldiers enrolled. Others affirm that to the five legions there were were adjoyned four new besides; to the end they might employ nine legions in the wars. Also, that the legions were increased in number both of foot and horie: to wit, with the addition of one thouland footmen, and three hundred horie menin every Legion: [for sometime before, a Legion contained 4000 foot, and 200 horse, cal-0 led Quadratalegio: whereas at first Romalus ordained it to be 2000 of the one, and 300 of the other so as a Legion consisted now of five thousand foot, and three hundred horse; and that the affociats should double the number of horsemen, and find even proportion of footmen with the

A ingood hope, that the enemy might be vanquished and subdued at once. But before that these new Legions advanced under their entigns and banners out of the City, the Decemvirs were commanded to go and perule the books of Sibylla; by reason that men were commonly put in sear, and terrified with news of firange fights and prodigious tokens. For the rumour went, that both at Rome in the Aventine, and also at Arioin, it rained flones, much about one time ; and that in the Sabins Country (which no doubt portended a great maffacte and flaughter) there iffued out of a certain fountain, waters hot, with much bloud: and men were more terrified therewith, because is did so many times together. The Confines having finished the musters and levied souldiers, staid a few daies, until their allies were come with aid from the Latines. Then were the Souldiers particularly (a thing never done before) by their Colonels, put to their corporal oath, and sworn to make their repair at the Consuls commandment, and without their leave not to depart: for until that day, there passed nothing but a sacramentall parole & simple promise in general. For mine own part, in my former Confulship, I hardly elcaped a scouring, and much ado I had to pass through the light fire of the flaming peoples doom and heavy "centure, wherein I was well icorched and half-burne, I with all may be well in theend. Howbeit, " if any thing shall fall out otherwise than well, I had rather hazard the pikes and darts of the ene-"mies, and leave my life behind me among them, than put my felf to betried again by the voices " and juffrages of angry and teffy Citizens, Paulus had no sooner delivered this speech, but (as the report goeth (he went forth on his journey and the chief LL, of the Senat accompanied him, The ther Commoner Coniul was likewise attended of his favourits the Commons, more looked on & E gazed at for their multitude and number, than regarded for the worth & quality of their persons.

So loon as they were arrived at the Camp, and that the new army was interming'ed with the old, they divided the whole army into two camps & ordred the matter fo, that the new which was the lesser should be nearer to Annibal: and in the old, the greater number and the wholestrength and flower of the main forces should be quarteted. Then they sent away to Rome M. Attilus the Conful of the former year, who excused himself by reason of his old age, and defired to be gone. But they gave unto Cn. Servilius the charge and conduct of one Roman Legion, and befides of two thouland horsemen and sootmen of their allies in the lesser Camp. Annibal, notwithstanding he well perceived that the power of his enemies was re-enforced by one half more than before, yet wondrous joyful he was at the comming of these new Consules. For not only he had nothing left him of victuals, which from day to day he purveyed for, to terve his prefent need and no more; but also there was no more to be had, and nothing remained for to fill his hands with; by reason that after the territory was not fase to travel in, the corn from all parts was conveyed unto the strong walled Towns, and there laid up: so that (as afterwards it was known for certain) he had scarce corn enough for to serve ten daies : and the Spaniards, by occasion of the dearth and want, were at the point to revolt unto the Romans, it they might but espy a good and commodious time therefore. Over and besides, to the inbred rashnels and over-halty nature of the Conful, Fortune also ministred matter to confirm him therein. For in a certain tumultuary skirmish (to stop and impeach the forragers and Plunderers of Annibal, and which began rather by chance, as the fouldiers hipned to encounter one another, than ppon any confiderate counsel aforehand, or by direction and commandment from the Generals) the Carthaginians had the foil, and went by the world; for of them therewere 1700 flain: but of Romans and Confederates. not passing 100. And when in the train of victory they hotly followed the chace in difattay, the Conful Paulus, who that day had the absolute command (for they governed by turns, each once his day) refir ained and fluied them. Varro thereatchased and fretted, crying out aloud, That he had let the enemy escape out of his hands: and if he had not thus given over the puriout, the war might have been ended at once. Annibal took this lois and dammage nothing near the heart, but rather made tuli reckonieg, that he had caught

(as it were) with a bait & fleshed the auda ionsness of the sool-hastly Consul and of the new souls diers especially. For he knew as well all that was done amongs the enemies, as in his own Camp; namely, that the Generals were not futable nor forting one unto the other and that of three parts of the army, two in a manner were but raw fresh, and untrained souldiers. And therefore suppo. fing he had now got place and time favourable unto him, to contribe and compals some stratagem, the night following he led forth his fouldiers, carrying nothing about them but their armon; and abandoned the Camp full of all things, as well private goods and furniture, as publike proviseon: and beyond the next hils he bestowed secretly in ambush his footmen well appointed and in ordinance of battel on the left hand; and the horsemen on the right; and conveighed all his carriages into the midlt between two flanks: to the end, that whiles the enemy was bulled in riffing ! and ransaking the tents, orlorn (as it were) and totiaken by the flight of the owners and maffers. he might turprize him laden and encumbred with bag and baggage. He left schind him in the Camp many fires burning to the end that the enemies should verily think and be eeve, that under a pretended shew of an army in Camp his purpose was to hold and keep the Confus amuzed full where they were, whiles himself in the mean time might gain more ground and escape furtheraway: like as he had plaid by Fabius the year before. When day-light was come and the Coff faw, first that the standing guards were gone, and perceived (as they approached nearer) anunwonted filence they mar elled much. But after they discovered certainly that the Camp was abandoned, and no person remaining behind: there was running of all hands who could runsafleft to the pavilions of the Coff, with news that the enemies were fled, in such fear as they off ? their tents standing entire and had quit the Camp wholly: and to the end their flight should be more fecret and not def ried they had left light fires burning in every place. Then began they all to cry and call upon the Coil, or to command the hard and entens to be brought abroad and to lead forth in purious of the enemies, and without any may to make spoil and havo k of their Camp. And in truth one of the Coff, was no wiler than the common foundiers. But Paulus replied, and told them ever and mon, that they were to be circum pect and wary and to look about them what they did for lear of an ambush. Yet seeing in the end no remedy and that otherwisehe could neither fray the mutiny, nor rule the Captain thereof: he fent out M. Startling (the Provolt marshall) with a troop of Lucan horsemen in espiall to discover the coasts and see all were clear; who having ridden hard to the gates and given order to all the relt for to fray without the form I fications, himself with two horsemen besides entred within the rampire, and having looked and fearched every comer advitedly, he retired and made relation. That past all peradventure there were knaves abroad and a piece of treachery was in hand: for why, there are fires made (quoth he) on that fide only of the Camp that looked toward the enemy: the pavilions stand open and all things of price and value which they fet more flore by are left at random even to fit our hands: and we have feen befides in divers places, filver plate and coinfeattered along the way hereand there, as it were a bait laid to train us to a boory. These circumstances reported, of purpose to withdraw their minds from collections and greedy defire of pillages setting monds kindled them the more. And the ton diers had no fooner cried alond, that unless the fignal were given, they would fet forwards without Commanders: but they had a captain fit light at hand to lead them! the way: for immediatiy V rectounded the march. Paulse who of Limelf made flow half, and perceived besides that the birds in taking the Auspice approved not this enterprise nor gategood tokens of happy speed, gave order straightwaies that his Collegue should be advertised of the unlucky Auspice, who was ready now to set out of the gate with his standard & that in any wishe should tray. Wherewith albeit Varro was not well content, yet the late misfortune of Fliminas, and the memorab coverthrow at fea of Clandens [* Pulcher] Conful in the Punick war, wrought some scruple of conscience and sear in his heart. But it was even the fair grace of the gods (if a min may to fay) and nothing elfe, which put by and deferred rather than impeached and inhibited the danger and detruction that hung over the Romans heads. For as good hap was it chanced at the very instant, when the Conful commanded the enfigns to be brought into the Camp, & the found-N ers would not obey him that two flaves (who ferved sometime two horsemen, the one a Formian, and the other a Sidicin, and who in the year when Servilus & Attilus were Confuls among other forragers were taken prisoners by the Numidians) made an escape and fled that day to their old mafter again. Who being brought before the Coff advertised them conflantly, that the whole army of Anni al lay clote in ambul ado on the father ide of the mountains. The coming of thele bondflaves to right and jump as they did, caused the souldiers to obey their Coss. Whereas the one of them by his ambitious courting and feeking unto them at the first for a Consulfhip, and afterwards by his unfeemly indulgence and pleasing of them, had lost all his majesty and reputation among them.

anubal, when he saw that the Romans rather began to stir without advice, than still to 1000 rafhly on head to the full and that his crarty device was diffloied and took no effect, returnedagain into his Camp. Where, he could not for want of corn make abode many daies: and befides not only fouldiers (who were not all one mans children but a confused mixture of all Nations) began dayiyto plot and enter into new designments, but also their Captain himself was of many minds. For whereas they began with muttering and grumbling, and afterwards with open mouth, to demand and call for their due wages, complaining first of the dearth of victuals, and in the end, of meer hunger and famine: and withall a rumour ran, that the mercenary foundiers,

A and the Spaniards especially, were minded and intended to give him the flip, and to turn to the enemy; Anaibal likewise bethought himself otherwhiles as it was faid, how he might flie into Gallia, but so, as he would leave his Infantry behind him at fix and seven, and so be gone with his Cavalry alone, As men, I tay, were thus plotting and deviling in the camp, he retolved at length to dislodge from thence, and to remove into the hotter countries of Apalia, where the harvest was more timely: confidering withal that the farther he went from the enemies his foundiers who were by nature light-headed and inconflant, would not to early revolt and fire from him. So he took his way by night, and made fires likewife, and left a few tents standing in fight, shot the Romans fearing the like trains and ambush as before, might keep in and not stir abroad. But when B as the same Statilius the Lucan, having scoured all the coalls, both beyond the camp, and the other fide of the hills, and brought word that he had discovered the enemies afar of dismarching then began they the morrow after to think and confult of making after him with her purfute. But albeit both Consuls continued, as ever before, the same men still, that is to say, diversly minded, and perlifting in their feveral resolutions: but so, as all in a manner accorded with Varro, and none agreed unto Paulus, but only Servilius the Conful of the former year: yet according to the ominion and counsel of the m. jor pars, they went both together (for what might held that which fatal necessity driveth) to make Canna much renowned and famous for the notable overthrow and defeat of the Romans. Neer this village Annibal had encamped under the wind Vulcurnus, and had it on his back; which wind, when the fields are forched and burnt with drought, is wone C to bring with it clouds (as it were) of dust. Which as it was good and commodious for the very campities, o it was like to serve inspecial stead, when they should range their battel in order, and right, with the wind blowing on their back, against the enemy, whose eyes the dust was ready to put out, flying with the wind full in their faces fo abundantly. The Confuls having diligently tearched the wayes and tried the passages ever before them, followed Annibal hard, and so soon as they were come to Carra, hid him in fight: where they fortified two camps, of like diffance almost afunder, as at Gerion; and divided their forces like as before. The river Aufidus ran close by both these camps, and yeelded watring places according as either of them had occasion and need, but not without some scussing and skirmish. But from the lessercamp, which lay on the farther side of Ansidus the Romans had more liberty to water, be-D cause upon the farther bank there was planted no scence nor guard of the enemy. Annil at having possessed himself of a good plot of ground to his mind, commodious and meet for the service of horsemen (in which kind of forces he was invincible) ordred his battaillons in array, & by putting out certain Numidian light horse, made a bravado, and bade the Corfuls battel. And even then it fell out, that both the Roman camps were disquicted and troubled anew, what with the mutiny of the fouldiers, and what with the disagreement and jarring of the Corfuls; whiles Paulus laid hard unto Varro, and let before his eyes the rashnels of Sempronius and Flaminius: and Varro again hit him home, and twit him with the example of Fabius, which made so goodly a snew in the eyes of fearful, idle, and cowardly Captains: both of them fell to protelling and calling God and man to witness, the one giving out that the fault was not in him that Annibal was E now Lord well-neer of all Italy already, and why ? because himself was kept short and tied fail enough by his Colleague, and the fouldiers whose hot blood was up. and who were eager of fight, had their weapons even plucked out of their hands: Amil is on the other ide complaining that if ought should hap amils unto the Legions thus betrayed, and offered wil ally and unconsideratly to the danger of dou' tful battel, notwithstanding he were not blame worthy but innocent altogether, yet should he be the first that smarted, and be partaker of the mischief and missortune: and yet he would gladly see, whether they who were so ready and hasty of their tongue to speak, would be as nimble & active of their hands to fight, when the time came Thus whiles they ipend time inchopping of Logick & quarrelling one with another rather then in good & fober confultations, Annibal who had flood arranged a good part of the day ready to fight, minding to retire his other forces into his camp, lent forth certain Numidians out of the battel to charge upon the Romans on the other fide of the river, who from the leffer camp went for water. These being a difordered & confused multitude, were not fully landed on the bank, but with the shout only & tumult of the Numidians, they were discomfited and put to flight: whereupon the enemy rode farther, even to the standing Corps de guard, quartered before the sampart, and hard at the very gates of the Roman camp. This was such an indignity offered to the Romans, to see themselves now thus braved and bearded even in the very camp by the auxiliary souldiers, and the rascal fort of the enemies, that there was no other thing stayed the Romans from passing the river presently, and embattelling themselves, but only this, that it was Paulus his turn that day to have the soveraign command of all. And therefore the morrow after, when it came to Porto his course for to rule, * That is a G without any advice of his companion, he put forth the "fignal of battel, and with all his forces fearlet caffock without any advice of his companion, he put forth the figure of battel, and with a time some who might need his patient of battel, went over the river. Paulus also followed after him as one who might need his patients. well enough mislike and difallow the purpose of his Collegue, but otherwise could neither will sing. norchule, but second him, and takepart in the execution. Being once over the river, they join The memoraalso the forces which they had in the smaller camp, unto the other: and in this manner they or- ble banel of dred the battel. In the right point which was neerer to the river was arranged the Roman Cavalry, and after them the footmen. The left point on the outside, was flanked with the horimen of the affociats: within flood their Infantry: but in the middle part were bestowed the Archers and loose shot, close to the main battel of the Roman Legions; and of all the rest of light armed H auxiliary (ouldiers, confilled the van-guard, The Confuls led both the points, Terentius the left, Emplies the right, Cn. Servillus had the conduct of the main battel. Now Annibal by the break of day, having sent before the Baleare flingers, and his other light armor, passed over the river, and marshalled them in battel array, ever as they came to land. The horse as well Gauls as Spaniards, he opposed in the left point, neer to the bank, even against the horesemen of the Romans: the right confilted of the Numidian light horse: and the main battel was strengthned and fortified with his Invantry: but in such manner as the Affricans flanked both, in manner of wings: and between them were bestowed the Gauls and the Spaniards in the midst, A man that had seen the Affricans, would have taken most of them for Romans, so armed were they with Roman armor, I gotten much of it at Trebia, but most of all at Thrasymenus. The Frenchmen and Spaniards had targets neer of one fashion, but their swords were unlike and far differing. Those of the Gauls were very long and not pointed. But the Spaniard, whose manner is rather to fight with the thrust and to foyn, then to slash and strike edglong, had handsome short curtilasses, and sharpar the point. And atterthis fort flood these two nations armed before the rest (terrible to behold, both for the bigness of their persons, and also for their habit and attire.) The Gauls all from the nivel upward naked: the Spaniards with linnen wastcoats or jackets, glittering wondrous bright, bordred and embroidered with purple and fearlet. The complear number of all, as well horse as footmen, that stood embattelled, amounted (as they report) unto forty thousand foot, and ten thou fand men of arms. Thele Captains had the leading of the two points, to wit, Afarnhal comman K ded the left, Maharbal the right, Annib I himlest in person with his brother Mago, conducted the middle battel. The Sun shone sidewise upon the slanks both of the one and also of the other army, very indifferent and commodious to both parts, were it that they were so placed and marshalled offiet purpose, or chanced at adventure to to stand: the Romans with their faces full south, the Carthaginians into the north, But the wind which the inhabitants of that country call Vnl. turnus, arole and blew full upon the faces of the Romans, and raifed fuch store of dust, and drave it so upon their eyes, that it took away their fight and prospect, Thetry and shout began on both sides, and the Auxiliary fouldiers put themselves forth first to skirmish, and charged one another with their light shot. Then the lett point of the Gauls and Spanish men of arms encountred and ran full upon the right hand of the Romans Cavalry, nothing at all after the order of horse-lervice for they were of necessity to affront one another straight sorward, as having no room leit about them to fling out and ride at large, being flanked on the one hand with the river, and enclosed on the other with the battaillon of footmen. Wherupon I fay, they were forced to charge full butt from both parts, directly before them, so long as their horses flood close and thrust together : but at length when they began to stir and wince, the riders, man to man, fell to take hold and claipe one another, and every man to pluck his enemie besides his horse, so as now they were driven much what to fight on foot. This conflict was rather sharp then long : and to be short, the Roman Cavalry was discomfitted and put to flight. And anon, as the horse made an end of their fight, beganthe skirmish of the foot also. At the first the Gauls and Spaniards equal to their enemies both in force and courage maintained the conflict right hardily, and kept their orderandy arraies. At length the Romans call about and devised on what side, and with what form of a dole battaillon, to force back that pointed iquadron of the enemies, ranged very thin, and by somuch the weaker, and bearing out withal, from the rest of the battel. Now when they had once driven them to retreat, and give ground, the Romans pressed on still at one instant, and with the same violence pierced through them as they fled for fear headlong, until they were entred as far as to the very midft of the vanguard and main battel and finding none able to stand in their way and make resistance, they gained in the end the very rereward of the Africans: who having drawnin from both fides their skirts and wings, flood together strong, and firmly kept their ground. The Gauls and Spaniards continued still in the midst, somewhat advanced without the rest of the battel. Now when this pointed squadron was driven in by the Romans, and made even and equal full N with the front of the battel, and afterwards upon farther enforcement, gave way for themtopals in a lane through the midst thereofiby that time the Africans charged upon their flanks: and whiles the Romans unwarily were engaged over far within them, they came about them on theshins, and within a while having firetched out and spread their wings, enclosed the enemies roundon their backs also. Hereupon the Romans who had performed one battel and conflict in vain, were forced to give over the Gauls and Spaniards, whom they had disaraied and put to flight and were to begin a fresh fight with the Africans; and that to their own great difadvantage; not only be cause they being enclosed and pent up in a firaight room, were to deal with them that had compassed them all about and were at liberty, but also because they being wearied, were to maintain a new skirmish with those that were fresh in heart, and lusty. And now by this time, in the 160 point of the Romans battel, where the horsemen of their affociats were marshalled to affir nether Numidians they were faln to close fight: which at the first these Numidians began but coldy and faintly, after the deceitful manner of Carthaginians, unto whom they were fast and neer neigh bours, For 500, of them or thereabout, having befides their usual jave ins and darts which the commonly carry, short daggers or skeins hidden under their cuirass and harness, made temblant of riding away from their own companies, and fiding to the Romans, with their bucklers a their backs, all of a judden dismounted from their horses, and throwing their bucklers, targets

A and spears at their enemies seet, were received within the main battel, and from thence conducted to the hindmost in the rereward, were commanded there to abide behind at their back, And until such time as the skirmish joined on all fides, they continued quiet. But when they law every mans eye and mind bufied and occupied in the conflict, then they caught up those bucklers that lay strewed and scartered among the dead bodies all abroad, and played upon the battel of the Romans from behind: and what with wounding their backs, & cutting their hamflrings, they made foul work and flaughter among them, and more then that, raifed a greater fear and tumult by far. Now when the Romans in one place were frighted and ran away, and in another fought for life, armed only with despair of all means to escape; Afdrubal who had the charge of that side, B caufed the Numidian horsemen, who tought but coldly with those that flood affront them, to be withdrawn from the midft of the battel, and fent them to purfue the enemies in the chare, And to the Affiricans over weary now with execution and killing, rather then with any other fight, he ioined the Gauls and Spanish footmen to affilt them. On the other side of the battel, Penlus, albeit at the very first shock and encounter, he was fore wounded with a builet from out of a sling, yet oftentimes he made head against Annibal, and kept his battaillons close and thick together, yea, and in divers places renued the conflict, and evermore the Roman horiemen guarded and protected him, But at the last they left their horses, because the Consul his strength failed him to rule his own, and to sit him. Whereupon there was one brought word unto Annibel, that the Consul had commanded his men of arms to light afoor, Then (quoth Annibal, as the report goeth) Yea, mar-Cry: But how much gladder would I be, if he delivered them into my hands bound hand and foot? And furely the horsemen fought so after they were alighted, as if there had been no doubt, but that the enemy had the victory, Howbeit, although they had the worle, yet they chose rather to die in the place, then to flie: and the victors angred at the heart with them for thus staying the accomplishment of the victory, went down with them, and killed outright all those whom they could not make to give ground and yeeld. And yet a few such as were wearied with much toil and overcharged with many wounds they enforced to retreat. Anon they were all disbanded and feattered afunder: and as many as could, recovered their horses, and fled away. "Cn. Lentulus a Co-" lonel eeing (as he rode by) the Conful fitting all agore blood upon a flone. Ah L. Emylius (quoth "he) whom the gods ought of right to regard and fave, as being the only guiltless man, and inn "nocent of this days work and unhappy overthrow, takehere this horse of mine, while some "vigor and firength remaineth in you. Come I say, and make not this battel more cursed and forrowful by the death " of a Conful, Without it, I wot, we have cause enough already, and too much, of dolorous tears "and woful lamentation. Whereunto the Conful made this answer: I give thee thanks, O L. Cor-4 nelius gra-mercy for thy kindness, and God bless thee in this thy vertue and prowels. But take "thou heed to thy felf, left by thy foolish pity of me, thou lose that little time which thou hast to "estape out of the hands of the enemies, Save thy self, and go thy ways to the LL of the Senat, "and will them all from me ingeneral, to fortifie the City of Rome, and man it well with strong "guards, before the enemy follow the train of victory, and come against it. As the Conful uttered these words, first the multitude of his own citizens in the rout, and then the enemies in purluit, ran over him; and not knowing who he was, overwhelmed him with javelins and darts good store. As for Lentulus, his horse carried him away to a little hill. Then they fled all amain as fast as they could, 7000, recovered the lester camp, and ten thousand the greater: and upon two thousand put themselves into the village it self of Canna. But because it was an unwalled and senceless town, they were immediatly environed by Cartalo and the horsemen, and so perished every one. The other Consul made no semblan e, that he was offended or displeased with the companies that thus fled, were it of purpose, or as it chanced; and accompanied with fifty men of arms or thereabout escaped to Venusia, In this battel were flain of Romans (by report) 40000, footmen, and 2700, horsemen; and in a manner, as many belides of Allies, as of natural Citizens. Amongst whom there was one Conful, two Treasurers, L. Attilius and Furiur Bibaculus, 21. Colonels: some also who had been Contuls, Pretors, and Ædiles, Of which number was Cn. Servilius, and C. Minatius Numatius, who the year before had been Commander of the Cavalry for iome certain days, Besides 80, Senators, or such as were Senators fellows, and had born those dignities, in regard whereof, they were to be chosen Senators. These served as voluntaries and were enrolled among the Legions. There were taken prisoners at this field, as the general speech went, 3000, sootmen, and 300, men of Arms.

This is that noble battely to famous for the overthrow at Canna, and comparable to that defeat at the tiver Allia. For like as this: was of lefs importance then the other; in refpect of that which enfued after the conflict, because the enemy flayed his hand, and purfued not his victory: so five consider the loss of men and defeat of the army, it was the greater, and for the shameful flight more dishonorable. Fog the running away that was at Allia, as it betrayed the City, so it saved the Army; but at Canna, when the one Consul sled; there were scarce 50, of his army that accompanied

Now there being a number in both camps, half disarmed, and wholly without their chief took their heels. Commanders: the Captains of the greater Camp fent a messenger unto the other, willing them to come over thither, that they might march in one entire company together, and depart to Canagum in the night leason, whiles their enemies were falt afleep; as partly wearied with long fight and partly charged with wine & good cheer after their joyful victory. This advite, some there were that milliked attogether and rejected. For why (fay they) might not they come hither themselvs to us, as well as fend for us fince we may as foon fo join together? Because, I wot, all the ways between are full of enemies, and they choic rather to hazzard the bodies of others, then adventure their own persons in so great danger. The word was no fooner out of his mouth, but his fword was out of rabbard, and with a pointed battaillon took his way through the midft of the enemies: and when the Numidians flanked them, and thot hard at their right fide that lay open to them, they shifted their targets to their right arm, and so escaped, to the number of 600, unto the bigger camp, and sontwith from thence joining to the other greater company, they retired themselves safe to Cannfum.

These exploits were performed by men yanquished, more upon a present fit of courage, as each L mans natural inflinet guided, or chance led him, then either any fage advice of their own, or com-

Now when all the rest came about Annihal immediatly upon this noble victory to congratulat and rejoice with him, yea, and to advise him, that after to great a battel performed, he should the rest of that day, and the whole nightfollowing, both retresh himself, and also give rest and repose to his wearied fouldiers : Maharbal, General of the Cavalry, was of mind that it was no giving over thus: Nay (quoth he) that you may know of what consequence this battel is, you shall break yourfast and eat your dinner five days hence in the Capitol, Follow hardly with your horizmen, that they may see you are come, before they hear that you are comming. No, saith Annibal again, let curriers on Gods name go afore, and spare not to carry news thereof: Your words are good, M and it is a gay matter and plaufible you fpeak of : but the way thereto is longer, and more then I can presently conceive and comprehend: I give you thanks Maharhal, and I commend your good mind and forwardness; but we had need to deliberat and pause further upon this point. Ah (quoth Maharbal) true it is, I see well, that God hath not endued one man with allgues. Thou half the way O Annibal, to win a victory, but not the grace to use a victory, And inrely, in this one dayes delay, as it was cettainly believed, flood the falety and prefervation of the City & Empire of Roms, Themorrow after, so soon as ever the day began to appear, they minded only and intended thegathering of (poils, and to view that great butchery and flaughter : a pitiful and lamentable fighteven to the very enemies to behold. So many thousand Romans lay there along in every place, horsemen and sootmen pell mell, one with another, according as their hap was to meet together, N and either to join in fight, or die in flight, Some were feen to arife up all bloody from out of the midst of the flanghtered bodies, such, as the bitter morning cold had nipped their wounds, and made them to flart up by reason of their imart, and were by the enemy knocked down again and killed. Other some they found lying along still alive, cut shorter by the thighs & hams, who offred their bare necks & throats to be cut & cail'd unto them to let forth the relt of their blood Divers were found with their heads covered within the earth, who as it appeared had made themselvs holes & and gutters in the ground for this purpofe, to inter themselvs; whereinto they thrust their mouths & faces, & being buried with mould cast over them, were so slifted & choaked. But above all the rest there was one that drew every mans eye upon him & made them all to wonders No midian with his note and ears piteoufly mangled & cropt, but yet alive, lying under a Roman dead. 0 For when his hands so wounded as they were, would not serve him to handles wespon for very anger he fel mad & lay (fo long as he had any breath within him biting his enemy with his seth,

After they had spent a good part of the day in gathering spoils, Annibal marched forward to affault the leffer camp; and first and formost he turned atide the arm of the river that flanked them, and for excluded them from the water, But they all within being over-wearied with toll with watching and bleeding of their wounds, yeelded fooner then he looked for: and covenanted. Imprimit, to deliver up their armor and horses: Item, to pay 300, Quadigate

A peeces of filver, for every Roman: 200. for every one of the Allies: and every bondman 100 a peece, Item, that after this ranfom paid, they should depart in their single apparel. Thus they received their enemies into the camp, and were themselves put all in ward : but, Allies and Citizens by themselves, apart one from the other. While they trifled time there, there were about 4000, footmen, and 200 horsemen, even as many as either their thrength or hearts would serve, who out of the greater camp fled to Ca ufium, tome marching in order, others feattering abroad over the fields, which was nor the worle way of the twain, and leis tafe. And then the camp was furrendered to the enemy, by those that were hart and heartless, upon the same conditions that the other was. A rich booty was there gotten : and letting aide hories, and men, and filver, which B they used much in trappings and capacitons of their horses, (for fouldiers, be refure, occupied very little filver, either in their own apparrel, or at their boord) all the pillage was given to be rifled and ranfacked amongst them. Then he gave commandment that the dead bedies of his own men should be gathered together forto be buried. And as men say, they were to the number of eight thousand, all right valiant and hardy men. Some Authors report, that the Roman Con ul allo was fought up and interred. As for those, which eleaped to Canuficans, were by the Canufins entertained only within the walls, and lodged in their hou es: but a noble Lady and a wealthy, named Busa relieved them with some victual, appartel, yea, and money also in their purses for their journey. In regard of which bountiful liberality of hers, after the war was finished, the w s highly honored by the Senat of Rome.

Now, there were amongst them four Colonels, namely, Fabius Max. of the first Legion, whose father had been Dictator the year before; and L. Pull cius Bibulus, of the second Legion, together with P. Cornel, Scipio, and Appius Clandius Pulcher of the third Legion who had been Adile but lately afore: and by general confent of them all, P. Scipio, a very young man, and Ap. (Lued us were cholento bear the foveraign rule, and to have the absolute command and conduct of the army. But as they fat with some few others, in counsel together about the mannaging of their main affairs, behold P. Furin Philus, whose father had been a Conful, gave them to understand that all their consultations were in vain, and that they did but foster and cherish a soo ish hope of an overthrown state: for the Common-weal was in a despera e case, past ail cure, and remediles; Alfo that certain noble young Gentlemen, of whom L. Cecilius Metellus was the principal min-D ded nothing elie but to take fea, and were ready to embark, to abandon Italy, and to fly for fuct or to some King or other. This evil tidings as it was most grievous and heavy in it self: so failing out as it did, presently upon other missorumes to suddenly and unlooked for, put them into their dumps, and wonderfully amazed and aftonied them all. And when they that were prefent in place laid their heads together, and thought good to call others to counsel upon this point. Scipio a young man, even then predefined to be the fatal Captain of this war, answered: What do we here? (quoth he) it is no time now to fit confulting in to great extremity, but leaving all discourles, presently roproceed to action, and to do some exploit. As many therefore as are willing to fave the Common-weal, take arms and go with me forthwith : for no where are our enemies (to fay a truth) encamped against us more, then where such designments are plotting and contriving, E Forth he went with a few following after him, unto the lodging of Metellus and finding there the young Gendemen aforesaid, close together in counsel thereabout : he drew his sword and brandisht it naked over their heads, as they fat in consultation. " I swear before you all (quoth he) "and I swear from my very heart; and no man urgeth me thereto, that I for my part will neither "for ake the Common-weal nor infler any Citizen else of Rometo abandon her. And if I fail wit-"ting and willing, then confound me O Jup. Opr. Max. and bring a most shameful end upon my "honse, my family, and all that I have. At the same time, whiles these things were working at (anufum, there arrived at Venusia upon four thousand foot and horsemen together, such as in their flight had been seperated asunder all over the fields, and repaired unto the Conful there. The Venuins took order for them all, that they should be gently entertained, and carefully tended, and divided into several honses: and they bellowed upon the horsemen, a side cassock a coat, and '25. Considerates together: but that the two Confuls and both the armies were put all to the sword, H and hewn in pieces to the last man. Never was there known to great a terrour and turmoil within the walls of Rome (and the City fill remaining in facty.) I will therefore even at first, fink under my load and saying nothing at all : and never will I go about to recount those things by discourse of words, which in reporting, I should make less then they were indeed. For there went not now, a flying rumor first of one foil, and then of another; to day of this loss, and to morrow of that; as the year before when the Conful and his army were deleated at Thrasymeness, but manifold overthrows together were multiplied and altogether at once, to wit, how both the Confuls were flain, and two Conjular armies lost : no camp, not a pavil on of the Romans left flanding: neither Leader nor Souldier remaining alive: and how Annibal was now become Lord of Apulia, of Sannium, and well neer of all Ital, tall and whole. And verily, there is not (I suppose) a nation under the cope of heaven betices, but would have been overwhelmed and crushed utterly under the huge heap and heavy weight of fo great a ruin & ogerthrow, Should I comparetherwith the defeat and foil that the Carthaginians received at the Island Egates, in a conflict at feat wherewith they were so quelled, and their backs so broken, that at one clap they lost Sicilia and Sardinia both, and that which more is, yeelded themselves tributaries and subjects to the people of Rome. Or should I make comparison of their unfortunate and unhappy battel in Africk atterwards? wherein this very fame Annibal gave overplay, yeelded the bucklers, and confessed himself vanquished. Nay they are not any way comparable with this, but only that they were bomand supported with less courage, and valour of mind. Well, to proceed, P. Furius Philms, and M. Pomponius the Pretors, assembled the Senat in the Court Hofilia, for to confult about the defence and guard of the City; for they made no doubt, but now that the armies were both deleated the enemy would speedily come to affault Rome, the only piece of work, and wersike service that remained behind undone. But being to seek what counsel to take, and what femedy to devise for redress of the ecalamities, so exceeding great and grievous, and yet not known to the full, and interrupted and shrewly troubled besides with the clamorous notifes and plaints of women: whiles that in every house almost, they ceased notto mourn weep, and wail confusedly, as well for the quick as the dead (because as yet it was not oe penly and for certain known who were alive, and who were flain.) Then Fatins Max, gave 6 his opinion, that certain light horfemen should be made out and fent forth by the highways Ap I " pix and Lating, and to ride along, and enquire of them whom they happed to meet with first I "mean as fled, and were scattered here and there atunder) if happiny tome of them could report "upon his knowledge, what was become of the Confuls, and the armics: and in (ale the im-"mortal gods had of their mercy and compaffion sparcoadome poor remnant (till of this miletable "and world Empire, for the Roman name; where that residue of small forces was what way As-"nibal took; and whither he was gone after the battel was fought; what preparation he makth, what prefently he is doing, or intendeth for to do. His advicewas, I fay, that to cfpy, hearken and learn certainly, these premises, certain lutty young men, active and industrious, should be simployed, But for the LL, of the Senat thus much, that confidering there were few Magillates " at home, and those not able to rid the City of this tumultuous and fearful hurliburly, therefore "they should take upon themselves, to debut the dames and women for coming abroad, and "force them every one to keep home, and tarry within doors; to reftrain the plaints and outries of housholds and families: to cause silence throughout the City; to take order that all Posts, and messengers of news, should be brought before the Pretors; and that every man should st "tend achomethetidings, good or bad, that concerned himself, or his own state. Over andbe " fides, that they should set warders at the gates, to see that no person went out of the Cityand "compel every man to hope for no other earthly fafety for themselves, but in the preservation of "the City, and walls thereof. And when the tumult and hurry is once husht, then (quoth he) may the enators well be called again into the Councel-House, and consult for the defencead "fafeguerd of the City. When all the affembly liked well, and approved of this opinion, and weny every man on Fabies, his fide without contradiction, so as the market place, by authority of the Macifirates, was cleared and voided of the multitude, and the Senators were divided and gone fundry ways to appeale the uproars: then at last, came letters from Terentias the Conful, importing, that L. Emyline the Conful was flain together with the army : that himself was at Camfum, bute in rallying the reliques of fo great an overthrow, as it were after a shipwrack upon the fea; and there were ten thouland fouldiers of them, or very nere, and those much out of trans and good order. As for Ann.bal, he fat fill now at Canra, bufily occupied about the ranfomings prisoners, and intentive to the rest of the spoil and pillage: not measuring the victory with the mind and courage of a conqueror, nor yet after the guife and manner of a noble warrior and gree commander. Then were the privat and particular losses also divulged and spread abroad through every man his house and family, and the whole City was fo filled with forrow and lamentation, that the Anniversary solemnity of sacrifices to Ceres was sorelet, because it was not lawfulfer thosethat mourned to celebrate the same: and there was not a matron throughout the City, but was in heavines and forrow for the time. Left therefore other factifices likewife, as well public as privat, upon the lame occasion, should be neglected and discontinued, there passed an As of the Senart, by vertue whereof a term was prefixed, to make an end of mourning within the tydays. Now was the trouble of the City no sooner allayed, and the Senators called sign and

A into the Councel-House: but to mend the matter, there were other letters brought out of Sicily from T. Octacilius the Vice-pretor, notifying thus much, That the realm of Hiero was much wafled by the Carthaginian navy: and when he would have fuct oured him at his earnest fuit and petion, there was another Armado ready rigged, decked and furnished, riding by the Islands Egatet, waiting the opportunity of the time, that when the Carthaginians perceived once that he had turned and bent his forces to the defence of the coast and, river Sy, acufe, they might immediatly let upon Lilybaum, and the rest of the Roman province. And therefore in case they were minded to aid and maintain a confederate King, and defend the Realm of Sicily, they must of necessity rig and man another fleet out of hand. When the letters both of the Confel and also of the Vice-Pre-B tor were read, agreed it was, and thought meet, that M. Chandius, Admiral of the fleet which rid inthe harbour of Ofia, should be sent unto the army at Can Sum, and letters be dispatched withal unto the Conful, willing him upon the delivery of the army unto the Pretor, to repair unto Rome with all speed possible, and not fail, so far forth as he might, without any detriment and hindrance of the Common-weal. Besides these so great losses and ad ersities, men were put in fear with fundry prodigious tokens: and among others, in that one year, two Vellal Virgins, Opimia, and Floronia, were detected and attainted of manifelt whoredom: the one of them was buried quick, as the manner was, under the ground at the gate Collina the other killed her felf. L. Cantilius (a Secretary or Scribe unto the Bishops, whom now they call * Minores Pont fices) the party * The Pety who had committed fornication with Floronia, was by the chief or high Pricti to beaten with rods or Minor Pre-Cin the Comitium, that he died under his hand. This heinous fact, and enormous offence falling lates. out among to many misfortunes and calamities, was reckoned, I tay, (as usually it is) for a portentous fign; and therefore the Decemvir's were commanded to fear hand perule the Books of Sibylla, And Q. Fabius Piltor was fent to Delphos, to confult with the Oracle there of Apollo, and to learn, by what prayers and supplications they might pacifie the gods, and what would be the end of so great and seafful miseries. The mean while, our of the searning contained in those books of destinies, there were person certain extraordinary Sacrifices among which a Frenchmantogether with a French woman; likewise a Grecian man and woman, were let down alive in the beaft market into a vault under the ground floned all about: a place aforetime embraced and polluted with the blood of mankind facrificed, but not according to the ceremonies and religi-Don of the Romans. When they had fufficiently (as they thought) parified the gods, M. Claudius Marcillus lent from the haven of Oftia for the defence and guard of the City, 1500, fouldiers; whom he had levied and enrolled for the fervice at lea. Himfelf having tent afore the legion belonging to the Armado (which was the third) with Theanss Sidscinus a Colonel, and delivered the fleet unto P. Furius companion with him in commission: within sew days after made haste, and with great journeys arrived at Canusium. At Rome, by vertue of the Authority of the Senators, M. Junius was created Dictator, and T. Sempronius General of the horse, who proclamed a muster, and enrolled all the younger fort above 17. years old, year, and some also under that age, that yet were in their * Pretexta, and were not come to * Toga virilis, Of these were made up four legions * It was the full, and a thousand horsemen. Likewise they sent unto their Allies, and namely to the Latine na- uppergarment tion, to receive fouldiers from thence according to the form of the league: giving commandment, that harness, weapons, and all other habiliments of war, should be in readiness. Also to used und they furnish out the army, they plucked from the Temples, and publick Galleries and walking Places, were fully 16. the ancient spoils and armor of their enemies. And for very need and want of free men, they were years of age, compelled to devite a new kind of mustering never used before: for they bought up in open mar-with purple, ket, with the City money, 8000, justy strong young men, meer bond-slaves: but they demanded * Otherwise first of every one by himself, whether they were willing to serve in the wars, and so they pur called Pora, & them in armor. And they thought it better to take up and levy fouldiers thus, then to redeem and dateque. buy again their own who were captives, albeit they might have been ransomed for smaller sums because it was of money. For Annibal, after this fo fortunate field fought at Canna, fetting his mind wholly upon the affairs belonging to an absolute conquest, rather then any more wars; caused his captives purple, which to be brought forth, and severed the Roman consederates apart from the rest; and unto them they put on at (4s he had done aforetime at Trebia, and the Lake Thrasymenus) he spake graciously, and sent 17them bome unrantomed. The Romans also he called unto him, and gave them kind and loving words, more then ever he had done before. "What? we and the Romans (quoth he) war not mortally and deadly one with the other to the utmost: nay, our quarrel is rather for honour, and foveraignty. And as my father and progenitors afore me, were subdued of the Romans, and yeeded at length to their valor and prowels: so the only thing that I seek for, and indeas or unto isthis, That they likewife in their alternative turn, may give place unto my felicity and vertue together, And therefore I grant the Romans this favor and liberty, to redeem their prisoners: and this shall be the ransom, for every man of arms I demand * 500 Quadrigate, 300 for a sootman, and 100, for a bondman, And albeit the horsemens rantom was somewhat inhanced, abore that fum which they capitulated for, when they yeelded, yet glad they were ro-accept of any condition and covenant what foever, so it was agreed, that ten out of them should be chosen Voices, togo to Rome unto the Senat: and he took no other pledge for assurance of them but their oath, that they would return again. With them was fent Carthalo, a Noble man of Carthage with committee would return again. With them was tended to offer unto them conditions and to capitulate with them. They were not to foon gone out of the camp, but one of

of them (a man of 10 Roman nature and disposition) made semblance, as if he had forgotten H tomewhat behind him, and to to discharge himself (sortooth) of his oath, returned into the camp, and before night overtook his company again. When word was trought, that they were coming to Rome, there was a Lictor tent out to meet Carthelo upon the way, and to warn him in the name of the Dictator, before night to depart out of the con ines of the territory of Rome. But the Committees of the Captives had audience granted them in the Senat-house by the Dictator. And the principal man among them, Marcus Junius, spake in this manner.

"Right honourable, and my very good LL, of the Senat, There is not one of you all ignorant. of M. Juana to Withat Lener any City whatloever, hath been at less charge for redeeming of prinoners takenin the Sana. "wars, and made to fmail record of them, then ours. But if we be not blinded in our ourse." "wars, and made to small regard of them, then ours. Bur if we be not blinded in our own conceit, and think better of our cause, then there is reason: never were there any souldiers that fell-" into the hands of our enemies more to be accounted of by you then we are. And why? We yeeleded not our weapons in battettor cowardize and fear, but after that we had flood well neer uner til night righting over the dead bodies of our fellows flain, and so maintained the fight to the e very latt, then we retired our felves into the camp. The rest of the day and night following. "not withit anding we were weary with travel, and faint of our hurts, yet we manifully defended " one rampire. The morrow after, when we were befet and invelled round about by the conquecornering, yea and excluded from water; and faw no other hope at all to break throughour e-" nemies, ranged to tirong and close together, and thinking it not a matter of reproof, at dagainst " the law of aims, that when 5000 o, of our Citizens were flain in field, some Roman souldiers y " should remain alice after the battet of Canva; then and not afore, we agreed upon a sum of "money, that being ranfomed, we might be fet at large, and fo we yeelded unto the enemies our "weapons, wherein now we saw no help at all. We have heard likewile, that our ancestors redeemed themselves from the Gauls with a fum of gold; and our fathers also, not withflanding 4. they were most straight ia ed, and hardly brought to a pitulate and compound for peace, yet a fent Embassadors to Tarentum, for to redeem their contents and both those battels, first in have to with the Gauls and then before Haraclea with Pyranu, were not so ignominious and shame-6 fut for the lotle it tell, as for the tright and beattly running away. But the plains of Canza are " covered all over with heaps of Roman bodies; and we that be here had not remained alive af-"ter them, but that the enemies through held out no longer, nor their (word would ier e tokill any more. And yet there be some of our men also who field not back in battel: but being left "behind to guard the camp, were taken priloners by the enemy as well as we, at what time as it "was intrendred into their hands. Certainly, I envy not the fortune, nor repine at the welfare and e good effate of any Citizen or fellow fouldier, neither would I be thought the man, who by de-" bafing another, would feem to advance my felf. But even they verily (unless peradventure good "footmanship and swift running deletve reward) who for the most part fled out of the field un-" armed and never stinted before they gat Verusia or Canusiam over their heads, cannot justly pre-" fer themselves before us nor boast and glory, that they stand the Common weal in better stead "tnen we. Find them you (hall (I doubt not) good men and valorous fouldiers: to shall you us "too, yea, and more ready to do true service to our country, in that by your bounty and good "means we have been ransomed and reflored again into our country. Ye have levied souldiers of "all ages and degrees, and I hear say, there be Soco, bondmen in arms. We are no fewer in num-"ber our felves, and redeemed we may be with as small moneys as they are bought, I say no more "but to for if I should make farther comparison; between us and them, I must do wrong to the "Roman name and nation. This is a special thing moreover (my LL.) which in mine advice ye " are duely to confider in this deliberation, in case ye be so hard-hearted, as to have no regard of "us, or of our defert, namely in whatenemies hand ye leave us. It is with Pyrrhus peradventure, "who used us being his prisoners, like triends and guests. Nay, is he not a Barbarian and Cartha-"ginian? who whether he be more coverous or cruel, can hardly be imagined. O that ye law the "irons and chains, the nafty filthinels and foul ulage of your Citizens. I am affured, you would N " be no less moved and affected to compassion at the fight thereof, then if ye beheld on the other " fide your Legions lying flain all over the plains and fields of Canna. Ye may observe and behold "the forrowful chear, and falt tears of our kinsfolk flanding here in the porch and entry of this "Court, and waiting for your answer. And if they fo fare, and are so pensive for us, and for them "that are absent, what heavy hearts have they themselves (think ye) whose liberty and whose " life lieth now a bleeding? And in good faith, if so be Annibal himself would, contrary to his "nature, be respective and merciful to us, yet should we think our lives did us small good, so long " as we are reputed of you unworthy to be ransomed and redeemed. There returned in times pall " to Rome certain capines, fent home by Pyrrhis without any ranfom paid, but the returned at "Companied with Embiffidors right honorable personages of this City, who had been sentlos of "their redemption. And shall I return unto my country again not esteemed a Citizen worth " 300. Deniers. Enery man hath a mind by him elf, and a fansie of his own my LL. And I wot "well that my body and life is in jeopardy. But I fear more the hazard of honor and good name, "left we should be thought condemned and rejected by you. For the world will never beleeve, "that you did it to spare your purse, and to save money,

When he had made an end of his speech, immediatly the multitude who were gathered together in the common place, let up a lamentable and piteous cry, and he out their hands unto the

A Councel-house, beseeching the LL. of the Senat to let them have and enjoy their children, their brethren, and kinsfolk again. The very women alfo, for fear and necessity, thrust themselves among this prefs of men in the market place. But when all others besides the Senators were voided, they began to debate and confult about the matter in hand. Great variance there was in opinion. Some thought it realon, that their ranfom were disburfed out of the common cheft: others were of mind, that the City should be at no charge at all for their redemption : marry they would not be against it, but that they might be enlarged and delivered at their own cost and expenses. And in case there were any that had not ready coin enough for present payment, the chamber of the City should lend them money, to as the people might have good fecurity, as well by furcties B bound, as by their good and lands, morgaged for the fatisfaction of that debt. And when T. Manlint Torquains, a man of the old world for precise severity, and as most folk thought too too hard and auftere in this point, was demanded his opinion, he spake, by report, to the cause in this

"Ifthe Committees (quoth he) had treated and made fuit, for the redemption of them only The Oration "that are captive in the hands of the enemies, and there staied; it they had not touched the per-"fon of any other besides; I would in few words have knit up my verdict and judgement of them. the Strate "For what need I to have done elie, but put you in mind, and exhort you, to observe the custom "delivered unto you from your ancestors, and to maintain the example, to good and necessary for "the service of war. Sempronius were present here alone whom if these "fellows would have followed as their leader, they had been fouldiers at this day in the Roman "camp, and not captives at the devotion of the enemies. For whiles the enemies were wearied " with fight, joyous and jocund of their fresh victory, and most of them retired into their own n "camp; they might have had the whole night to lave themselves at their pleature; and if that were "not, yet being seven thousand strong, they had been able to have made a lane through them. "were they never forthick, and to have broken away in despight of their hearts. But neither at-"tempted they so much of themselves, nor yet would follow the leading of another. P. "Sempronius, I tell you, had somewhat ado, to pais the ranks and squadrons of his own countrimen, before he could break through the battaillon of his enemies. Longeth our country to have a one of them that fought at Canna, for her Citizens. Of leven thouland armed fouldiers, there u were found 600 that had the heart to break away, maugre the enemies, to escape and return with liberty, and with their armor, home into their country, not withfianding there were forty thoufand enemies to refilt them: how eatily then and fately, deem you, might a power almost of two Legions, have patied through them and gone their ways? Ye had had this day my Lordstwenty "thousand at Canufium, of right brave hardy, and loyal fouldiers. But now which way can thele cowards possibly be reputed true and faithful Citizens (for valiant fouldiers, I am fure, they will "not think themselves, nor take up on them to be, unless a man could be perswaded and beselecte they were fuch) who would have impeached and withflood the reft for getting away even when they were at the point to open a passage; or that they rather do not envy now, both the, "fafery and also the honor of others which they have won by prowels; knowing in their own "conscience, that their timorousnels and cowardliness was the cause of most ignominious and " shameful tervitude. They loved better to close within their pavilions, and to look for theday "light and the enemy together: when as in the flill dead time of the night, they had the appor-Stunity to escape. But how then? Although their hearts failed them to break away out of the " camp, yet to defend the same manually, they had courage and valor enough, Beseged they were. "Affairly beleaguer'd: invested they were day and n ght for a good time and in their armor forced " toffand upon their guard, and manfully they quit therefelves within their rampart, ard at length (God wot) when they had affayed and endured all extremities, when all fuccors failed themfor "intentation of this life; so pinched with hunger and so enfeebled, that they were not able to 66 bear their own atmor and lift up their weapons; overcome at the last, rather with the necessit. "ty of mansfrail nature then by the violence of the enemies they, good men gave over and veel-" ded themselves. Nay torsooth, it is neither so nor so. The morrow morning when the sun arok, "the enemies advanced and approached toward the rampart and within two hours after, with-" out any trial and hazard of skirmith, they delivered up their weapons and themselves, Thus ye "fee what their good iervice was, for two days together. When they should have stood toit in "field, and fought, then they fied back to their tents: when they were to guard and defend their french and rampart, they furrendered them to the enemy; good no where, neither in battelnor "in bastil. I agree to raniom you, you (I say) when you ought to have sallied forth of the camp, te linger behind and flay fill: and when need wat, to abide by it and to defend it like valunt men, "furrender camp, give up your weapons, and yeeld your own bodies to the enemy? Nay, but to " (peak what I think, my fentence is (my LL.) that there fellows deferte no more to be ranformed, "then those to be delivered unto Annibal, who issued out of the camp, pierced through the midth " of the enemies, and most valiantly saved themselves, for to do service another day in their coun-"try .: When Marlius had faid, albeit the prisoners were allied neer in kindred to most of the Senators: yet over and besides the precedent of the City it felf, which never from the first beginning favoured the redemption of fuch fouldiers, as suffered themselves to be taken priloners; the ransom it self, which amounted to a good round sum made them to pause: because they were unwilling both to empty the publick treasury; (having already ditbursed great sums, inbuying up bond-flaves, and arming them for the wats) and also that Annibal (who as the voice went was -at a very great fland for money) should be enriched therby. When this their answer was returned, if to wit, No redemption of captive stable rewas a new fir of weeping and wailing afresh added to the former fortow of the people, and for the loss of the many 2 tear throthey fined, sait aftind ry plaints and moans which they made, they accompanied the Committees above brity adfarks the garry One so the ten went home to his house the sametime, who mbon il fraud hieroffandidaucetoile tenurumade invastyre delibies shimp, as isaforefaid, supposed he had as thirth lung band disburd and the mountainence of his outh, Which theing known and recomted to the Senat, they were all of mind that he should be apprehended, and attended with a good and sufficient guard at the charge of the City, and so carried back to Annibal. There goeth another report of thele Captines, that first there came ten of them as Committees: and whenitws debated in the Senat and doubt made, whether they should be admitted into the City or no il they were at length received, but 10, as that they had no audience in the Senat: and upon longer flay made then they looked for, three others followed after them to wit; L. Scribonius, C. Calpurnius; and L. Manlius. Then by mediation of one Tribun of the Com; a kiniman of Scribonius, the matter was propounded in the Senat concerning the ranfom of the captives; but granted it would not be: whereupon the three latter Committees returned to Annibal, and the other tenthat fint came, remained fill behind : who upon a colourable occasion, had made an errand back to Antibal, when they were well onward on their way, to take a note, for footh, of the names of theprifoners, and thereby leemed to have diwharged their conscience of the oath. Also, that in the nat there was hard hold, much question and variance, about the delivering of them again into the hands of Annibal: and how at last, they who were of opinion to have them rendered and lentbut, failed of their purpoles by reason they came short by some voices and opinions, and that theo other fide carried it cleans way. But by the next Cenforsthat came in place, they were so multed and branded with all notes of diserace and shame, that some of them immediatly made themicks away with their own hands: and the rest forbare, not only the common place and market all their life time after, but also came not abroad, in manner, to be feen in the very freet, and never losked out of their doors. Thus a man may rather marvel, that authors should so differ among them selves, than from any of them pick out and discern the truth. But how much greater this overthrow and loffe at Canna was, than any other before time, appeareth by this evident argument, in that those Allies, which ever to that day stood fast and sure unto them, now fell to thrink and fail: and furely for no earthly thing elfe, but because they began to despair of the main chance of the whole State and Empire. For hereupon there revolted unto the Carthaginians, the Attellans, the Calatins, the Hirpins, a part of the Apulians, all the Samnits, except the Petellins all the Brutii in general, and the Lucans. And more then these, the Surrentins, and the whole trast wellneer, of the Greeks along the fea coast. The Tarentins, Metapontins, the Crotonians, the Locrians, and all the Gauls within the Alps. And yet for all these defeats, and rebellions of their Allies n and Subjects, were not the Romans one whit enclined to make any mention of peace, neither before the coming of the Conful, nor yet after that he was returned, and renewed again the dolorous remembrance of that woful overthrow received. And even at that very instant, so high minded was the City, and so far from drooping and being cast down, that as the Con'ul returned homeward from fo great a defeat, whereof himself only was a principal cause, he was not only met upon the way by all the States and companies of the City in great numbers, but also highly thanked, in that he despaired not of the State of the Common-weal: who, if he had been the General and Leader of the Carthaginians, should have been sure to have smoaked for it, and endured all extremity for torment and punishment.

"these for her Crizens ? who if the rest had been like them, should by this day, have had never

The three and twentieth Book

The Breviary of L. Florus upon the three and twentieth Book.

"He Campans revolted unto Annibal Mago was fent to Carthage, with news of the victory at Can-In a : and in the entry of the Councel-House, he poured out (on the floor) the golden rings which had been plucked from the fingers of the Romans there flain, which by report exceeded the measure of a Modius. Upon these tidings, Hanno the noblest personage among all the Carthaginians, perswaded with the Senat of Carthage, to five unto the people of Rome for peace, but he prevailed not, by veilon of the Barchin fide and faction, that gain-faid him. Cl. Marcellus the Pretor fought fortunally before Nola, in a fally which he made out of the town against Annibal. The Army of Annibal fell to riot at Capua, and gave themselvs to such sensuality, while they wintred there, that both in bodily strength, and also in courage of mindthey became much enfeebled. Casilinum was besieged by the Carthaginians, and the inhabitants within were driven by extream famine, to eat thongs and leatherings, plucked from off their fields and targets yea, and to feed upon Mife and Rats. They lived with Nuts which the Roman fent unto them down the river Vulturous. The body of the Senat was replenified by receiving unto them a new Supply from out of the order of Knights or Gentlemen, to the number of 197, L. Posthumius the Pretor. was together with his army defeated by the Gauls, and put to the Sword. Cneus and Publius Scipioes, vanguished Aldrubal in Spain, and had the conquest thereof. The remnant of the army defeated at Cannæ was sent away and confined into Sicily, and commanded not to depart from thence, before the war was fully finished. A league and society was concluded between Philip the King of the Macedonians and Annibal. Sempronius Gracehus the Conful, discomfited and slew the Campans. Moreover, this book containeth the fortunate exploits archieved by T. Manlins the Lord Deputy in Sardinia, against the Carthaginians and the Sardi: who took the General himself Asdrubal, together with Mago and Han-no, prisoners. Claudius Marcellus the Pretor vanguished and defeated in a set battel before Nola, the army of Annibal: and was the first that put the Romans in some good hope of better saccess, after they had been toiled out with so many foils and losses.

Now there was a Citizen of Confa named Trebius, a noble personage and of great name in his country. But the bend and section of the Confanes (a family of great power, by savour of the Romans) kept him down and over-weighed him: but after the same of the battel of Canna and the coming of Annibal, divulged and blown abroad by H the speeches of Trebius those Cossanes abandoned the City and so was it without any conflict rendered unto the Carthaginians, and received a garrison. Annibal leaving behind him there, all the pillage and baggage that he had, divided his army into two parts : giving Mago in charge, to possels himself of the towns of that country, which would revolt of themselves from the Romans: or else to force them thereunto, in case they denied and refused so to do. Himself took his journey through the land of Campane, toward the nether sea, intending to assault Naples, that he might be Lord of a Port Town also, and have it at his devotion. When he was entred the confines of the Neapolitans, he placed some of the Numidians in Ambush, as cunningly as he could, (and there for the most part, the wayes are hollow, and full of close and ferret ! nooks and holes others he commanded to make a shew of driving away a booty out of the fields. and to ride out braving before the gates of the City. Against whom (seeming to be not many, and those disordered a troop of horsmen issued forth, but the enemies of purpose giving back and resiring from them, led and trained them on, to the place of ambush: and so they were environed on every fide, and there had not one of them escaped alive, but that the sea was neer, where they espied many fisher boats along the shore on the bank side, and as many of them as were skillulin fwimming, gat unto them, and faved themselves: but in that shirmish nevertheless certain young gentlemen were flain, Among whom, Hegeas also, the Captain of that Cornet of horsemen died in the place, who followed too hotly upon them that retreated & seemed to file, But Annibdatter he had viewed the walls, and faw they were not easie to be won, was discouraged and sared K from giving affault to that City, From thence he turned his journey, and took his way to Capaa, a City flowing in wealth and superfluity of all pleasures, by reason of long selicity, and the larourable aspect of gracious fortune. But among all corruptions that there raigned, it was infected most with the licentious looleneis of the Commons, who exceeded beyond all measure, and abufed their liberty. Pasuvius Calavius, a man of noble race there, and popular withal, but one that by lewd and indirect courses became rich and mighty, by means thereof, had both Senat & Com, under his girdle, and might do what he would. This man chanced to be head Magistrate the same year that the Romans were descated and overthrown at the Lake Thrasymenus: and supposing that the Commonalty (who had been a long time maliciously affected to the Senat and Nobility) would by occasion of alteration in the State, enterprise some notable act to wit, (in case Annibal L should come with his victorious army into those parts) the murdering of the Senat, and delivering of Capita into the Catthaginians hands. This man I fay, lewd and bad enough otherwise, but yet not frark naught and wicked in the highest degree: and desirous to lord it, and domineer with the lafety of the Common-wealth, rather then with the utter destruction of the same; as knowing ful wel that no State could remainfale, spoiled and bereft once of a publick counsel: cast about and plotted, how he might both fave the Senate, and also oblige the same to be at his and the Commons devotion, Heassembled therfore the Senat one day together, and after he had protesest with a solemn preamble, " That in no case he would like & allow of the designment and intent of revolting from the Romans, unless it were upon necessity and constraint: for as much as him-"felf had married the daughter of Appins Claudens, and had fair iffue by her and befides affianced "a daughter of his own in marriage unto Livius in Rome: but yet (quoth he) there is a matter of or greater confequence toward, and a danger like to burft out more to be feared then that Forthe "Commons intend not by way of tevolt and rebellion to rid the City of the Senators authority, but are purposed to massacre all the Senators, and so to deliver unto Annibal and the Carthage "nians, the Common wealth-clearly void of a Senat. Of which imminent peril (quoth he)I know "how to free you, in case you will wholly trust and rely upon me, and forget all former jars, and " old debates, which have fallen out in governance and managing of the Senat. Now when all of them in place, for fear were forced to put themselves into his hands: I will, quothhe) for " you up within the Councel-Chamber, and pretend unto them, as though I were one of their complices, both privy and party to this intended practife of theirs: and so by soothing them up, N " under a colourable approbation and allowance of their defignments, which I should in vain "crofs and gain-fay, I shall find out a ready way to save all your lives. And for affurance bereof, ask and have of me what bond and security ye will your selves. Thus having made his faithful promile to be fast and true unto them, he went forth, and commanded the Councel-House dores to be shut sure, and lest warders to keep the gate and entry thereof, that no man without his license and commandment, should either enter in, or come forth. Then after helad called all the people together to an audience, in a folemn and frequent affembly, thus he spate unto them. "That which ye have often wished for (O ye Campans, my good neighbors and "friends) namely, to have the power and mean to revenge your felves throughly of this wife colvoins to the " ked and cursed Senat, now lieth inyour hands to perform with fafety at your pleasure. Andst Commons of "need not by way of an uproar to affault their houses one after another, to the great danger and

A 4But above all things ye must have an eye and look to this, that proceed ye not too much in heat and choler but that ye have more regard of your own lafety and profit, than of ire and re-"venge. For (I take it) they be these Senators only whose persons ye hate and detest; and your e mesning is not wholly to put down and overthrow the Senat quite : for either ye mult accept "of a King (Ogovernment abhomittable) or elfe admit a Senat, the only Council indeed of a tree "City and State and therefore with one bulh (as they fay) ye are to go stop two gaps, and to do "both at once, namely, to abolifh and depose the old Senat, and to elect a new, I will command "that the Securors shall be cited by name one after another and concerning their life and death. "I will demand your opinion and refolute tentence and look what judgment ye give, shall fureat le fland and be out in execution. But before the condemned guilty person be done to death, ye R " hall (abifrare in his room a new Senator, fome good man of valour and courage, and worthy " to succeed in his piece. With that he fat him down. And after all their names were thrown into a lottery pincher and shuffled together, he caused him to be cited and called aloud by name. and the man him telf to be brought forth of the councill- House whose names chanced to be drawn out first. He was no conner named, but every man cried out, that he was a lewd and wicked per-son, and worthy to be hanged. Then Passicius said, I see (quoth he) what destinic ye presagethis man. Rejected he is and cast out for nanght and unjust : choose now a good Senator, and a righteous to his room. At the first, all was filent, and as still as midnight, for default of finding a better to place in his fread. Afterwards, when some odde groom, palt all shame and reverence, seemed to nominate one : by and by they grew to much louder words, and greater clamors: white fome faid flatly that they knew not the man, others laid to his charge fundry lewd and naughty vices, and obieched against him either abject balenels, poverty and beggery, or elfe tome dishonest kind of trade and occupation, whereby he lived. Thus fared they and much worfe a great deal, when a fecond or third Senator was named : fo as it was well feen, that the men bethought themselves and repented of that they had done stready, confidering how they failed fill and were to feek, when they should substitute another in his place . for asmuch as it booted not, but was absurd to nominate the lame again, fince that their nomination gained them nothing but either to hear their vices deciphered, or to be ar reproachfull terms : and as for all the reft, they were far more vile and obleure perions, than those that came first into their remembrance, and were soonest thought upon. So the people fell at length, and gently came down to this point, and confessed, that, Much D better was bad they knew, then bad they knew not; and feldome came the better : willing the old Squators to be let out of ward and enlarged. By this policy Pacarons having bound the Senat to himlelf, more then to the Commons, and even as much as their life was worth; without force of arms ruled the rolt and all was at his devotion and command. Hereupon the Senators laid afide the temembrance of their own dignity, port, and liberty, became affable to the Commons and would falute them kindly : inviting them courteoully, and entertaining them liberally at their boords with exquisite and delicate fare : undertaking and maintaining all their sais and causes : ready at all times to affish them, and stand by them a and in one word, empanelling Juries (to go upon all canies and matters in law Jof thole whom they knew to be gracious and popular, and fitter to win and procure the favour and affection of the common fort. Thus at the Councel-

E Table all matters were decided, as if the Commons had there fat, and not otherwife. This Capua was a City ever given to diffoline life and excels in pleasure, as well by reason of the naturall corruption and infet disposition of the inhabitants, as also for the plenteous and flowing abundance of all delights, and the alluring inticements of all dainties, that either fea or land might affoord. But at that time such was the obsequious fawning and the flattery of the Nobles, such was the licentious living of the Commons) they were so lavish, that they exceeded in lust and superfluity beyond measure, and laid it on in expense without stay, Besides their contempt of laws, Magistrates, and Senat, they grew to this pass after the overthrow at Canne, that whereas before they had some awfull and reverend regard of the Romans, now they despited and set naught by the government and Empire of Rome; and nothing elfeltood in the way, but that prefently F they would have rejected their rule, and shaken off the youk of obedience and allegeance, saving only this, That by reason of ancient entercourse of crosse and mutual marriages, many noble houies and mighty families were linked and allied to the Romans : and again, which was the greatest bond of all, whereas there had served in the Roman wars, certain of them, there were three hundred men of arms, and those of noblest birth of all the Campans, chosen out of them and sent by the Romans to be refiant in fundry garrifons of the Cities of Steely: whole fathers and kinsfolk (withmuch ado) obtained, that Embaffadors should be sent unto the Conful of Rome. They found the Conful at Fennsia with a few fouldiers, and those armed by the halves (for as yet he was not gone to Canafiam) being in that poor taking and hard plight, as he could not be in worfe; either to move pity in the hearts of true and well affected allies, or to breed contempt in proud G and hollow-hearted friends, such as these Campons were. Contemptible was their case, but the Columnde himself and his condition more despited, by bewraying too much his present distresses, & laying open to the world the nakedness of his calamity. For when the Embaffadors delivered unto him, That the Senat and people of Capua took it to the heart, and greatly grieved at the adverse overth; ow of the Romans, and promited therewith, to furnish him with all things fit and The Oration meet for war a 4 Ye have (quoth he) O Campans, observed an order and custom, and for form and of Varro to falling on the control of the control of Varro to fall fundaments of war. And therefore ye are not, O Campans, to aid and help up in this war; but in our behalf, and for us, ye ought to take the whole charge of the war upon your "own selves, against the Carthaginians. Call to remembrance how in times past, when your an-" ceftors and forefarhers were fearfully driven to keep within your wals, flanding in dread and " bodily fear, not of the Samnits only your enemies, but allo of the Sidicios - we took them into " our protection, and defended them before Sarricula: and how for your takes we began war " wirh the S mnits, and fi intrined the fame for the space of an hundred years, and ingreat " variety of fortune, giving and t king fundry foils all the whiles. A worthy honour and immortall glory it will be 66 for you, Oye Campans, if the Roman Empire and dominion, thus growing to ruin and falling " down proftrate under the weight of this late overthrow, might by your fidelity and forcible " power bestaid and upneld, and tet upright again. I suppose ye have levied and enrolled alrea-"dy thirty thouland toot, and tout thouland horie, out of the Campain . for coin, for corn, ye have fifter and plenty : Now if your faith and truth be antwerable to your wealth and fortune, nei-"ther shall Anmbal had that he hath won the victory, nor the Romans feel that they have lost s a journey. With this Oration thus ended, the Conful gave the Embassadors their discharge, and dismissed them. As they returned homewards, one of them, Sabius Virius by name, faid thus unto his fellows. " Now is the day come (quoth he) wherein the Campans may be able of not only to recover again the lands which in times past the Romans have wrongfully taken 61 from them, but also obtain and enjoy the toveragin tule and Empire of Italy. As for Annibal, we "may conclude covenant & capitulat with boat while articles and conditions as we lift our felves, " to our best behoof and benefit : And it is all to nothing, that Annibal having now dispatched N " and finished the war, will of his own coord depart like a Conqueror into Affrick, and with-"draw his forces out of thele pasts : fo as the dominion of Italy shall be left wholly to the pople of Capua. Virius had no fooner delivered mele speeches, but they all applauded him and accorded thereto. And in such terms they related their Embassage, as all men thought no less but the Roman Empire and name was unterly perished and extinct for ever. Incontinently the Commons and the greatest part of the Nobility of Cagua enclined to revolt and rebell : Yet by the countenance and authority of the accients and Liders the matter was staid and deferred for some few daies. At length the greater part prevailed, whose opinion was, that the same Embassadors which were sent to the Roman Consul should be addressed in embassie unto Annibul. But I find in some Annal-records, that beforethey went, and vefore their resolute determi- 0 nation to revolt, there was an Embanage tent from the Capuans to the City of Rome demanding thus much, That if they meant to have any aid and help from them, one of their Coniuls migh be a Capuan. Whereat the Senat of Rome took fuch fourff and indignation that the faid Emballa dors were commanded to void the Council-Houle, and a Serjeant tent after them at their hed to let them out of the City : charged them at their perill, to take up their lodging that nigh without the territories of Rome. But because this demand jumpeth too near to the like that the

A Latines made long before: and both Calina and other Historians have (not without good reason) passed it over and said nothing thereof, I dare not avow it for a truth. Well, Embassadors there came unto Annibal, and concluded peace with him under these conditions, and covenants: Insprimis, That no General, Captain, or Magistrate of the Carthaginians should have any jurisdiction or power over a Citizen of Capua: Item, That no Citizen of Capua stould be compelled against his will to serve in any wars, or execute the charge and office of a souldier. Item, That the Campans Hillenjoy their old Laws and Magistrates of their own: Item, That Annibal deliver unto the Campans three hundred Roman Captives, such as they themselves shall choose; whom they might courie and exchange for these three hundred horsemen of the Campans that were in B garrison, and served for pay in Socily. These were the Articles of the accord. But the Campans tuck not to do more than fo, and to go farther than eneir capitulations: committing divers and fundry outrages. For the Commons juddenly at once apprehended all the Roman Captives over the confederate fouldiers, yea, and attached other Citizens of Rome, that were either employed in any military charge, or otherwise occupied in their private affairs: and caused them to be clapt up within the floves and hot houses, as in ward and tafe custody, where their breath being stuffed and flopped up with exceeding heat, and fleaming vapours they were stifled, and died miserably. But there was one Decim Magins, a man who wanted no means of foveraign authority, but onlythefobriety, diferetion, and wisdom of the Citizens with whom he lived; who withstood all that ever he could such enormous and audacious courses, and endeavoured to hinder the Embaffage fent to Annibal. And fo foon as he heard that Annibal was fending a garrison he recounted unto his fellow Citizens the proud and lordly rule of Pyrehas, the milerable and wretched thraldom of the Tarentines, as precedents sufficient to give them warning. He ceated not to cry aloud in open place and audience, first, that they should not receive the garrison into the City: then, that being admitted, they should either be thrust our again; or rather if they would explate and make amends by some valiant and memorable act for that shamefull lend part of theirs in revolting fo from their most ancient Allies, yea, and kinimen by blond, they should full upon the Carthaginian garrison, and kill them every one, and so reconcile themselves again to the Romans. Annil al having intelligence of these plots (for they were not a forging and contriving in a corner) first lent certain messengers to summon Magins to repair unto his presence within his Camp. D After that, feeing he flourly denied to go, (for he pleaded that Annibal had no anthority nor right to command a Citizen of (apua) he waxed wroth, and commanded the man to be apprehended, and to be haled perforce bound unto him. But fearing upon better advice, left by offering such violence some tumult mightarise, and in the heat of bloud break forth into an inconfiderate fray, he dispatched beforehand a messenger of purpose unto Marins Blosses, the Pretor or L. Governor of Capua: fignifying, that the morrow next following he would be perfornally in Capua: and so with a small guard about him, he set forth of his Camp, and put himself on his journey. Marius affembled the people together, making proclamation, and warning them to be ready in all frequent folemnity, with their wives and children, to meet Annibal upon the way. They of the adverse side unto Magias and the Romans performed this nor only E obediently, but also most effectually, and with great diligence and endeavour. Yea, the common fort likewise were very forward in this action, as defirous especially to see this great General and brave warrior, so noble and renowned for his many victories. Decius Magins neither wentforth to meet him, nor yet kept his house, because he would not seem to sear and carry a guilty conscience: but walked up and down idly for his pleasure in the Market place with one of his sons, and a few of his vassals and followers, whiles the whole City besides was bushly occupied, and much troubled in the entertaining and beholding of this great Captain and Commander of the Carthaginians. Annibal being entred the City, incontinently required to have audience in their Council-House, Whereupon, the Nobles and principall Citizens of Capus requested him that he would not that day intend any weighty matters of importance, but himself in person solem-F nize it with joy and mirth, as an high and feathivall holiday for his welcome thither. And albeit he was by nature hafty, and ready to fall into fits of anger, yet because he would not feem at his first coming to deny them any thing, he employed a good part of that day in seeing and viewing the City. Entertained and lodged he was and his whole train with the Manii, Celeras, Stenius, and Pacuvius, the most noble and honourable perioniges, and the wealthiest of all others. This theruntohim, Pacuvius Calavius (concerning whom I spake before, the principal man of that bendand faction, which reduced the City to the obedience and devotion of Annibal) brought his ownson a young Gentleman, and said withall, that the youth kept continually with Decim, and that he was fain to pluck him away from his company and train, whole part he rook, and fluck most stiffly to him, in maintaining the old society and amity of the Romans, against G the new League with the Carthaginians; and neither the bending and inclination of the whole City to the contrary fide, nor yet the reverent majefly of a father, had yet driven him from his obstinate resolution. And for that time the father laboured with Annibal rather by way of prayer and intreaty, than by excusing and clearing his son, that he would not be discontented nor displeased with the young man. So he was overcome with the importunate request and plentifull teares of the father, and gave commandment, that he together with his father should be bidden to supper, at which feast he purposed to have the company of no other guests of all Capua, but only of his hostess that have him entertainment, and one Jubellius Taurea, a famous and brave warrior. To support hey went long before day-light went down, and fared at H the table, not after the guife of Orthaginians nor according to the discipline of fouldiers, but after the order of a City and house, which had been used a long time to have the boord furnished with fundry forts of dainty dishes, and with all delicate junkets to please the palate and talle. Perolla only the fon of Calavina, could not be brought to change his mind, and shew himself cheerful and merry at meat, not withflanding the Mafters of the feast, and Annibal himself otherwhiles invited him to bear them company, and fit with them; but he ever made his excuse to his father, that he was ill at ease and fickly when loever he seemed to examine him, and to know the cause of such wonderful trouble of mind, and vexation of spirit, So, a little afore sun-setting, when his father arole, and was gone out from supper, he followed hard after him: and when they were come into r a fecret place apart, (a garden it was on the back fide of the houle). I will tell you a thing father, 6 I have in my head a policy, and a ready mean, how we shall not only obtain pardon at the Remans hands for our trespass committed, infalling away from them, and turning to Annibal: but "also how we Campans may be in far greater estimation and favour among them than ever we " were. The father marvelling hereat, was defirous to know what device that might be: and with that the youth calt his gown from off his shoulders, and shewed him a good blade girdedto his fide. I will, quoth he, out of hand, establish and seal fure the Roman League with the blond " of Annibal. I was defirous (tather) to let you know of it aforehand, if peradventure you would be willing to be out of the way when the deed is a doing. The old man feeing and hearing this, in agreat fearfull agony, as if he had been present to see the execution of that which he stead & him to speak of, 6 Now I beseech thee, my ion (quoth he) and pray thee of all loves and bonds that bind children and parents together, that thou wilt not before thy fathers face either com-"mit or suffer this io horrible a part, full of all abominable wickedness whatsoever, and not to be " named. There are not many hours time that we iware by all the gods and holy hallows in hea-" ven, and by joyning hand in hand, made faithful promife, and obliged our felves to communicate together with him, and to eat at the holy table of facred viands. And are we no fooner "departed alunder from our familiar conference and parley, but we arm our felves against him? "Ariselt thou indeed from thy friends guest-boord, to which thou wert thy self a third man bid-"den of all the Campans, and even by Annibal, and wilt thou frain and pollute that boord with "the bloud of the principal guest? I, thy father, erewhile was able to reconcile Annibal to my I "fon; and can I not pacifie my fonlike wife, and appeare his fierce from ack against Annibal? But "if their be nothing facred and inviolable, nothing to be trutted in the world, neither faithfull " promise nor religious oath, nor any piety at all and good nature, things so honest and just then "adventure hardly, and spare not to put in execution all actions detestable and not to be spoken, so that besides the note and infamous mark of wickedness, they bring not upon our own "heads present mischief, and utter consusion. Darest thou alone assail the person of Annibal? What will that multitude about him do the while, so many freemen and bondmen both? All "their guard and regard all their eyes upon him alone what serve they for? What will become of 6 fo many hands of theirs? Thinkest thou that they will be benummed and dead at the time of " that frantick enterprise of thine? The grim viluge of Annibal himself, whom whole armies of " fouldiers tremble to behold: who the people of Rome dread, and for fear of whom they quake "again, wilt thou alone abide to ice? And if all other means of help should fail him, wilt thou "endure to strike and wound me thy father, putting my body between for the safegard and de-"fence of Annibal? And flab me thou must through the very heart, before thou canst hurt him cor run him through. Suffer therefore thy felf here to be frighted from this thy intended milchief, before thou have the foil there, and miss of thy purpose. Let my prayers take place with thee, "as once this day they prevailed for thee. With that, he marked his son to weep and shed tears, and embracing him about the middle, and kiffing him ever and anon, he left him not, nor gave over to pray & entreat him instantly, until he got at his hands to lay off his fword, and promife him faithfully, that he would not attempt any luch enterprise. Then the youth, seeing hown the casestood, "I will (quoth he) pay unto my natural sather that kindness and love, in which "I am bound as a debtor to my native Country. But alas for you, good father, I am right forty "for your hard hap; who are to answer before God and the world, for the betraying of your "country no fewer times than thrice already. Once, when you gave countell and periwaded to forlake the Romans, and to revole from them: again, when you were the principall agent, and "advised to make peace with Annibal: and now this day the third time, when you are the only " obstacle and hinderance that Capua is not reflected again into the hands of the Romans. O " fweet countrey and native foil of mine, take here at my hands this fword, wherewith erewhile "I was girt and armed for dear love of thee and was fully minded to defend this thy chief Calle "and Fortreis, and not to spare, but embrue it in the bloud of thy mortall enemy : take it I say, o "fince my own father is ready to wrest it from me. This said, he flung his sword over the garden wall into the high way and open fireet: and therewith, because he would not grow into any suspicion, he shewed himself again to the guels within the house, and took part of the banquet. The morrow after, the Senate in (avour of Annibal folemnly met together in great number: in which frequent affembly, the beginning of his speech was very pleasant and gracious: wherein hegave the Capuans thanks, for preferring his amity before the alliance of the people of Rome: and among other fair and magnificall behelts to them made, he promifed that within a while,

A Cajua should be the head City and chief State of all Italy, whereunto the people of Rome, together with other nations, should refort for law and justice." Mary, quoth he there is one that hath "no part or fellowship in the ociety and league made between the Carthaginians and you, name-"ly, Magins Decins, who neither was a Campan nor ought of right to be to called and reputed: "him I demand to be delivered into my hands, and that in my presence the Senate should be af-"ked their opinion concerning his trelpass, and an Act presently entred thereof. All of them there aftembled allowed of the motion, and gave their aftent in the end: albeit a great fort of them thought both the man unworthy of that hard fortune and calamity, and that this was but an ill beginning and a very overture to the infringing of the right of their freedom. The chief Ma-Builtrate then went forth of the Council-Chamber, and late in the Judiciall Hall or Temple, and commanded Decrus to be attached, and to stand before him at his feet, and there to answer for himself and make his desence. Who persisted still in the same stoutness and boldness of spirit, aledging that by vertue of the covenants in the League compriled, he might not lawfully be preffed and forced thus far. Whereupon he had irons clapt upon him, and commandment was given that he should have a Lictor attend upon him, and to be conveighed into the Camp of Annital, All the way as he was led, to long as he was bare-headed and open-faced, he went preaching to the multitude that flocked about him, and with a loud voice pake and laid: " Now Capuans, ye have the liberty that ye fought and longed for. In the open market place, at noon-day, and in your "fight, lo how I, a man inferior to none in all Capna, am led away bound in chains to die, What C "greater violence could be offered if Capua were won by affault of the cnemy? Go forth, go and meet Annibal adorn and hang the City with rich cloath of capiflry, Register in your Kalender, "among other holidaies, this day of his Entry, that in the end ye may behold this goodly triumph "over one of your own Citizens. Upon the utterance of these words, the multitude icemed discontented at the indignity of this fight. Whereupon he was hoodwinked, and his head covered and the Serjeant was charged to have him away quickly, and make halte out of the gates, So, he was brought into the Camp, and immediatly shipped and fent to Carthage, for tear lest some commotion might arile in Capua, upon so unworthy and shamefull a deed: and left the Senar alto should repent themselves, that they had delivered and yielded out of their hands a principal personage among them: also to prevent that no Embassage might be sent unto him for his redelin very, whereby he should either offend his new Allies, in case he denied them their first request, or fuffer Capua to have alwaies a busic and feditious Citizen ready ever to stir up new troubles, if he granted their fuit. The ship wherein he was embarked, was by a tempest cast upon Cyrena; a port town in the dominion at that time of the KK. There, Magins fled for refuge as to a Sanctuary, unto the Image of King Pholomeus, and was brought by his guard and keepers unto Alexandrid to the Kings presence, and enformed the King, how contrary to the tenorand priviledge of the covenant he was in bonds by Armibal. Whereupon he was loosed from his chains, and put to the choice, whether he would return to Capua, of go to Rome. Magins answered that he could not in Capua remain in fafety, and if he went to Rome, at that time especially when there was war between the Romans and the Capuans, he should be sooner lodged there in a prison like a sugitive runnagate, E than entercained in house for a friend and loving guest a indiconcluded in the end, that he would make abode and live the rest of his daies more willingly in no place of the world, than in his highness Realm whom he found already to be the saviour of his life, and the redeemer of his liberty and enlargement.

Whilethese occurrents fell out abroad, Q. Fabius Pittor, sent (as is above said) Embassador to Delphos, returned to Rome, and out of a writing he read openly, the answer of the Oracle in these words (now ye must understand, that in this Script were certain gods and faints named, unto whom they should make folerun supplication, and the thanner also with all ceremonies and complements thereto belongings) " Then O Romans) if yelliall to do, your frate thall profper and be more happy: your Common-weal thall go forward better to your mind yea; and victory in the F" wars shall happen unto the people of Rome. But remember that when all things shall go well on "your fide; and your Stafe fliall be faved and preferred, ye lend unto Pythius Apollo a prefent, ac-"cording to the merit of a due recompence" and of the filver railed of the pillage, prizes, and " spoilstakefistrom the enemies, do him honour accordingly. After he had reheared these words, truly translated out of the Greek Original then he said moreover, That so toom as he was departedfrom the Oracle, the prefently facrificed into all those gods with frankincense and wine; Also, that he was commanded by the Priett of Mphile, that like as he both came to the Oracle, and also celebrated fatrifices, crowned with a garland and chapler of Laurel, lo he should in the same manner adorned take flip and be imbarked, and not lay off the faid garland before he was arrived to Rome. Finally, that all ceremonies performed most precisely and diligently, which he was com-Gananded to observe, he had laid and bellowed the said chapter upon the altar, before the Shrine of Applie at Rome, Then the Senate made a decree, That those facrifices and supplications should with all speed and carefull regard be celebrated.

For these to many and to worthy victories, he required (meet and require it was) that there should be a solemn testival day holden and facrifices tolemnized to the honour of the immortal gods. And for the betteraffurance of these lucky and fortunate atchievements, and to verifie his words, he caused the sold rings of the Romans, flain at Canza, to be poured forth in the porch and entry of the Council-House. And incale now (which God forbid) fortune should chan e to change and turn her wheel hope ye to have peace then being overcome. "which now when we are conquerors, no man offreth nor teeketh after. For mine own part, "if anyman should ask mine opinion of peace, either to present and tender it to the enemies, "orto accept it at their hands, I wot well what to fay : but if ye would know what I think conseeming those demands of Mago, my advice is, that there is no sence nor reason to send aid and " funnies to conquerors : now it they bear us in hand, delude, and abuse us with a vain and false "periwation of conquest and victory, much leis a great deal. These remonstrances of H. nno took small effect with many of them: for, both the fectet grudge and rancor which he bare to the Bar, hin House, much impeached his credit and authority, and also by reason that their minds were to fully possessed of the present joy, they could admit and abide to hear of nothing, that night found otherwise to daunt their glad hearts; thinking verily that the war would toon be at an end if they now would fir ain a little and help it forward. And therefore with great confent, there passed an A& of the Senat, That there should be a supply sent unto Annibal of forty thoufand Numidians, forty Elephants, and many talents of filver. Also the Distator was sent before with Mago into Spain to leavy and hire twenty thousand footmen, and four thousand horsemen for to make up those broken armies which were in Italy and in Spain. But these matters (as mully it happeth in time of prosperity) were performed but slackly and at leiture. The Romans contrariwite made more speed, as being by nature more industrious: and besides, such was their adverse fortune and extremity. that they might not neglect their affairs and go flowly about D their business. For neither the Conful was wanting in any affairs that were by him to be managed: and the Distator M. Jun. Brutus, to toon as he had performed all the complements concercerning facrifices and religious ceremonies, proposed unto the people, That (as the usual) manner was) he might mount on horieback. Which done, over and befides the two legions of Citizens, which in the beginning of the year had been levied and enrolled by the Confuls, and the bondflaves that were before multred, and certain fourdrons gathered together out of the Piceine and Gauls country, he proceeded to the last remedy and succour of a distressed and well near desperatestate, when as honest and direct courses must give place unto commodious and profitable policies, and alight from his horie, and made proclamation, That who foever were guilty and condemned of any capital crime, or wholoever were imprisoned for debt, and would willingly serve under him he would take order that they should be exempt from all punishment, and discharged from their creditors, And of such he armed fix thousand with the spoils of the Gauls, which in the triumph of Flamenius were carried in shew. Thus he departed from Rome five and twenty thoufand strong.

Annibal having possessed himself of Capua, and sollicited the Neapolitans once again, and founded their minds, proposing before their eyes fear and hope, and all in vain, led his forces into the Country of N.la, with this mind, not at first to go roughly with them to work, and by way of open hollility, because he was not out of all hope, that they would willingly come off and yield them elves: but in cale they wavered, and answered not his hope and expectation in some good time, he would furely proceed against them in all extremity, and put them to whatsoever they could endure or fear. The Senate, and especially the principall of them, continued fall and fure in their alliance with the people of Rome: But the commons (as their manner is, defirous of alteration and to see a new wor.d) enclined wholly to the side of Annibal, calling many doubts, and fears, that their lands and possessions should be wasted and spoiled with stindry calamities and indignities that tollow upon fiege: neither wanted there heads and ring-leaders of a rebellion. Whereupon the Senate (for lear left if they should seem to thwart and cross them, they had not been able to withit and the violence of the multitude once up and drawn to an head closely diffembled their intent and purpose, and so by temporizing, prevented a present mischief. For they made semblance that they liked well, and were resolved of revolting unto Aimibal. but upon what conditions and capitulations they should enter into new league and amity. they knew nor certainly. So having taken a farther time they dipar hed in hafte certain Embaffadors unto the Roman Prætor Marcellus Claudous, who remained with the army at Carofium, advertifing him in how great jeopardy the state of Nolastood, to wit That Annil al was already Lord of their ands and the Carthaginians would loon be matters of the City unless they were fuccoured and rejeved : that their Senat were driven to this shift for o yield unto the Commons, and grant to revo t whenfoeverthey would have them; and by that means flaid them that they rebelled not over halfily. Marcellus after he had commended the Nolans willed them with the same diffimulation to protract time and hold off until his coming: and in the mean while to conceal and keep lecret to themselves, the dealings and treaties with him, and in no case to be known of any hopethey had of aid from the Romans. Himself went fron Canafium, to Calaria, H and from thence passed over the river Vulturnus, and by the way of Satricula and Trebia, journeyed over Suelfula through the mountains and arrived at Nola. A little before the coming of the Roman Przetor, Anmbal was departed and gone out of the Territory of Nola, and drew downwards to the fea-fide near unto Neap lis: his teeth watered at the Port-town, and that out of Affrick his ships might arrive thither, as to a sale and sure harbour. But after that he heard that N ples was held by a Roman Provolt, M. Junitu Syllanus (sent for thither by the Neapolitans themselves) and had received a garriton: seeing becould not be admitted into Neapolis, no more than into Nola, he went to Nuceria. Having beleas bered in round a long time, and often assumed it forcibly, and affaied to follicit as well the Commons as the Nobility, but without effect; at the I length by famine he forced them to yield, and to became mafter of the Town upon composition. That they should depart every man disarmed in their single garments. Then, as one that would feem ever from the beginning, to use clemency to all Italians, but only the Romans; he made fair promites of great rewards and advancement to honour, unto all those that would tarrybehind and serve under him. But no manupon those hopes would remain with him. For they all gave him the slip, and went fundry waies, some to their friends and acquaintance, others ata venture as their mind flood, to divers Cities of Campain, but most to Nola and Naples. Amongst the refl, there were almost thirty Senators, and those (as it fell out) of the best fort, that came to Capua: but being kept out there because they had shut their gates against Annibal, they went to Cumes. The pillage of Nuceria was bestowed upon the souldiers, the City sacked and burnt. K Now kept Marcellus Nola, not preluming more upon the strength of his owngarrison, than upon the confidence he had in the great men and chief of the City. But he had the Commons in jealousie, and above all, one L. Bantius, who for that he had complotted to rebell, and therefore flood in fear of the Roman Deputy: one while was pricked and incited to attempt treason, and to berray his Country; another while, in case he should fail of that opportunity, and miss his purpose, to make an escape and run away to the enemy. A couragious and lufty young man he was, and the bravest Cavaleer in those daies of all the Roman Confederats. His hap was to be found lying half dead among the heaps of flain bodies before Canna: Annibal took order for the curing of his hurts, and when he was throughly healed right curreoutly fent him home well and bountifully rewarded. In remembrance of which favour and good turn, and in token of I thankfulness, he was willing to deliver and yield Nola into the hands of Annibal, to be at his devotion. But the Prator had an eve unto him, and observed how his head wrought, and was busily occupied to bring an alteration. And feeing there were but two waies to deal with him, either by punishment to keep him short, and cut him off; or by some benefit to win his heart: he think-ing it a better counter to gain unto himself so hardy and valiant a friend, than only to bereave his enemy of him; he tent for him, and in this manner spake triendly unto him: "You have (quoth she) amont your countrymen and fellow-Citizens, I see well, many that envy you, as it appears well by this, that there is never a neighbouryou have at Nola that hath told me of you, and thow many noble exploits and good fervices in war you have performed. But yet your valour "cannot be unknown and hidden, ever fince you ferved in the Roman army. For many there N "be which were fouldiers then with you, which have made report unto me of your prowels and " what perils you have entred into and how often you have put your life in hazard, for the lifety "and honour of the people of Rome: and namely, how in the battel before Canna you gave not "over fight, untill at length having bled well near to death, you were born to the ground and a lay under foot, overwhelmed with men, horse and armour, falling upon you, and so kept down that you could not rife up again. But be of good chear man, and go on Hill in this thy vertue and "well-doing: you shall have at my hands all honour and reward that may be possible: and the oftner you come to me and keep me company, you shall find it will be more for your reputation "and commodity both. The young man was glad at heart for these gracious words and large promiles: and fo Marcellus gave unto him freely, a good brave courser, and commanded the Trea-N furer to tell him out in money " 500" Bigats of filver charging his officers and Lictors toler him have access unto him at his pleasure, when soever he came. By this curteous usage and humanity of Marcellus, the young mans floot heart was fo dulced, mollified and easie to be wrought, that of all Confederats and Allies there was not one who bare himself more valiantly, nor maintained more faithfully the State of Rome. When Annibal was approached to the gates of Nola (for he was of Bigis, a char returned from Naceria, and came thither again) and the Commons within the town probled? Fight to rebell, Marcellus had a little before the coming of the enemies, retired and put himles within the wals : not for fear that he should not be able to keep the field and his hold; but left he should give advantage and opportunity to betray the City, seeing too many of them within dilposed and sorward thereunto. After this, they began on both sides to arrange their battelsino array the Romans under the wals of Nola, the Carthaginians before their own fort. Small skir. millies there were between the City and the Camp of Annibal (with variable event of fortune) Some that Debecause the Generals were not willing, either to deny and debar some few that were so eager and forward to call for fight, or yer to give forth the figuall of ageneral battell. Whilesthet two armies temporized thus, and held their Corpi de quard, continually, and in manner of folymn fet Affembly, the chief Nobles of the Nolans advertised Marcellus, that there wild to be night-meetings and conferences between their own Commons and the Carthaginans

A and that it was plotted and fet down, That when the Roman Host was issued in battel-array out of their gates, the Commons in the mean while should fall to rifling their carriages, packs, and truffes within, and then thut the gates upon them, and keep the walls: and to having the City and all their goods and baggage under their hands, should from thenceforth receive Annibalinto the City instead of Marcellus. Upon these advertisements, Marcellus after he had thanked and commended the Senators of Nola, determined before any commotion and mutiny arose within the walls to try the fortune of a battel. At those three gates that flood toward the enemy he ranged his forces divided into three battaillons, & gave order that all the carriages should follow after: and that the lackies, launders, and other Camp followers together with the feeble and fickly perfons, should carry stakes and pales for the rampier. At the middle gate he placed the flower and frength of the legions, together, with the Roman Cavalry: at the two gates at either hand he beflowed the new fouldiers the light armed, and the auxiliary hortemen of alies. The Nolans were by streight commandment forbidden to approach the gates or the walls. As for the baggage and carriages, the ordinary guard was appointed to attend thereupon, for fear, left while the Legions were busic in fight, there should be some assault made upon them. In this order and array marshalled they were within the gates. Annil al, who likewife ready arranged, flood with banner difplaied (as he had done for certain daies together) untill it was well toward noon first wondred at it, that neither the Roman army issued out of the gates nor any foul dier appeared upon the wals: C and hippoing afterwards, that their untall complots and conventicles were discovered and revea-led, and that for very fear they kept within and fat fill, fent back part of their fouldiers into the Camp, with commandment, in all speed to bring abroad into the open field before the vanguard, all the Ordnance and Artillery for to batter the City walls; with affured confidence, that if he came horly upon them, and gave an affault, whiles they thus lingred and issued not forth, the Commons would make some tumult and stir within the City. But anon as every man was busily occupied, running to and fro in haste about his own charge, before the vanguard and foreiront of his battel, even at the point when he advanced forward to the wals; ail upon a sudden a gate was fet open, and Marcellus caused the trumpers to found the alarm, and the fourdiers to set up a shout, commanding the footmen first, and then the horieto fally out, and with all the might and n force they could, to charge upon the enemy. Soon had they terrified their main battell infliciently, and made diforder there, when at the two gates of each fide, P. Valerius Flacous and Chins Jurelius, two Lieutenants generall, issued forth upon their flanks and wings. The horse-boies, scullions and the other multitude above (aid, which was fet to guard the carriages, arose up and made a new outery, and shouted, so as to the Carthaginians (who contemned them before for their small number especially) they represented all at once a shew of a mighty army. I date not avouch that which some Authors stick not to write, that of enemies were slain in this conflict 2300 and that the Romans loft but one only man. But what victory foever it was, either fo great, or smaller, surely a doughty piece of service was that day atchieved & I wot not whether I may truly say, of the greatest consequence that any ever was, during the time of that war. For as the time was then, it was a greater matter for the Romans (albeit they were the Conquerors) not to be vanquished of Annibal, than it was afterwards to vanquish him, Annibal disappointed of his hope to win Nola retired to Acerre, And Marcellus immediately having thut the gates, and placed the guards and warders to keep the same, that no man might go forth, fat judicially in the marketplace to examine those that had used secret conference and parling with the enemies : and finding above seventy guilty of this action, pronounced sentence of death upon them, as in case of treafon Those he cut shorter by the head, and commanded their goods to be confiscat. And thus leaving the government of the City to the Senat thereof, he departed with all his for, es, and above Sueffula encamped himself, and there abode.

Annibil being come before Acerra, fift summoned the City, to surrender voluntarily & without constraint: but seeing them obstinate, and willing to relent, he made preparation to lay siege Funto the rown, and to affault it. But the Acerrans had better heart and conrage, than might and strength to refist him. Therefore, when they faw themselves like to be intrenched all about, and were past hope to defend and keep the town: before the enemies had brought all ends of their trenches and iconces together they got between the trenches and rampiers (where they were not finished, and stood not close together) in the dead time of the night, and escaped through the sentinels and watches that were flendely looked unto, and as well as they could making finit through by-waies and blind lanes, over hedge and ditch (as either their wits guided them, or their fear carried them) recovered those Cities of Campania, which they knew for certain were not revolted, but perfifted true and fast unto the Romans. Annibalafter he had put Acerra to the tack, and fet it on fire having intelligence, that the Roman Dictator and the Legions were received at Cafilinum: and fearing, left while the enemy lay so near encamped, some should have recourse also into

Capua, led his army to Calilinum,

At the same time Preneste was held by 500 Prenestins, with a few Romans and Latines, who upon the news of the overthrow at Canne, were retired thither. These Preneffins, by occasion that they were not levied and mustered at Preneste by the day appointed, fet out from them e somewhat too late; and were come as far as Casilinum, before the rumour was bruited of the defeat before Canna: where they joyned themselves with other Romans and Consederats, set sorward from Castlinum, and marched together with a good great company: but meeting by the way with the tidings of that unfortunat field turned back again to Cafilinum. And after they had from H certain daies there, as well fearing the Campans, as suspected of them again, (for they devited on both fides how to entrap one another, and how to avoid each others trains) and having received also certain intelligence, That in Capua there was treating about a revolt, and that Annibal was there received; they in one night iet upon the Townimen of Casilinum, and killed them, and got that part of the City which is on this fide Vulturnus, (a river that runneth through it, and divideth it into two parts) and kept it still. Their number was well encreased by the coming of a cohort of four hundred and fixty Perufins, who likewife were driven to Cafilinum, by the same report and news, which a few daies beforehad turned the Preneftins thither. And furely there was sufficient almost of armed souldiers to man and defend the walls of that part, being of so small acir-1 cuit as they were, considering the town was flanked on the one fide with the river. And again, for the proportion of corn (whereof they had small store) they were men but too many, Annibal being now not far from thence, sent before him the Getulians, under the condust of a Captain named Ifalca; with direction, that first, if he could come to a parley, he should perswade with the Inhabitants within, and by fair words induce them to open their gates, and receive a garrison: but in case they continued still in their obstinacy, then to assail them by force, and give the attempt to enter into the City one way or other. When they were come under the walls, the barbarous Captain Isalcas supposing because he heard no noise, and saw no stirring) that they had quit and abandoned the town and were fled began to affail the gates, break open the locks, & burit thebars. But all at once on a sudden the gates were set open, and two cohorts well appointed and provi- K ded for that purpose within, sallied forth, with an exceeding great noise and tumult, overthrew a number of the enemies, and beat them down. Thus when the first had the repulse and were set back, Maharbel was fent with a greater power to fecond them, but was not able to make his party good with theie squadrons that fallied forth and charged upon him, At last Annibal himselfencamped even before the wall, and with all his power and forces put together, made preparation to give affault to this little town & small garrison. And whiles he pressed hard upon them with sresh and hot affaults, investing it round about, the enemies from off their wals, curtains, and turrets, let flie their shot so lunity upon the assailants, that he lost some of his best & most forward menther, Once they issued forth of themselves upon a bravery, and minded to bid them battel, but by a course of Elephants, set between them and home, they had like to have been shut forth and kept L out, and to they made hatle in great fear to recover the gates and put themselves within the town again; having loft, confidering to imali a number, a great fort: and more had died for it, but that the night parted the fray, and made an end of the skirmish. The morrow after, the affailants were all of them sharp set to give a fresh and hot charge, but not before there was a murall Coronet of gold shewed, and promised unto him that first could scale the walls. And the General himselfcast in their teeth and reproved them for being to long about the affaulting of a smal and weak sconce, to speak of, seated also upon a plain: whereas before they had wonthestrong town of Sagumum. He put them in mind both all and some, of Canus, I krasmenus, and Trebia. Then beganthey to fet mantlets and pavoises to, and to undermine. Many and fundry enterptises were attempted, and nothing left undone, that either by meer force could be performed, or by art and cunning de-N vised. The Roman affociats against these their engins and fabricks raised mounts, and platforms: yea, ard with countermines and cross trenches, met with the mines of the enemies; so as both above ground and underneath, they impeached all their attempts; so long, until Annibal for very shame was fain to give over his design for the present. And when he had fortified his standing Camp and placed there a mean guard for the defence of it, because he would not seem to havenlinquished altogether the enterprise, he withdrew himself into Capua, there to winter. Therebe lodged his fouldiers within house for the better part of winter: those fouldiers, I fay, who many a time and often had endured long, and held out against all travels and hardness that can possibly happen to the body of man; and never had been used to any good keeping, nor acquainted with delights and pleasures of the world. But even these men, whom no calamity, no misery could no tame and overcome, were spoiled and undone with too much wealth and excessive dainties: and fo much the rather as they more greedily fell thereto; and having not tafted thereof before, gave themselves wholly that way, and were deeply plunged and drowned therein. For sleeping on foft beds, wine and delicate fare, wenching and bathing, flews and hot-houses, idleness and taking eafe. which by use and custome grew pleasant and delightsome unto them every day more than other; had in such fort weakned their bodies, and made their hearts so effeminate, that from that time forward the reputation and name only of their victories past defended them more than any present strength and vigor they had: insomuch, as expert and skilfull warriors judged their Captain Annibal in more fault, and farther overleen in this action, than in not leading his Am ffreight forward to Rome, after the battell before Canna. For, that ftay might have been thought to have deferred only the entire and finall victory for a time, but this errour and over fight feemed to disable him for atchieving the victory for ever. So little retained he of his for mer old discipline that I affure you, he went out of Capua again as if he had led some other Me my and none of his own. For, not only they returned from thence most of them intangled and inared in the love of harlots, but so soon as they came again to lie abroad on the bare earth under tents and pavilions covered with beafts hides, to march long journeys, and to talled other military toil and labour; their bodies so tired, their hearts so sainted, as if they had been

A raw fouldiers, new come into the field in such wife; as all the time of their summer abode in Camp, many of them without licenie and paiport, would flip out of the way, and depart from their colours: and thele flart; backs had no other place of haunt to lurk in, but Capna. Now when the winter leafon began to be more mild, and draw towards the Spring; Annibal brought forth his fouldiers, out of his winter barbours and returned to Cafilinum : where, albeit the affault ceafed, yet the fiege had continued to streight, that the townimen and the garriton within the Fort, were driven to extream necessity and want of victuals. Now the Captain over the Roman Camp was T. Semproniu Ciracchus Joy reason that the Dictator was gone to Rome to take new Auforces. And as for Marcellus, who was defitons for his part to relieve and fuccour the belieged, was impeached for coming to them, partly, by the rifing and iwelling of the river Vulcarnus, & partly, B by the intreaty of the Citizens of Well and Acerra, who greatly feared the Campans, in case the garrison was once departed from them. And Gracebus, lying and keeping near unto Cafilinum flirred not one foot, by reason of the expresse commandment of the Dicator, That he should attempt nothing in his ablence : albeit there came daily from Cafilinam into the Campiuch news, as would have moved and provoked the most patient man that was. For it was constantly reported, and for certainknown, that fome of them within the town, no longer ble to endure the famaine, threw themselves down headlong; and brake their necks. others flood unarmed upon the was, offring their bare and naked bodies, as a Butt and mark to the fhot of arrows, and other darts. Gracebase grieved much so hear thefe pitious tidings, yet durit he not for his life, skirmish &c fight, without the warrant of the Dictator: & he taw full well, that if he would convey corn and C viduals unto them openly, fight be mult, there was no remedy. Having therefore no hope at all to fend any, but it (hould be spied, he devised to fill many tuns and pipes with corn, that he had gotten together out of the country all about: and withall to dispatch a messenger to the chief Magistrate of Calilinum, admiting, him, that he should in the night season take up all those vessels that came down the river. The night next following every man watched at the river fide. according to the hope they conceived by the forefaid Roman meffenger, and so received those tuns, bulling down the midft of the stream and the corn was equally divided amongst them all. Thus did they the morrow after, and the third day also. For ever by night these vettels were let down into the water and the same night might easily come unto them ; by reason whereof the sentinels and guard of the enemies were nothing ware of that which was done, But afterwards the current growing more D (wift and rough, by occasion of continual) rain that fell, the faid tuns were some of them driven cross the channel to the bank fide, even where the enemies warded; and were espied waving and flicking among the willows and offers that grew along cloteunto the banks whereof Annibal was advertised. And to from thenceforward they tended the watch more strieghtly that nothing fent down the river Vulturnus could eleape them, and pals to the City. Afterwards there was powred into the water great flore of nuts from the Camp of the Romans; were floated down the Channel unto Cafilinum, and with grated akimmers of wicker were taken up. But at the laft they within the Town were driven to this poor shift and ex camity, for to take their thongs and bridle rains, to plack off their leather from their shields, and bucklers, and make them loft in icalding water, and prove how they could eat them. Nay, they spared not to much as mice, and rats, nor E any other like vermin. Nor there was not a weed nor a root that they could come by, upon the banks and certaces under the wals, but they gathered and digged up. And when the enemies had turned up with a plough all the green-ford of the counter-fearp without the wais, they within caft turnip-feed upon the mould, Whereupon Annibal made a hout at it, and cried gloud. What? shall we fit here about Coffinant to long, untill these rapes be come up and grown. And whereas before that time, he would never youch afe to hear of any composition & agreement, now at last he was contented to take reason; and be configred withall about the rantom of as many as were freemen within the Town. And it was coveragred between him and them that they should pay for their tedemption * leven ounces of gold speece. So upon faithfull promise made, and security given they yeelded themselves: and were kept bound in prifon untill they had made full payment of the *12 lib. flet gold aforefaid. After which, they were fent back under tafe conduct to Camer. For this is more like to be time, then the report which goeth, That there was fent out after them certain horfemen, who fell upon them and flew them in the way. Most of them were Prenellins. And whereas there were of them in all five bundred and seventy in garrison the one half well near, were either by Iword or hanger confumed: all the rell together with their Pretor Maniting, (one who sfores time had been a Scribe or Notary) returned fafe to Preseft. In memorial and teltimony of this, his flatue was erected in the Market place of Prenefle, armed in his cuirafie, clad in a long robe, with his head covered : and three other images, with a title or infeription engraven in a plate of Braffe, with this tenor. That Manitius had made a vow for the fouldiers who lay in garrifon with him at Cafilinage. And the fame title allo was engraven ander three other images, let up in S the Temple of Fortuna. The Town of Cafilinum was reflected again to the Campans, with a ftrong garrison of 700 souldiers, deducted out of the army of Amibal: for fear, left when he was departed once from thence, the Romans should affail them.

The Senat of Rome by vertice of a decree, granted unto those fouldiers of Prenefts double wa-Res, with five years vacation and reft from warfare. And whento gratifie them farther for their yajant fervice they made offer unto them, of the Burgellie and treedom of Rome, they choic rather o remain full at home, and would not change their own country. But what befell ante the Perulins is not recorded to plainly : for neither appeareth evidence by any publicke monument and H memorial of their own, nor yet decree extant of the Romans. At the fame time the Petellins (who alone of all the Brutii remained in friendship and amity with the Romans) were affaulted ont only by the Carthaginians, (that were possessed of a great part of the Country about them) but also by the other Bruil with whom they would not joyn in the complet of their rebellion. The Petellins not able of themselves to hold out and endure these dangers, sent their Embassadors to Rome, for to crave their aid and affiltance : whose humble prayers and pitious tears (for after an answer received, That they should provide and shift for themselves, they fell intolamentable moans and complaints, and lay profirate upon the Earth, before the porch of the Councell-Houle) wrought exceeding compassion and pity in the hearts of the Senators, and also of the people : whereupon the Lt., were moved again the second time, by M. Amylius the Prator I to deliver their opinion. And when they had cast all about, and well weighed and considered. their present state, and what they were able to do; being forced to confels, that it lay not in their power to help their Allies, to far diltant and remote from them: they willed them to repair home again; & tince they had performed their fidelity to the full, according to covenant, they gave them leave in this calamity of theirs to take that course that they thought belt for themselves. When they were returned with this answer unto the Petellins, their Senat all on a sudden was ftrucken into fach forrows, dumps and feartuli maze, that fome of them were of mind, and gave advice to abandon the City, and fly every man wherefoever he could a others were of opinion and perfwaded, that feeing they were for taken of their old friends, they should joyn with the other Brutii, and by their means, turn to Annibal, and come under his protection. Howbeit a third I fide prevailed, who would in no wife that any thing thould be done over haftily and rafhly : but that they might meet again, and fit in councell about the matter. And to it was put off, and to fpite given unto the next day. Then after more mature diliberation, and their former fear fomewhat asswaged, the principal personages there assembled grew to this retolution, namely, To convey all things out of the Teritory about them into the City, and to fortifie both it and the Near about one and the same time, there came Posts with Packets of Letters to Rome, from out of Sieily and Sardinia. Those out of sieily from Octacilius the Vice-prator, were read fift in the Senat Houle, importing thete news: That L. Faring the Prator was come out of Affick, and with his fleet arrived at Lilybeams : himself fore hurt, and lying at point of death: that nei-L ther the fouldiers, nor failers and marriners had their money or corn duly paid at the day a neither indeed was there any to be had, for to keep touch and make paiment . moving and advisting them earnelly, to fend imply thereof with all convenient foeed : and if they thought fo good, one allo of the new choice Prators to fucce i after him To the fame effect in manner wrote Cornel. Man. mula the Pro-Præ:or, out of Sardin: a, 3; touching that point of money and corn. Answer was returned to the one and the other, that they had it not, and therefore they were to look themselves both to their Armadoes and Armies, and to provide for them. Off acidias, who addressed Embalsadors unto K. Hiero (the only refuge and flay of fuccour that the people of Rome had received for fouldiers pay, as much filver as was needfall, and corn to ferve fix months. The confederat Chies likewife in Sardinia contributed libe, ally unto Cornelius, and ferved his turn. At Rome also for M want of filver, there were (by a law published by Minutins, Tribune of the Commons) created three Brokers, called Triumvirs Menfaris, to Wit, L. Emplins, who had been Conful and Cenfor. M. Attilins Regulus, twice Contal atoretime; and L. Scribonius Libeo, a Tribun of the Commons for the time being I wo Duumvirs also were cholen, M. and C. Attilis, who dedicated the Temple of Concord which L. Manlins Prator had vowed before. Three high Priefts also were confecrated, Q. Cecilius Mettellus, Q. Fabius Max. and Q. Fulvius Flacens, all to supply the rooms of P. Scantinius late decealed : of L. Emplins Paulus the Conful, and Q. Elius Patus, flain bothin the journey of Canna.

Now when as the LL, of the Senat had fulfilled other wants, and made up all decaies and bret. N ches, which fortune by continual) calamities and loffes had wrought and brought upon them, for far forth, as by any wildom and policy of man, they could provide for at length they had refuelt and regard unto themselves also, even to the desolate estate of the Councel-House and the unitequented number of Senators affembling to the publicke Councell of the City. For fince that L. E. mylius and C. Flaminius were Centors, there had been chosen no new Senators, notwithstanding that in five years space, what with unfortunat battels, and what with other particular chances, to many of them had milcarried. And when M. Amylius the Prætor, in the abience of the Dictator (who after the loss of Casilinum was now gone again to the holt) had at the request of them all propounded this matter : then Sp. Carvilius, after he had in a long oration complained, not only of the penury, but alto of the small choice of those Citizens, who were capable of Senators digni- 0 ty, spake unto the point, and said, " That he held it a matter of good importance both for the " full repairing and reftoring of the decayed body of the Senat, as also for to bind the Latine Ne-"tion in a more fast bond of amity, that two Senators ont of every State of the Latines (if the LL " of the Senat of Rome would agree unto it) should be infranchised Citizens of Rome, and taken into the Senat in place of those that were deceased. This opinion of his the LL, of the Senat could abide to hear with no better ear then in times past they accepted the motion and demand of the Latines themielves in that behalf. And there being throughout the whole House a great

A mattering, for very indignation and disdain of those his words, Manlius above the rest brake out into this speech, and said; "That they were not all dead, but one man yet was left alive of that "house and line, out of which a Conful (when time was) threatned in the Capitol, that he would "kill with his own hand, that Latine whom/oever he faw fitting in the Councel-House of Rome. With that, Q Fabins: " Never was there's thing, quoth he, propounded and mentioned in the "Senat-house, in a worse and more unseasonable time, than at this present, when as the hearts and " affections of our Allies being to wavering, their faith and alleageance to doubtful, the very break-"ing and broaching of fuch a matter as this, were enough to fee them farther out. And therefore "this inconfiderat speech of one foolish vain person, is to be suppressed and buried presently with B othe filence of all men, and never once to be spoken of again. And if everthere were uttered at "Councel Table, any fecret and mystery, which were to be concealed, this of all other ought most to be kept close, hidden and imothered in oblivion, and reputed as never spoken at all. So this matter was dasht, and dyed there in the very birth. Then they proceeded and a greed, to creat Dictator for the chooling of Senators, one that had been Cenfor aforetime, and of all thole who had been Cenfors, and were then living, the most ancient : and thereto they gave order, that C. Terenting Varro the Conful should be sent for, to the nomination of that Dictator. Who being returned out of Apulia, leaving the camp there with a good guard, and taking long journeys, until he was come to Rome: the night next following (as the manner was) created by authority of an act of Senat, M. Fabina Buteo, Dict. for fix moneths, without a General of Horfe. When he was mounted up with his Serjeants to the Roftra, [which is the place of publike audience] for to make a speech unto the people, he said: "That he neither allowed of two Dictators at one time. "(a precedent never feen and known afore) nor yet could take himfelf for a Dictator, fo long as The was without his General of Cavalry. I millike also (quoth he) that the entire authority and "power of Cenfors, should be put into the hands of one and the felt-lame man, twice : and that a "Dictator should have the rule and government for fix moneths, unless he were created for the a managing of wars. And therefore (faid be) I will my felf limit and gage those things, which " fortune, occasion of the times, and necessity have made excessive and beyond all measure pow-"erful. Neither am I minded to depote or displace any of those from his senators dignity, whom "C. Flaminius, and L. Emylius late Cenfors, have admitted into the Senat - but only, that a "transcript and rehearfal be made of their names, for that I would not have it lie in the power of one man alone to centure and give judgement of the fame and behavior of a Senator: but this "course will I take in substituting new Senators in the room of the dead, that it may appear, and " be faid: That this Order and degree is preferred before that, and not one person before another." So after that the names of the old Senators were copied out and read, then he chose first into the place of them that were decealed, those who after the time of L. Amylius and C. Flaminus Cenfors, had born any Magistracy of State, and of the chair, and yet were not elected Senators. And according as they had exercised their office one before another in order of time, so were they choien first Senators in their courfe. This done, he made a fecond election of those who had been Ædiles, Tribuns, Pretors, or Questors: and last of all such as could shew the spoils taken from the enemies of Rome hanging in their houses: or had been honoured and rewarded with a Civick garland. Thus after he had with right great approbation and contentment of all men, taken into the Senat 177, forthwith he refigned up his office, descended from the pulpit a private man again, discharged and put from him the Serjeants, and came and stood beneath among the other multitude that attended their own private business: triffing out the time for the nonce and of purpole, because he would not have the people to leave the common place for to wait upon him. Howbeit, for all that lingering and flay which he made, the peoples affection cooled never the more, and fo with a goodly train of men he was accompanied, and conducted home to his

The next night following, the Conful returned toward the army, wi hout making the Senate privy and acquainted with his departure, for fear he should have been detained still in the City for the tolemn election of new Magistrats. The morrow after the Senate decreed, upon a motion propounded by M. Pomponius the Pretor, to write unto the Dictaror, that if he thought it were for the good of the common-weal, he would together with his General of the Cavalry, and M. Marcellus the Pretor, repair to Rome to subrogate and choose new Consuls, to the end that when they were all together in place, the LL. of the Senate might by them take knowledge in what state the Common-wealth stood and consult how to provide for every thing. They all came that were fent for accordingly, Icaving behind them their Lieutenants for the government and conduct of the Legions. The Dictator spake of himself but little, and with much modesty, ascribing the greatest part of the honor unto T. Sempronius Gracelus, and then summoned the general affembly for the Election : in which were choice Coff. L. Posthumius the third time (who then was absent, and as L. Deputy ruled the Province of Gallia) and T. Sempronius Gracehus, who at that time commanded the Cavalry, and repaired to Rome with speed. Then were elected Pretors M. Valerius Levinus, Ap. Claudius Pulcher, Q. Fulvini Flacens, and Q. M. eins Scavola. The Dictator after the choosing of thele Magnitrates feeturned to Theanum, wherethe army wintred : leaving the General of the Horse behind at Rome, to the end that he being to enter into his government, within few dayes after, might confide with the LL. of the Senat as touching the levy and enrolling new armics against the year entiting wo of ten years.

Whiles they were in their bufieft and deepest conferences about these matters, news came of a fresh overthrow: such was the fortune of that year to heap one calamity in the neck of another; to wit, that L. Posthumius the Conful elect, was himself flain, and the army together with him in Gallia, utterly defeated and destroyed. The manner of which missortune was this. There was the deteature in those parts a wide and huge forrest (which the Gauls call Litans) through which Postbamin or L. Postbamin in those parts a wide and huge forrest (which the Gauls call Litans) ot L. Popusumi. was to lead his army. The trees there growing on either hand of the paie, the Gauls had fo cut, that they might fland upright of themselves so long as they were not firred, so, being forced never fo little, they must needs fall down. Now had Post humins the conduct of two Roman legions; and of affociats befides, from the high coasts of the upper Sea, he had enrolled to many fouldiers, as that he came into the enemies countrey 25000 ftrong. The Gauls who had bestowed themselves in ambush round about the skirts of the wood, to soon as the army was all engaged within the ftreights of the paie, shoved from them the trees (so guilded) which stood next unto them, and they fell one upon another (flanding as they did, fo ticklish of themselves, and ready to totter and come down on both fides of the way) and in the fall overthrew withal and covered over and over both horfe and man, with their armour and munition, fo as fcarce ten of them escaped alive, For as most of them were felled and firucken flark dead , either with the bodies of the trees , or the broken arms and boughs; fo the rest of the multitude, affrighted with this unexpected and unhanpy accident, were killed by the Gauls that belet all the streights and passages of the woods and of that great number, they took few prifoners, who making towards a bridge standing overthe River, were intercepted by the way, and stopped by the enemies that kept the advenue of the bridget in which place Pofthamiss was flain , for he strived all that ever he could , not to be taken alive. The spoils of this General Captain, together with the head cut off from the rest of his body, the Boians with great joy and folemnity brought into the Temple that amongst them was reputed most holy and facred. And after they had clented the head, as their manner is, they enchaced and garnished the skull with gold, and that served as well for an holy vessel to sacrifice and Divine withal, upon high and festival dayes, as also for an ordinary drinking mazar for the high Priest and other Prelats of that Temple. The booty also which the Gauls gained of their enemies, was of no less importance than the victory: for although a great part of the beafts and living creatures was crushed and squeased to death with the fall of the wood, yet all other things, by reason that nothing was scattered and loft by flight, were found wholly on the ground, as the souldiers lay along inthat.

order as they marched. These woful tidings being reported, the City was for many dayes in such sear and peoplexity, that all shop windows were that up, and no flirring at all in the streets throughour, from one end to the other, as if it had been night continually. Then the Senat gave the Ædiles in charge to walk all about, and command the shops to be set open, and to make no more shew in the City of publick forrow and heaviness. Then T. Sempronius affembled a Senate, spake comfortably to the LL, of the Councel, and exhorted them, that it as they were not dilmayed with the overthrow " and discomfiture at Canna, so they would not be cast down and danned with lighter and small et ler losses and calamities. For if it might please the Gods to blesse them, and give them good " speed (as they hoped no less) against the Carthaginian enemies and Annibal, the war with the " Gauls might without danger and inconvenience either be laid afide clean, or put off and deferered. As for the revenge of this deceitful practile, it should reft still in the power either of the immortal Gods, or of the people of Rome, to be performed one time or other. But for the prefent, they were to confult and resolve concerning Annibal their grand enemy, and togrow to some point and conclusion of such forces as were meet for that war. And first himself discounted and laid down what companies of foot and Horle, what number of citizens, and how many confederats were in the army of the Dictator. After him, Marcellus fhewed and recounted the proportion of his own power and their strength. Also, what forces, and of what quality, were with C. Terensius the Conful in Aputia, they were required to declare, who might speak upon their knowledge. Then they proceeded to cast and examine, whether two Consular armies well appoin ted and furnished, were sufficient to go through to great a war. Thus for that year they let France alone, albeit they had good canfe to be angry, and were provoked that way to follow revenge. The Dictator his army, was appointed unto the Conful. As for the forces under the leading of Marcellus, confifting of them that fled out of the field at Canna, those they ordsined to be sent over into Sicily, there to remain in fervice follong as the war continued in Italy: and that thither also should be polled over out of the Dictator his Legions, all those fouldiers who were able to do least tervice, there to abide in fouldiery, without any other limitation of time than that, which the Laws in that case provide for. For the other Conful, who should be substituted in stead of L. Postbumius, there were affigned two Legions of Roman Citizens: and order was given, to * i. The term foon as the Aufpices would permit, he should be elected with speed. Likewise it was agreeduped and ordained, to lend for two legions besides out of Sicily: out of which, the Cost. unto whom those Legions aforesaid of the City were allotted, should take what souldiers be thought needful Finally, C. Terentine the Conful, had his commission of command continued for another yell, Without empairing one jot of the army, which he had in his conduct for the guard and defence of Amids these affairs and preparations in Italy the war went forward neverthelesse in Spin. and ever to that day prospered on the Romans side. P, and Ca, Scipies divided their forces in,

A as Cn. should serve by Land, and Publius at Sea with the navy. Afdrubel the chief Colonel and Commander there of the Carthaginians, distrusting his own strength both by Sea and Lard, kept himielf aloof, and far from the enemy, in fure places of fafety; Unto whom, after long fuit and inflant prayers, were fent 4000 foot, and 500 horse out of Affrick for supply. Having thus at length, with new helps gathered fresh hope, he encamped neerer to his enemy and gave order and direction withal, that the Armado should be rigged and decked for the detente of the Islands, and the Sea-coasts. And whiles he was thus beginning hotly to make war again, he was suddainly distempered and disquieted with the revolt of the Admirals and great Captains of the navy: who for their fearful abandoning of the fleet upon Iberus, having been tharply checked and rebu-Bked, were never after trufty and fure, either to the Colonel himself, or to the State of Carthage. Thele fugitive renegats had first practifed to raise troubles and interrections in the Land of the Carpefil, and by their folliciting and instigation, certain Cities were provoced to rebel, and one of them they had forced by affault. Wherenpon, Afdeulal mined his for enfrom the Romans, and bent them wholly against that Nation: and with a cruel army entring the frontiers of the enemies, determined to give the charge upon Galbus, a Nobleman and renowned chieftain of the Carpefians, even before the City, that some sew dayes before was lost where the faid G. Ibas with a puiffant power kept himlelf firongly encamped. Having therefore tent our before, certain vancurriers lightly armed, to train forth and draw the enemies to skitmish, he made out withal certain Companies of his Infantry fundry wayes to over-run and feoil the country, and likewife to catch up and meet with all flraglers, disperied in the fields. Wherespon, at one time there was a skirmish before the camp; and likewise in the fields, they were either than or put to flight. But afterwards, having by divers wayes from all parts recovered again the camp, fuldainly they floaked offall fear, plucked up their hearts, and thought themselves good enough a not only to defend their fort and hold, but also to bid the enemy but ail. They fallied out therefore of the camp in good array, shouting, dancing and hopping after their manner to as this unexpected boldness and courage of theirs, terrified the enemies, who a little before had challenged them to fight. Whereupon Afdrabal himself withdrew and retired his power for more fecurity to an hill of good height, and fituat for his advantage, with a River like wife between him and his enemies. The light armed vancurriers also, and the forlorn hope, together with the Horsemen that rode flato tering abroad he caused thither to repair for their better safety. And because he trusted neither hill nor river, he fortified himself with a trench and rampier besides. In this alternat and interchangeable fear on both fides, there passed some bickerments; and blows were dealt between. In which, neither the Numidian Horsemen were able to match the Spaniards in that kind, nor the Moores archers could make their part good with the light Carpetians targetiers, who in nimbleness and swiftness were as good as they; and for courage and bodily strength, far better. These Carpefians feeing they neither could provoke Asserbal to a battail, with all their braving bard under his camp, nor yet eafily by affault win it, they took by force the City Afena, into which Afdrubal when he first invaded the Frontiers of his enemies had conveighed fore of coin and other victuals: yea, and became LL, of all the country thereabout. And they grow to lufty and audaci-E ous that neither in their march and array nor within their camp they would bernled and ordered by any mans command. This fecure and carelets negligence of their; , when Afdrahal perceived to artie (as mually it doth) upon good fuccess and properity; after an exhottation made to his fouldiers, to charge upon the enemies, roving abroad without their colours, he defrended from the hill, and marched in battail array against the camp. So foon as the spaniards were advertifed by thole who came in great haft, and fled from the Sentinels and compile guard, that he was coming, and neer at hand, with a great outcry they gave the alarm. And as every man could get Weapon in hand they ran upon the head to battail, without direction and commandment of Captain, without fignal, enfign, and order, confusedly. When the formost in the vanguard were joyned in conflict and come to hand-fight, some of their fellows were seen running on heaps and by troups, and others were not well come forth of the camp: At the first the enemy was terrified with their bold adventure. Afterwards as they encountred, thin and lookely raied, with the enemies thick and closely ranged together, seeing themselves too weak, and not sufficient, so sew in number to defend themselves, they looked back one upon another for succour: and being on every fide put back, and forced to retreat and lose ground, they cast themselves into a ring, and thus thrust (as they were) close together, body to body, and atmour to atmour they were so pens and peltered in so narrow a ground, that they had scarce room enough to wield their weapons so they were compassed and environed round with the enemy, and for a good part of the day hewen, in peeces, and massacred. Some few of them that brake through by dint of tword, escaped to the woods and mountains. With like fear the camp was abandoned : and the day following, the whole nation yeelded, and came under the subjection of the Carthagini ns.

Long they continued not quiet. For within a while news came from Carthage, that Afdrubal should make what speed he could with his army into Italy. Which remour being blown abroad through Spain, turned in manner all their hearts away unto the Romans. Whereupon Afdrubal addressed his Letters immediately to Carthage, shewing what hurt the same of his departure had done already : and in case he should set forward on his journey, and go out of those parts, all Spain would turn to the Romans, before he were passed the river Iberus. mander in stead of himself, the Generals of the Roman armies, who had set foot in Spain, Weter fu. h. as he might nard y make head against them with equal puissance. And therefore in they hed any regard of Spane, he advised them to fend one to succeed him with a flrong power: Forte should have his hands full, and enough to do in the Province fall out things as fortunatly as they could. These letters, albeit at the first fight they greatly troubled the Senat, yet because the litlian affairs feemed of more moment and greater importance, they wrought no alteration in their intended courie, either for Afd abet himself, or his forces. Howbeit Himseles was fent with a complete and competent army, and a greater Armado, both for the holding of Spain in their alleageance, and also for their defence by Sea and Land. Who having pasted over with all his pewer as well tot Land-fervice as the Sea, fortified his camp, drawn his ships ashore, laid themenl in drie Land, and empaled them ftrongly all about; himself in person with his elect and most cheil emen of arms, made what haft possibly he could, through nations partly enemies, purly doubt all and untruity, and flated not either in one place or other (but evermore flanding upon his guard) until he was come to Afdruhal. After he had declared unto him the order decree by the Senat. and what he had in committion, and taken him elf direction likewife from him, in what manner the war in Spain was to be managed, the returned back again to his own camp. In which voyage to and fro he travailed infely by no one thing more than by speedy expedition. For he was evergone from a pia cobeiore the people could agree together and make head against him. Now Afdr lal beer that he diflodged and let his army on foct out of those parts, levied sumsof money of a true ories and flates under his juried stion : for well he knew, that Annil A had paid five up before him for his passage through certain countries; and as well he will besides, that the Cauls he was fain to wages for smonth shem no money no men. And if he undertook and en tred upon that creat expedition, por rand here of laver, he had never reached to far as the Airs, Thus having in great half raifed and collected his monies he came down to the river Ibom.

When the Remans heard of the proceedings and delignments of the Carthaginians and like wite of the poursey of Afd A de both the Generals (laying all other matters apart) preparedto joye their whole forces together, to oppose themselves, and to withmand inch intended atempts: supporting and confidering, that if Annul al (who by himses alone was an enemy to also hardwippe sable, were once to orded by Colorel affa ab. Land the Span in army, the language of Rome would from be at an ord. Upon these careful cogitations being grieved and perpendithey often had altheir power over to Iberns; and after they had paffed over the river, and any countained whether they flouid encamp themselves and abide the coming of the enemies rollid them bactails of on inceding and affairing the affociats and fubjects of the Carthaginians, tollar the enemy and hinder has intended journy: they refolved at length and made preparation to state faule the incles named of there et veer by) the richest and most wealthy City at that time, of all others in the wort. Whereof when ajd ubal was advertised, he for to help his friends, edvenced him for observe to set up in another City lately yearded to the Romans, and reduced under their subjection. And so the Roman after they had begun to lay siege to Ibera, gave overthatenterprile, and made yeard agains. Afel abol himself. And for some few dayes they lay incamped five miles assured one from the other, not without some light skirmishes : but never came to pitcha fair field. At lengte upon one and the fame day (as if they had been fo agreed afore) they hapned on both fide, to fee out the fignal of bastail, and to come forth with all their power into the plain ground. The Romans flood arranged in three battailons: one part of the Infantry was plated before the handards in the varguard, another Regiment bellowed behind in the rerega ditte men of arms tlanked the fides like wings. On the other part, Aldenbal Brengthned his mainbatel with Spaniards: in the right point he marshalled the Carthaginians, in the left the African, As for the auxilian and mer energ Ho femen, whom he waged and hired; such as were Numidia ans, he ordained afront the Carthaginians footmen to guard them: the reft that were Affrican, he distributed and disposed about the skirts and edges of the battailons. Neither were alite Numidians placed in the right flank, but such as after the guife and manner of Vaulters, ledowo Hories apec e: and nied often times in the mids of the hottest conflict, to leap armed as they were from their wearied horse to another fresh one. So nimble are they themselves, and intra-Stable and weiltaught to their hands are their Horses, Thus flood they arranged on both ides in order of battail. The Coptains of either part for hopes in manner nothing unequal: for wither in number or quality of fouldiers, was there any great oddes between them: Mary, for coarge and heart-there was great difference and inequality in the fouldiers themselves. For the Roman (not with for ding they rought far from home) were so perswaded by their leaders, that they fought for I Ir and the City of Rome and therefore as if the whole hope of their fafe return into their country were to be tried and decided in this one battail, they relolved either to win the day or to dye for it. Ontheother aide the fouldiers were not fo refolute, for most of them being spire niards, would have chosen rather to be conquered and overcome in Spain, than with conques and vistory to be drawn into Italy. And therefore at the first shock, when scarcely the dans and javeling were 'en ed and let flye a their main battail retreated; and to foon as the Romans with great violen e redonbled the charge, they turned their backs and fled, Howbeit in both flanks the ficht was hot enough. The Carthaginians of the one fide, the Affricans on the other, charged it Romans very hard and fought fore against them, as is they had them invironed round about with in their battailons. But when as the whole power of the Romans were once rallied and gather

A red together in the mids, they were strong enough to remove and set back the wings of the enemies. So they maintained fight in two divers places at once. But both in the one and the other, the Romans (after they had discomfitted the main bestaul in the mids) were no doubt, much better, as well in number, and also in strength and vigour of men. Many a tall fellow was there slain. And had not the Spaniards at the first when the battail was fearer began, fled amain by heaps, very few of the whole battail had escaped and remained alive. The Horsemen fought little or not at all. For the Moors and Numidians, fo foon as they espied the battail to shrink and lose ground, presently all on a fuddain fled as fast as they could, and lefe the fides and flanks of the faid battail maked, driving afore them the Elephants withal. And even Afdrab ... thim leif, who maintened the skirmish to the very last, escaped with some few out of the thickell massacre and execution. The Romans took their camp and rifled it. This battail was of such import and confequence, that it caused all the Spaniards, who were before but wavering to turn wholly to the Romans and left Afdrubal no hope at all, to pals with his forces into Italy, nor to much as to make abode with lafety in Spain. The news hereof being bruited abroad and fent to Rome, by the letters of the two Scipios, great joy there was, not so much for the victory, as because Afternbal was sied by the foot, and stated for coming into Isaly.

Amidsthese exploits in Spain, * Petelia (a City of the Brutii, having endured the flege and many affault for certain moneths) was finally won by Himiteo, one of simulal Captains. But that victory coft the Carthaginians much blond, and many a fore would. No force nor violence overcame the befreged Petelians more, than very famine. For having confirmed and extenup all food of corn, all flesh of four footed beasts whatseever a they were driven at length to feed and liveupon shoomakers lether, weeds, and roots, tender barks of trees, and the crops of briers and brambles, and they gave not over fo long as they were able to francion their legs upon the walls, and

Annibal after the winning of Petella conducted his army sgainfi * Confentia, which being not * colenza. fo valiantly defended, was within few dayes furrended up into his hands. Neer about the fame time, a power of the Brutians alfo, laid fiege unto Croton, a City built and inhabited by the Greeks, and in times palt, mighty in men and innerron : but now at this time to distressed with manifold and grievous calamities, that of all ages one with another, they were not able to make twenty) thouland men. And therefore no marvail, if the enemies were foon mafters of the City, being fo destitute as it was of Citizens to defend ic. Only the Carlie they kept fill, into which there were some that escaped in that turnult when the City, was taken, out of the mids of the maffacre. The Locrians likewise revolted unto the Bruti and the Carthaginians, by resson that the common multitude were fraudulently betrayed by the chief and principal Citizens. The Rhegines only of all that country, continued both true unto the Romans, and also at their own liberry to the very last, The same disposition to revolt, was to be seen even in Siedly, in so much as the very house of Hiero was not cleer and free in all parts from rebellion. For Gelo his eldelt fon, having in contempt both the olde age of his father, and also (after the overthrow at Canna,) the society and friendship of the Romans, turned unto the Carthaginians. And he had, no doubt, made a general alteration in Sicily, but that his death came between and cut him off; which hapned fo jump, even when he was arming the multitude, and folliciting his friends to rebellion, that his very father himfelf was drawn into deep suspition that he took his life away. These were the occurrents that fell out that year with variable event, in Italy, Affrick, Sicily, and Spain. In the end of the same year, Q. Fabius Maximus moved the Senat, and made request, that the Temple of Venus Erjeina, which he had vowed being Dictator, might now be dedicated. And the Senat made a decree. That Titus Semp onius, Conful elect, should to soon as he was entred into his office, propole unto the people, that they would creat two Duumvirs for the dedication of Temples. And in honour of Empirus Lepidus, who had been Conful twice, and Augur, his three lons, Lucius, Marcus, and Quintus, exhibited certain funeral games for three dayes space; and a shew in the Common place likewise for three dayes together, of two and twenty pair of tword feniers, to fight at tharp to the death. The Curule Adiles, C. Lellorins, and T. Sempronius Graceus, now Confulelect, who in his Adileftip had been General of the Horsemen, set out the Roman games, which were renewed and continued still for three dayes. Likewise, the Playes of the Commons, were thrice exhibited by M. Aurelius Cotta, and M. Claudius Marcellus. Now after three years expired of the Punick war, T. Sempronius the Confal, began his government upon the * Ides of March. As for the Prators, Q. Fulvius Flaccus, who had afore-time been Conful and Cenfor, obteined by lot the jurisdiction of the Citizens; and M. Valerius Corvinus, of the strangers and aliens. To Apprus Claud us Pulcher was alotted the government of Sicily: and to Q. Mutius Scavola of Sarduia. M. Marcellus was by the people allowed to have the authority of a Vice Conful, in regard that he above all the Roman Captains, after the defeat of Canna, mannaged his affairs and warred prosperously in

Now the very first day that the Senat was assembled in the Capitol, they decreed upon the fift motion, that within the compasse of that year, there should be levied a double tax or tribute, and that one fingle tribute should be forthwith gathered, for present pay to all the souldiers, faving those that served at Canne. Then concerning the armies this order was set down : Imprimie, that T. Sempronius the Conful, should appoint the two legions of Citizens a certain

day to meet at Cales. Item, that fix legions should be conducted to the camp of Clandin above Suefful. Item, that the legions which there were (and those confilted for the most part of the set fidue of the Cannian army) Ap. Claudius Pulcher the Pretor, should put over Sea into Sicily; and as for those that were in Sicily, they should be transported to Rome. Item, unto that army which was appointed to meet by a day, at Cales, M. Clandius Marcellus was fent : and he was comminded to conduct the legions of the Citizens to the camp of Claudius. Last of all, to receive the charge of the old army, and to lead it into Sicily, T. Metilius Croto Lieutenant, was fent by Ap Claudien. Men looked at firlt, and yet they faid nothing, that the Conful should call an affembly for the creating of a Colleague unto him. But after that they faw that M. Marcellus was lent out of the way (as it were of purpose) whom above all others they were desirous to be the Consultor; that year, in regard of his notable good fervice whiles he was Pretor, there arose much muttering in the Senat house. Which the Conful perceiving: "My LL, quoth he, it was for the good of "the Common-wealth, that both M. Claudim should go into Campain to exchange the armies: "and also that the Election of Consuls, should not be proclaimed, until that he were returned again " from thence, with dispatch of that business which he had in charge : that ye might have a Con-61 ful, such a one as the pretent condition of the State required, and your felves most defired. So there was no more speech of the election, until Marcellus was come back again. In this mean time were two Duumvirs created, Q. Fabins Maximus for the dedication of one Chappel to Venus Ericina, and T.Oltacilius Craffus, of another to the Goddels Mens. Both fland uponthe Capitol hill, divided afunder no more than with one only conduct of water paffing between. And as concerning the three hundred Campain Horsemen, who had served out their full time of wartare taithfully, and were come to Rome, a motion was propounded to the people, that they should be enfranchifed Chizens of kome : and in like manner, that they should be reputed as free Denizens of Cumes, trom the day afore that the Capuans revolted from the people of Rome and rebelled. The enictest cause of proposing this act, was this, because themselves denied flatly that they knew, to whom they did appertain, feeing they had abandoned their old native countrey and as yet were not corolled and incorporat into that state, unto which they had retired. After that Marcellus was come again from the army, the folemn day of election of a Conful in place of L. Posthumius, was published. And with exceeding great consent of all men, Marcellus was the fen : and forthwith he was to begin his Magistracy. At whose first entrance, it happed to thunder : and the Augurs being called to give their opinion of it, pronounced that they thoughthe was not rightfully created. And the Senators gave it out commonly and bruited abroad, that the Gods were not well pleased therewith, because (forsooth) two Cost, were elected of the commonstry (s thing never teen before.) Whereupon Marcellus refigned up his place, and in his room was tubflitted Fabius Max, the third time.

That year the Sea burned. At Sinneffa a cow brought forth a horse fole. And at Lanuvigmin the Temple of Iuno Hofpita, certain tratues or images dropped with bloud: and about that Temple it rained from For which showr, there was solemnised, according to the customable manner, a Nove untial facritice. The other prodigious figns likewife were expiat with great care and heedful regard. The Contuls then, parted their armies between them. Fabius took charge of tholey forces which had been commanded by M. Junius the Dictator. Sempronius had the conductor all the voluntary foundiers, and besides of 25000 of Auxiliaries sent from the confederats. M.V. lerins the Pretor had the legions appointed for him, that were returned out of Sicily. M. Claudius the Vice-conful, was tent unto that army, which lay in garifon at Nola, above Sueffula, And the Pretors took their journey into Sicily and Sardinia. The Confuls, whenfoever they would affemble the Senat, proclaimed that the Senators, and all others that had lawful authority to fresk their mind and deliver their opinion in the Councel-House, should meet at the gate Capena. The Pretors, those that were Judges in the Court, and to whom the civil jurisdiction appertained, c rected their Tribunal feats and places of Affizes at the publick Fish-pool, and thither they commanded all writs to be returned, and apparence there to be made. And for that year all pleasand N judgements of causes passed there.

In this mean time news came to Carthage (from whence Mago the Gother of Annibal was minded to transport and let over into Italy 12000 footmen, and 1500 horsemen, 20 Elephants, and 1000 talents of lilver, together with a guard and supply of 60 gallies) That in Spain things went untowardly: and that all the Cities of Spain (in a manner) were revoked unto the Romans. Some there were of opinion, to withdraw Mago with that fleet and power of his, from the enterpile of Italy into Spain. Confidering there was good hope shewed of a suddain, recover again Sardnia, for that there was but a small power of Romans there; and Corneline the old Lord Deputy well acquainted with the State of the Province, was now upon his departure from thence, and new expected in his turn. Over and besides, that the Sardinians were weary already of the Ro mans government, which they had so long endured, as who the year that past was, had tyrannish over them cruelly, and exercised their authority with oppression, covetously imposing upon them hard exactions and tributs, and levying of them a most unjust taxation and contribution of comand finally they wanted nothing but an head, upon whom they might relie themselves. To this effect there was an Embaffage fent fecretly from the Lords and Princes of the Island. And the principal actor and procurer hereof, was Hersicora, a man in those daves of greatest authority and power among them. Upon these tidings aforesaid, happing so just at one time, they were both

A disquieted and also refreshed. So they sent Mago with his fleet, and other forces into Spain : and they chole for the expedition into Sardinia, Afdrubal furnamed Calvus, for the L. General furnished and appointed with as great a power almost, as Mage had.

At Rome likewife, the Confuls having dispatched the affairs of the City, addressed the mielves to the war. T. Sempronius appointed Sinneffa to be the Rendez-wons, where the fouldiers should meet at a certain day. And Q. Fabius, by an order and direction from the Sena:, made an Edict, That all men should before the first day of luly next enluing, gather all their corn out of the countries, and convey the fame into the principal walled strong Towns : proclaiming that who loever did not accordingly, their fields he would lay walt ; fell their fervants in port fale at the fpear and Biet their farms and villages a fire. Not so much as the Pretors themselves (created for civil jurisdiaion and to decide law matters) were freed and exempted from the conduct of war. As for Valerim the Pretor, he was appointed to go into Apulia, for to receive the army of Terentius: and when the legions were returned out of Sicily, to imploy them especially for the guard and defence of that country; and that the army of Terentins should be sent with some one of the Lieutenants. And M. Valerius had 25 fail allowed him, to keep and defend all the Sea coasts between * Brundussum and * Tarentum. The like number of ships was assigned to Q. Fulvius the City Pre- * Brindist. tor, for to guard the River fide, neer adjoyning to the City of Rome. C. Terentins the Proconful * Taramo. had in charge to take up by commission fouldiers in the Picene country, and to guard those quarters. And T. Offacilius Craffus, after that he had dedicated the Temple of Mens in the Capitol, was fent into Sicily, as Lord Admiral of the Armado there.

Upon this war between two of the nightiest Cities, and most puriffant states of the World, there was not a King and Prince, no, nor a Nation under Heaven, I nt was amused. Among whom Philip King of the Macedonians, had an eye thereto, and was more intentive, in that he was neerer unto Italy, and only divided from thence by the Jonian Sea. He at the first, when the bruit came to his cars, That Annibal was passed beyond the Alps : as be joyed nuch, that there was war kindled between the Romans and the Carthaginians, to, as long as it was uncertain, whether nation was the stronger, he wavered in mind and was in suspence, whether of the twain he should wish to have the victory. But after that he heard once, that in three feveral battails one after another, Annibal and the Carthaginians had gotten the better hand, he enclined to the fortunat fide, and o fent Embassadors unto Annibal: who falling off, and debrous to avoid the Havens of Brundusjum and Tarents m, which were guarded and kept by the Romans fleet, arrived and landed at the Temple of Inno Lacinia: and so through Apulia, travailing toward Capua, chanced to light upon the mids of the Romans corps de guard, and were brought before M. Valerius Levinus the Lord Deputy, being then encamped before Nuceria. Where Xenophanes, the principal of the Embassadors, bashed not to say, That he was sent from King Philip, to treat and conclude a league and amity with the people of Rome, and had commission and direction to the Consuls, to the Senat likewife and people of Rome, to that effect. Valerius taking great contentment to hear of this new fociety and friendship with so noble a King, especially upon the rebellion of so many old allies, courteoully intreated and friendly entertained this false hearted enemy, in stead of a trusty friend and appointed diverle to accompany him forward, to guide him carefully in the wayes, and to thew him what places, what passages and streights were held and kept, either by the Romans, or the enemies. Xenophanes with these instructions passed through the midst of the Roman guards into Campania, and so the next way arrived at the camp of Annibal, and made a league and amity with him, under these conditions and capitulations. Imprimes, That King Philip should with a right puissant Armada (for that he was supposed able to set out 200 sail) pass over into Italy, wast and spoil all the Sea coasts, and to his power maintain war by Sea and Land. Item, That when the war was finished, all Italy, together with the very City of Rome should be possessed by the Carthaginians and Annibal, and unto him all the pillage and booty likewife should belong. Item, When Italy was thus subdued, that they should fail into Greece, and wage war with what Princes here they pleased, and that all the Cities of the main, and the Islands which lay to Macedony, should fall unto Philip, and be annexed to his Kingdome. In these terms, and upon these Articles, in manner, was the league concluded and confirmed between the General Annibal, and the Embassadors of the Macedonians: and with them were sent back unto the King for the better ratifying of the faid covenants, certain Legats, to wit, Gifgo, Boffar, and Mago, who arrived together at the same Temple aforesaid, of Inno Licenia, where there rid closely a ship at anchor, expecting their return. From whence being departed, they were not to foon lanched out into the deep, and had taken the open Sea, but they were descried by the Roman fleet that guarded the coasts of Calabria. Q. Fulvius Flaceus made out certain Corcyreans, to purtue and fetch in that ship. Whereupon, the Macedonians began to flie, but leeing themselves overmatched in (wittness of fail, and not able to make way with them, they yeelded themselves unto the Romans, and were presented unto the Admiral; Who demanded what they were, from whence they came; and whither they were bound. Xenophanes who had already sped so well by making of a lye, began to cog again, and lay, That he was fent from Philip unto the Romans: that he came unto M. Valerius, because to him only he was able to pais in fafety, but could not peffibly get beyond Campania, being softrongy kept with garisons of the enemies. But afterwards, upon the fight of the Carthaginian habit and apparel, they began to suspect the Embassadors of Annibal: and they being questioned withal, their peech and language bewrayed them. Then was their retinue taken apart, and threatned to confels. Letters also were found upon them, sent from Annibal unto Philip, concerning the peace between the King of the Macedonians and Annibal. Upon these matters thus detected and certainly known, it was thought good to convey the Embassadors and their Company with all speed prisoners to Rome, unto the Senat there, or unto the Consuls wheresoever they were. To this purpose were chosen five Pinnasses that were most wist, under the conducted Lyaltins Antias, who had his direction and charge to part these Embassadors in several ships, and keep them sure assumes and to take good heed, that they neither talked nor conserved together.

About the same time it hapned at Rome, that Au. Cornelius Mammula, upon his departure out of the Province Sardinia, made report in what state the Iland stood; namely, that they all exclined to rebellion and war: that Musius who succeeded after him, presently upon his fist coming, by reason of the ill air and unwholsom water, was fallen into a sickness, not so quick and dangerous, as chronick and tedious, and would not be able long to endure the service of war: that the sum there, as it was sufficient to guard and keep in good order a quiet and peaceable Province, so could not hold out with the war that was like to ensue. Whereupon the LL of the Senst gaveoder, that Q. Fulvius Flaceus, should levy and enrol 3000 stoot, and 400 horse, and provide that this legion should pass over with all speed into Sardinia: and send therewith whom it pleated him to condust and manage the war until Masius were recovered of his disase. For this intent was T. Manlius Torquasus sent the Covernour; one, who had been twice Consul and Censor, and in his Consulting and subdued the Sardinians.

Neer about the fame time, there was an Armado fent out from Carthage unto Sardinia, under the leading of Afarbal lurnamed Calvum, and being fore toffed and beaten with tempelfs, was call upon the Balear Ilands: where (fo far out of order was not only the ship-tackling, but also the very keels and bodies of the ships so snaken) they drew up the ships to shore, and whiles they slayed

there about calking and trimming them again, they fpent much time.

In Italy whiles the wars began to flake and wax cold, by reason that after the battail of Canne. the strength of the one part was much abated, and their force decayed, and the courage of the other; well allayed and made effeminat: the Campains upon their own heads began to contrive, how to reduce the State of Cumes under their obedience, first folliciting them to revolt from the Romans: and feeing that course would not speed and take effect, they devised by a fraudulent prachile to compais and entrap them. The Compans use yearly to tolemnife a let fealt and lacrifice in a certain place called Hama: and they gave notice unto the Cumans, that the whole Sent of Capua would refort thither : requesting the Senat of Cumes likewise to meet them there, for to confer and confult together in common, how both Cities, the one and the other, might have the fame friends and the fame enemies, and no other: giving them withal to understand, that they minded there to have a good guard about them of armed men, for fear of some sodain and dangerons attempt from the Romans. The Cumans, aibeit they suspected some treachery, denied nothing, supposing thereby to colour ane cover their own crasty intended designment. Now all this while, T. Sempronius the Roman Conful, having surveyed and purged his army at Sinuesia, at which place he had made proclamation, that his forces should meet together : passed over the ti-u ver Vulturnus, and encamped neer unto Linternum: where because the Souldiers in the standing camp had nothing elfe to do, he exercifed them to run often the race and skirmish in aray, tothe end that the raw Souldiers (for such were the voluntaries for the most part Imight by use and put-&ife learn how to follow their colours in good order, and in the time of battail know their own ranks and enfigns. In these kinds of training, the special care that the General had, and theoply thing that he aimed at, was their concord and good agreement. And for this purpose, he charged the Lieutenants, and the Colonels and Captains, that they should not calt in any mans teeth one or other, their fortune and condition aforetime, thereby to breed any difcord and hearthurning among the companies: and that the old experienced fouldiers should suffer themselves to be but equal in estate to the new learners: and those that were born free unto the voluntaries, who had N been flaves: reputing them all of birth good enough, and of gentle bloud descended, unto whom the people of Rome had vouchfafed to commit their armor and enfigns : faying, that the same fortune which had driven them to to do, forced them likewife to maintain the tame, and make the best of it, now it was done. The Captains were not more careful in giving these good leffons and inftructions, but the fouldiers were as diligent to observe the same : and within a while their hearts and affections grew to be fo linked and united together, that they forgat generally, in what degree and of what condition each fouldier entred into tervice. Whiles Gracehus was be fied hereabout, the Embassadors of Cumes certified him, what kind of Embassage came unto them from the Campans, a few dayes before, and what answer they had returned: advertifing him that their festival day was to be holden three dayes after: that not only the whole Senat Would be prefent, but also the camp and army of the Campans. Gracehous having cemmanded the Ca manes to convey all that they had out of the fields and territories about, into their City, and themselves to keep within their walls: himself the day before the solemnity aforesaid of the Campani, removed his power to Cumes, and there incamped. Now Hama is three miles off from thence. The Campans by this time were affembled there in great number, according to appointment : and not far from the place, Marine Alfine the chief head Magistrat of Capaa, will incamped closely with fourteen thousand fouldiers. He, what with preparation of the sacrifice,

A and contriving withal, the deceitful train of treachery, was more buly and careful thereabout, than either in fortifying his camp, or in any other military action. Thus for three dayes continued this festival facrifice at Hama. And ever in the night season it was performed: fo, as before midnight all was done and finished, Gracehus supposing that a good time for his ambush to be employed, having fet certain warders before the gates, that no man might go forth to give intelligence, caused the souldiers betwire the first and tenth hour of the day, | from noon until fone of the clock] to refresh themselves and take their sleep: that in the beginning of the dark night, they might afternole togather at the watch word or figural given them. And about the first watch he commanded to display their Ensigns and advance forward : and thus with a ftill march, he arrived at Hama by midnight; surprised the hold of the Campans, and entred all the gates at once. being negligently guarded, by reason of their overwatching. Some he killed lying along fast assep; others, as they returned unarmed from the facrifice. In this night-tumult there were flain more than two thousand, with Marins Alfins himself their leader : and 43 Ensigns taken and carried away. Gracehu with the loffe of fewer than one hundred of his fouldiers, having won the camp, retired speedily to Cames, for fear of Annibal, who lay in fort encamped upon Tifata over Capua. And (as he was a provident man and of great forecast) nothing was he deceived in his opinion. For to foon as this defeat was reported at Capua, Annibal supposing that he should at Hame find the army of the Romans (confisting for the most part of raw fouldiers, and thoie, bondflaves) jocund and fufty above measure, and infolent upon their fresh victory, busic o in rifling their dead enemies thus conquered, driving away booties, and charged with pillage; removed his forces in halt, and marched apace beneath Capus: and encountred with some of the Campans that were fled, whom he caused between two guards to be conducted safe to Capua, and such as were hurt and wounded, to be let in waggons and carried thither. Himfelf found at Hame the camp empty and void of enemies, and nothing there but the tokens of a fresh massacre, and the dead bodies of his friends and allies lying here and there icattered. Some there were that advited him prefently to advance forward to Cumer, and to assault the Town. And albeit Annibat was willing enough thereto, and paffing defirous (teeing he could not come by Naples) to have Cumerat least, a maritime port-Town, as well as the other; yet because his touldiers had brought nothing with them but their weapons, as being led forth to march in tuch hate, he retired back again to his fort and camp upon Tefara. From whence, at the importunat prayers of the Campans, the day following he furnished himtelf with all the Ordinance and Engiges meet for the affault of a City, and returned toward Cumes: and having waited the territory thereof, he emcamped himself a mile from the Town. Then Graceinu, more for shame, that he might not feem to leave his affociates in such necessity, (who craved protection and recommended themselves to him, and to the people of Rome) than for any confidence and rrult that he repoted in the strength of his army, stayed in Cumes. Neither Fabius the other Conful, who was encamped at Cales, durit fet his army over the River Vulturnus: as having been bulied first at Rome in renewing the Auspices and bird flights : and after that, troubled also about the fearful prodigious figns which were reported one after another. And when he fought explation thereof by facrifices, the Sooth-layers made answer and faid, That they could not perceive that the Gods were appealed and pacified for all that he did. Thus whiles Fabius upon these occasions was kept back, Sempronius was belieged, yea, and by this time affaulted, with fabricks and engins of battery. One mighty great Towre of wood there was erected against the Town. Against which, the Roman Conful railed another from the very wall somewhat higher than it; for that he uled the wall (which of it felf was of good height) in ftead of a ground-work, and planted thereon frong posts and piles of timber to bear up the foresaid frame. From thence, at first the fouldiers within, defended the Town and Walls with flones, with long poles and perches and other instruments to lance against the assailants. But at length seeing the other turret coming forward even close to the Town wall, they flung thereon at once much firework, and planning matter : at which fires the multitude of armed men for fear leapt headlong down the turret: and withal, they of the Town issued out at two gates at once, discommed the guards of the enemies, and drave them into their camp: fo as that day Annibal was more like one belieged himself, than laying siege unto others. There were of Carthaginians stain about soutteen buttdred; forry wanting one were taken prisoners alive, such as about the walls and their Corps de great flood carelets and negligent, fearing nothing letterban a fally out of the Town, and were suddainly at unwares taken and imprifed. Gracehus founded the retreat, and caufed his men to retire within the Wells, before the enemies after their suddain frigh could be railied together. The morrow after, Annibal (supposing that the Consul in his ruff for this happy hand, would come into the field to fight a jet battail) arranged himfelf in array between his Camp and Camer. But after that, he faw no firring at all from the usual guard and defence of the City. and nothing put to the rash hazard of doubtful hope, he retired to Tifata, without any good at all

At the very same time that the siege was raised before Cumer, Time Sempronius surnamed Longus, sought fortunatly in Lucania before Grammum, with Hanno the Carthaginian: slew away with 41 ensigns. Hanno thus driven out of the confines of Lucania, retired himself back into the country of the Brutil: And M. Falerins the Pretor, recovered by force from the Himself back.

the fouldiers, and the army brought back to Cumes. Whiles these things hapned in the Countries of the Lucans and Hirpins, those 5 ships above. faid (wherein were embarked the Embassadors of the Macedonians and Carthaginians as prifoners) having fet a compais from the upper Adriatick Sea unto the nether Sea of Tuican, round about (in a manner) all the Sea coast of Italy, hapned to fail along neer the City of Cumes: and being not certainly known whether they were friends or enemies, Gracehus put forth out of his fleet two Pinaces to encounter them. When as by demanding and questioning one with another. I it was once certified unto them, that the Conful was within Cumes, and the ships there arrived in the haven, the prisoners were brought to the presence of the Conful, and all the letters delivered. The Conful after he hadread over the letters, both of Philip and Annibal, fealed them up again sure, and sent them by Land unto the Senat of Rome, but commanded the Embassadors themselves to be conducted thither by Sea. When as both letters, and also the Embassadors were arrived at Rome, in a manner, all in one day, and that (after due examination) words and writings agreed together in one: at the first the LL, of the Senat were pensive and plunged deeply into cares, confidering in how great danger they flood of a new Macedonian war, who were hardly able to endure the Carthaginian. But in conclusion, so far were they off from being ptterly dismayed hereat, and sinking under the water, that forthwith they began to treat and de I bate, how they might begin themselves to war with these enemies first, and so stop them from their entrance into Italy. The captive Embaffadors they laid up fast in irons : their train and retinue were fold in open market: and befides the five and twenty ships, whereof Q. Fulvium Flaccus was Admiral, they took order for twenty more to be rigged and decked: which being provided, furnished and shot into the pool associ, together with those five barks wherein the priloners were conducted: there were 50 fail in all, that loofed from Offia and arrived at Tarentum. Quintus Fulvius had commission to embark the souldiers of Varro, who had been under the leading of L. Aprilius the Lieutenant at Torentum, with his fleet of fifty fail, not only to defend the Sea-coalt of Italy, but also to hearken and have an eye after the Macedonian war: and in case he could learn, that the designment and intent of Philip was sutable to those letters and in- I formations of the Embaffadors , then he should by his letters certifie M. Valerius the Pretorso much; and that leaving with L. Apostius his Lieutenant the charge of the army, he should go to the Armado at Tarentum, and with all speed possible ict over into Macedony, and there endeavour to keep Philip play at home within his own realm. As for that money which was fent unto Appius Claudius into Sicily for to be repayed unto King Hiero, it was appointed unto him, for the maintenance of his Armado, and managing of the Macedonian war. Modii of wheat, and 100000 of barley. Whiles these preparations and doings passed at Rome, one ship of those prisoners which were sent to Rome, chanced to single it self from the other, and to escape away to Philip: whereby M he was advertised, that the Embassadors or Commissioners were taken, and the letters intercepted. But he not knowing what covenants had passed between Annibal and his legats, and what answer they should have brought unto him, sent forth another embassage with the same commission, The Embassadors sent unto Annibal, were Heraclitus surnamed Scotinus, Cicero of Be rea, and Sofithens of Magnefia. These went to and tro between in lafety, these carried and recaried their errands fortunatly. But the summer was come and gone, before the King could emer into action, or execute any enterprise. Of to great moment and importance was the bootding of that one ship at the first with the Embassidors, for the deferring of that imminent war intended

When Fabins had passed over the River Vulturnus, after the expiation at length of the prodict gious tokens aforefaid, both Consuls together made war about Capua. Fabius by affault won theie Cities, Combutteria, Trebula, and Austicula, which had revolted unto the Carthaginim. and within them he surprised the garison souldiers of Annibal. Many of the Campans likewife were taken prisoners. At Nota (like as in the year before) the Senat held with the Romans, but the Commonalty took part with Annibat, and plotted iecretly, how to murder the Nobility and to betray the City. Mutius the Pretor was fallen fick, and lay of a long and ling ring discase. Manlius after he had drawn the Gallies ashore at Caraleis, and put the maniscs and rowers in arms for Land-fervice, and received of the Pretor his army, was able to make 22000 foot, and 1200 horfe. With this power of men of arms and footmen together, he entred into the enemies countrey, and not far from the camp of Hersterra, pitched his tents. Herstern himself was by chance gone then, into the country of the Pellidians (a people of Sardinia) to arm the youth there, for the mending of his strength; and left his son named Hiosus, Ruler over the camp in the mean time. He a lutty hot youth, rashly joyned battail, and quickly was discomfitted and put to flight: thirty thousand Sardinians in that field were flain, and upon 1070 taken prisoners alive. The rest of the army first fled stragling asunder over the fields, and through the woods; but afterwards, hearing by the voyce that went, how their captain was fled to * Cor- * Cornete. mus the head City of that region, they retired thither also. And furely they had in that one bartail, made an end of all war in Sardinia, but that the Armado of Carthage, under the leading of Aldrubal (which by tempest had been cast upon the Baleare Islands) came in time to entertain the Islanders, in hope to rebel. Manlius, after it was noticed abroad, that the Carthaginian fleet was arrived, retired himself to Caraleis: which gave Hersicora good opportunity and overture to joyn with Afdrubal, Who having landed his fouldiers, and fent the thips back again unto Carthate, went forward by the guidance of Hersicora, robbing and spoiling the Lands of the Roman confederats: and had come as far as Caraleis, but that Manlius with an army encountred him upon the way, and restrained him from so lavish over-running and robbing the countrey. At the fift they encamped one against the other not far afunder : afterwards, they began to put out certain bands and companies, and to maintain light skirmishes with variable event, until at last they pitched a fet field, and in full battail fought for the space of 4 hours. The Carthaginians held out conflict a good while, and the victory still remained doubtful (for the Sardinians were ever used to have the foil) but at last, seeing every quarter full of the Sardinians either lying along dead, orrunning away, they also were discomfitted: and as they turned their backs and were about to flie, the Romans wheeled about with that wing, wherewith they had defeated the Sardinians, and enclosed them round, and so they fell rather to killing than fighting any longer, 12000 enemies were there flain of Sardinians and Carthaginians together, about 3700 were takenpriloners, and 27 military enfigns won. This was a noble and famous battail, memorable especially above all, for taking of these prisoners; namely, Asdrubal the L. General, Hanno and Mago, two noble men of Carthage. Mago was of the Barchine house, neer of kin and in bloud to Annibal, Hanno was the sollicitor of the Sardinians to rebellion, and no doubt, the principal Author of that war. Neither was this field less famous for the overthrow of the chief commandets of the Sardinians : for both Hiostus the son of Hersicora was slain in fight : and also Hersicora himself, as he fled with a few Horsemen, hearing besides other calamities and losses, of the death of his ion, in the night feafon, because he would have no man come between to flay his purposed intent, killed himlelf. All the rest escaped to the City * Cornus, as they had done afore, and there * cornus as in a place of refuge fought to fave themselves. But Manlius following the train of his victory, came against it, and within few dayes was master of it. After this, other Cities, also which had revolted, and turned to Hersicora and the Carthaginians, gave hostages, and yeelded by compofition. And when Manlius had levied of them certain money for the fouldiers pay and corn likewife, according to the power and ability or trespals of each of them, he led his army back to Caraleis: and there having put the Gallies on the water, and embarked the fouldiers that he had brought with him, he failed to Rome, and recounted unto the LL, of the Senat the utter subduing of Sardinia. The money he delivered to the Treasurers, the corn to the Ædiles, and the prisoners unto Fulvius the Pretor.

Much about that time, T.O. acidius the Pretor, having failed from Lilybaum into Affrick, and wasted the territory of the Carthaginians, as he was bound from thence and set sail for Sardinia, whither Afdrubal as the news went had lately croffed over from the Baleare-Hands, he met with the Armado returning back into Affrick: and after a skirmish made upon the Sea by his souldiers lightly armed, he took therewith seven Gallies with their oars and mariners: the rest for sear were scattered, as it had been with a tempest, all over the Sea. And it hapned about the same time, that Bomilear with certain companies of fouldiers fent from Carthage for a supply and forty Elephants, and good store of victuals came to Locri. For the surprising and setting upon him on pa ludden, Ap. Claudius leading his army in haft, and marching to Messara under a colour of visiting the Province, put over to Locris with the tide, Now was Bomilear passed already from thence into the Brutians country to Hanno, and the men of Locris shut the gates against the Romans. So Appins, after much ado and preparation, having effected nothing, returned back to Messana. In the lame fummer, Marcellus made many rodes from Nola (which he held with a garrison) into the Hirpins country, and the Samnits, about Candium, and made such wast there, with fire and fword. that they in Samnium called into their fresh remembrance the old losses and overthrows which they had received: whereupon there were fent immediately from both nations Embaliadors together, unto Annibal, who in this wite delivered their speech unto him. If both Coss, were with their armies at Noles, they were no more able to match with Annibal, than they were at Canne: much less might one Pra-"ror with a few raw and new fouldiers hold out and keep Nola against him. And as for the No-"lans themselves, it concerned them much more than it did Anmbal, to consider, whether he "should win Nola by force, or enter upon it by furrender and composition. For to be Lord therof "he made no doubt, like as he was Malter already of Capaa and Nuceria but what odds and diffe-"rence there is between the state of Capua and of Nuceria, the Nolans know best themselves, who "are feated (as it were) in the mid way between both. Loath he was to prognoflicate so much un-"to Nola, what calamities might befall the City, it it were conquered by affault : rather yet would B"he give his word and promife, That if they would deliver Marcelius with his garrifon, and yield up Nola into Annibal his hand, they should themselves, and none but they set down and capitua late under what conditions they would entertain alliance & triendship with Annibal, To this motion Herennius Baffus framed his answer in this fort. "For many years already there hath been The answer of "continual amity between the people of Rome and Nola, and neither of both to this day hath Harmins to "repented therof. As for the Nolans themselves if they had been disposed to turn with the wind, "and to change their faith and alleageance, together with their fortune, they would have done it Clong before this: for now it was too late to Hart & elter. It they had minded to yield themselves "unto Annibal, they would never have fent for a garrifon of Romans: but fince they were now "come to protect and defend them, they had imparted & communicated all their flate with them C already, and would take such part as they, so long as they had an hour to live. This emparl put Annibal clean besides all hope of gaining Nola by treason. Therefore he beleaguered the town on every side, and invested it round about like a garland, to the end, that in one instant he might give the affault on every part of the walls. When Marcellus faw him under the walls he fet his people first in battel aray within the gate and then with a great noise and tumnit he juddenly fallied out. At their first shock and onset divers of the enemies were beaten down and slain: but after that, they ranfrom all parts to battel, and were come together with equal forces, the, fight began to be hot and sharp, and a memorable conslict it had been and sew like it but that it raised and poured down to fast, and with so many storms and tempests, that it parted both the battels, and staid the fight, So for that day, having with that smal skirmish kindled their courages, and ler their blond in n heat, they retired back, the Romans within the City, and the Carthaginians to their Camp. Howbeit, of the Carthaginians there were flain, upon the first fally and charge given, not above thirty, and of the Romans not one man; This tempessuous shower of rain lasted all night long, and continued still, and never gave over untill nine of the clock before noon the next day. And therefore, albeit they were sharp set, and their fingers itched on both sides to be a fighting, yet for that day they kept within their hold and frength. So the third day Annibal fent out certain companies into the territory about Nola, for to fortage and fetch in booties; which, fo foon as Marcelius understood, he presently set his men in array, and entred the field, neither was Annibal for his part behind Now there was a mile distance, or very near between the City and the enemies Camp, In this space between (for all about Nota is plain and champian) they encountred and joyned battel. E The shout that they set up on both sides, reclaimed and caused to return unto the sight aiready begun the nearest of those cohofts and bands which were gone a forraging into the country. The men of Nola likewise came unto the Romans, and meaded their battel: whom Marcellus commended for their forwardness, and gave them in charge to abide in the rerewards to help as occafion ferred, and to carry forth of the skirmish those that were hurt and wounded, and to forbear fight in any case, unless they had a fignall and token given them by him. The fight was doubtfull, for both the Generals gave encouragement effectually, and also the souldiers did their best, and fought right mansolly? Marcellus was earnest with his men to press hard and charge still upon their enemies, whom they had defeated nor three daies ago, who not many daies pail were put to flight, and driven from Cumes, and who the year before were beaten from Nol. under his conr duck by other souldiers, saying, "That they were not all there in the field, but many of them gone The speech of "ranging abroad in the country, for to hale booties, and get prizes. As for that lively strength and vigour of theirs, it was clean gone: thole able and lufty bodies were decaied, those couragious hearts abated, wherewith they passed over the Pyrenean mountains, and the high cliss of the Alps. There remained now nothing but the reliques and shadow of those men to fight, who are scarce able to bear their very armour, to lit up their arms, and carry their own bodies. Adding withall, that Capua was another Canna unto Annibal: there died his warlike prowels, there lost he his military discipline; there was the glorious same of former daies buried; there the hope of future time for ever suppressed and sifted As Marcellus by reproving these and such ike things in his enemies; animated his own fouldiers: so Annibal rebuked his men with more that words and bitter checks." Ye that were Wont, being few in number, to vanquish many are ye now, being many in number, hardly able to withstand and abide the violence of a few? Ye spake big, and gave out great brags and or proud words, that if any man would lead you, you would win Rome, that you would. Behold, "now, a smaller piece of service. Here I would have you prove your strength, and make triallof "your valout. Let us ice now, win me Nola, a City scituate in the Champian, on a plain, delended neither with sea nor river. O out of this so wealthy a City, will I be ready to lead you, la-"den with rich piliage and poil, whither toever ye will, or follow you, wherefoever ye would have me. But nothing availed either his chearfull words, or his checking rebukes, to enconrage and confirm their hearts. For the Carthaginians being forced on every fide to retreat. whiles the Romans grew more and more animated, not only through the comfortable speeches of their own Captains, but also the Nolans themselves, who with their loud shouting in token of their love and affection, enkindled their courages to hot fight) turned their backs, and were driven into their hold. And when the Romans were derirous to affail the fame. Marcelles reconducted them to Nola, with great joy and congratulation even of the Com- K mons there, who before, were more enclined and affected to the Carthaginians. There were of the enemies flainthat day above one thouland, fixteen hundred were take prisoners, nineteen military enfigns won, two Elephants gotten alive, and foure flain in the conflict. Of Romins there were not killed all out one thousand. The morrow after they spent supon a truce concluded) in burying the dead that were flain on both fides. Of the spoils of the enemies Marcellus made a great fire, upon a vow pronounced unto Vulcan. On the third day, 1272 horiemen of Numidians and Spaniards, one with another (upon some spleen and anger I beleeve, or elle for hope of more liberall entertainment and commodious gain) fled from Annibaland turned to Mareellus: whose valiant and faithfull service stood the Romans in very good flead oftentimes during that war. And after the war was ended, the Spaniards in Spain, and L the Numidians in Affrick, in reward of their vertue and prowels, were endued with rair lands and large possessions. Annibal ient Hanno back from Nola to the Brutii, together with the forces that he came with: himself went to the wintring harbours of Apulia, and lodged about

Quintus Fabius 10 1000 as he heard that Annibel had taken his way into Apulia, conveyed all the corn from Nola and Naplesinto his Camp, which he had pitched above Sueffula: and having well fortified the hold, and left there a sufficient garriton to guard the place for that winter time, removed himself nearer to Capua, and there encamped: and so wasted the Campan Territory with fire and fword, that the Campans little trufting in their own forces, were confizined to iffue forth of their gates, and fortifie themselves in Camp before the City, in theopen M pain. Six thouland they were in all. Their footmen were weak and not for service: their horsemen were far better and more able: fo that oftentimes they charged their enemies with their horse, and provoked them to fight. Among many brave men of arms that the Campans had, one Jubillus, turnamed Turea, a Citizen of Capua, was the worthieft and best horseman of them all, by many degrees: infomuch, as when he ferved under the Romans, Claudius Affellus only, a Citizen of Rome, was able to match him in glory of good horlemanship, and horse service. This Taures when he had ridden all about the troops of his enemies, casting his eye every way toice if he could cipy Chandins Asselius, enquired at length closely, after filence made, where about he was, and made this challenge unto him, That feeing he was wont in words to contend with him for valour and prower, he should now determine the question by the spear-point and y dint of tword, and either be despoiled of his glorious armour, if he were overcome, or ele gain the same with the victory. Which defiance being brought into the Camp to Afellus his ears, he made no more to do, but went prefently to the Conful, to know whether he might with his good leave and licence out of his rank fight extraordinarily with his enemy that bad him combat. After leave obtained, he armed himself immediatly, mounted on horseback, and rode before the enemies corps de guard, oftentimes calling upon Taurea by name, and bidding him come forth to encounter when oever he durft. Now were the Romans by this time gone forth of the Camp in great number to behold this combat: the men of Capua likewise filled not only the rampier of their ho'd but also the walls of the City to see this fight. When as they had made some goodly flourish afore hand with brave swords and flout speeches, to set out the action: they fet spear in rest, and put spurs to horse, and justled together amain. Afterwards, having gotten the liberty of the ground they dallied one with another, trifling out the time, and making along peece of work of it, without giving or taking wound. Then quoth the Campu Knight to the Roman, This will be but a fight of horses, and not of horsemen, unless we not out of the open plain ground here into this hollow way, where having no such scope to prick out at large, we shall soon come to hand gripes, and close together. The word was not solon spoken, but Claudins turned his horse head, and rode into the foresaid way. But Taurea a stonet

A champion in word than deed: Oh, take heed of all things (quoth he) how you ride a gelding in a ditch: Which grew afterwards to a by-word used among the country people. Clinding after he had rode in and out, up and down, a long time in the lane, and never met with his enemy, returned again into the open plain: and rating the cowardice of his enemy, with great joy and gratulation, rode back as conquerour into the Camp. Some Annals and Chronicles do record and add to this combat of horsemen, a strange and wonderful thing (no doubt) if it be true, as by the common opinion it is reputed no less: namely, that when Taurea fled back into the City Clandautollowed hard after him in chace, entred with him at one gate flanding open, and rode out dear at the other unburt, to the great wonder and aftonishment of the enemies. Upon this the B flanding Camps were quiet on both sides: and the Cos. removed backward farther offirom the City, that the men of Capua might low their grounds: neither did he any harm unto their fields, before the corn was come up and to well grown that the blade theteol yielded good forrage and food for the horses; which he gathered and brought into the standing Camp and hold of (1.18dus above Suessula, and there he built winter harbors for to make his abode. And he gave order to M.Cl. udus the Vice-Confull, to keep thill at N. La a competent garrifon for defence of the City; and to discharge the eff of the fouldiers, and fend them to Rome, that they should neither be combrons to their A.lies, nor chargeable to the Common-weal. Tib. Gracchus allo whites he led his Legions from Cumes into Apulia to Luceria, fent M. Valerius the Prator from then e to Brundustium, with that army which he had at Luceria, commanding him to keep the lea-coast of the C Salentines Country, and to provide for all things necessary against Philip and the Macedonian

In the end of this summer, wherein these acts were atchieved, whereof I have written, there came a packet of Letters from P, and Cornel, Scipios, importing how great and how fortunate exploits they had performed in Spain: but there wanted money for pay: and apparell and corn to serve both fouldiers and mariners. And albeit all the ethings were away, yet as concerning money, if the City Chamber and common Treasure were not stored, they would make some shift to raise it of the Spaniards : but for all the relt, needs it must be sent from Rome, for otherwise neither could they keep the Army together nor hold the Province in their allegeance. When the letters were read there was no man there but acknowledged that they wrote a truth, and demann ded that, which was reasonable, But they confidered withall, what great armies both on land and at sea they making and what a mighty Armada they must prepare and set out anew, in case the Macedonian war went forward. As for Sietly and Sardinia, which before the wars began, paid tribute, were have able to find and keep the garrifons; that lay there for the guard of the Provinces: and that they were to trust upon their own revenues and tribute for the maintenance of the charge they were at. But as the number of them that paid rent and conferred tribute, was greatly diminished by so great overthrows of the armies, both at the pool Thrasymenus, and also at Cannie: fo thole few that remained, if they were burdened with many exactions and payments, should be plagued and undone another way, therfore it was concluded, that unless the Commonweal maintained not herfelf by her credit and borrowing money, the were not able to be suffained by her own wealth and riches, So it was agreed, That Fulvius the Prator must needs assemble all the people together, and lay abroad and declate unto them the necessity and exigent that the Common weal was driven unto, and to exhort all them that had enriched themselves and encreated their livings, by renting and taking to farm the revenues and commodities of the City, should now do good to the Commonweal for a time, by which they were grown to that wealth, and undertake the provision at a price, and fitnish the army in Spain, with all necessities thereto belonging, to be contented and pald therefore with the first, out of the common Chest, when it were flored with money. Thus the Prætor made declaration of these matters in the open afsembly of the people, and withall determined and set down a certain day, who supon he minded to pur forth the fouldiers ilveries and apparel, and corn to be provided for the Spanish Army, and all things elfe requirite for the mariners. When the day was come, the e presented themselves unto him three companies of nineteen men, for to take this bargain. Who made two requests and demands, the one that for that three years next enfoing, there should be no other Publicans or farmers of the City: the other; that what loever they shipped, the Common-weal would make good against all force of enemy, or violence of tempest. Both being granted, they took upon them the matter, and fo the Common-weal was served by the money of private perions. This was the demeanor, this was the loving affection to their country, that went through all degrees of men (as it were) after one fort and manner. And like as they undertook with great contage to serve the artiny so with singular fidelity they performed every thing, in such fort, sthere was nothing at all wanting, no orione than if they had been maintained from a rich treaury, as in times past. At what time as this provision came the town of Mitargi was assalled * Aldeattrie, by Afarabal, Mago, and Amilear the for of Bomiliar, because it revolted unto the Ro- or andularel mans.

Amidft thele three feverall Camps of the enemies, the two Scipios pulled into the City of their Alifes, that made telistance against, and with great loss of men; and brought corn with theff whereof there was great water and after they had encouraged and exhi tred the ownimen that with the fame resolution they would defend the walls as they had seen the Roun army to fight for their and in their quarrell; they led forth their power to give an affault upon the greatest Camp, whereof Afdrubal was the General. Thither also repaired the two Cap- H tains and two Armies of the Carthaginians, when they faw that the whole triall of thematter was there to be determined, and to they issued out of their tents and fought. Threescore thousand enemies were that day in field, and about 16000 Romans: and yet the victory went to clear with the Romans, that they flew more of their enemies than they were in number themselves, took prisoners more than three thousand men, and not many under a thousand horse, and withall won 60 military enfigns wanting one, and killed five Elephants in the battel: and to conclude. were Lords that day of three Camps. After that the fiege was raised from Illiturgi, the Carthaginian armies were led to the affault of the town Incibili, having their companies made up and supplied again out of the Province, (as being a nation of all others most desirous and eager of war, I fo there be hope of pillage or good recompence) and at that time especially full of young and he flymen. Where there was a fecond field tought with like fortune of both fides as before. There were flain above thirteen thousand enemies, and more than 3000 taken pritoners, besides two and forty military enfigns, and nine Elephants. Then in a manner all the Cities of Spainterole ted to the Romans. And far greater exploits were that summer performed in Spain, thania

Anno was not so soon returned out of Campane, into the country of the Brutii, butly their help and guidance he sollicited to rehellion the Greek Cities, which continued the more wi ling y in league and alliance with the Romans, because they saw that the brain, whom they both hated and seared sided with the Carthaginians, And first he assisted and s went in hand with Rhegium, where he spent certain daies to little or no purpose. In this mean time, the Inhabitants of Locri were butie in carrying away with great halfe the corn, wood and fewel, and all things elfe, necessary for the use of man, out of the country into the City; because they would leave nothing for the enemy to prey upon. And daily more and more of them were out of the gates by heaps, to as at last there was no more left in the City, than those that were compelled to repair the breaches of the walis and the gates, and to bring into the turrets and bulwarks flore of darts and other shot. Against this multitude and confused mixture of all ages, sexts and degrees ranging over the fields, whereof most were altogether unarmed Amilear the Carthe givian sent out his Cavalry, giving them direction, and charging them to hurt no person. Thete horsemen opposed their troops between them and home, only to exclude them out of the City when they were feattered one from mother in flight. The General himself in personencamped on a high ground from whence he might view the country and the City. And gave command ment to a cohort of the Brutii to approach the walls to call forth the principall Citizens of Lari to par , and by making promife of Annibal his friendship, to perswade and exhort them to yield up the rown. At the first they gave no credit at all unto the Brutis, what foever they faid; Burat terwards, when they discovered Hanno and the Carthaginians upon the hils, and heard by foot

A few of their own Citizens that were fled back & escaped, how all the rest of the multitude were fall within danger of the enemies, they made answer, that they would confer and consult thereapon with the body of the people. So immediatly they were assembled together. The most light headed persons were defirous of a change and new alliance: they also, whose kinsfolk and friends were by the enemy intercepted and kept out of the City, had their minds engaged and bound fure enough, as if they had put in hostages: and some sew who were well affected inwardly in heart. & liked of constancy and true loyalty, yet durst not be known thereof, and shew themselves to stand to it: so as, they all agreed in outward appearance, to surrender themselves to the Carthaginians. And after they had closely conveigned into the haven, and embarked L. Atilius the Captain of the B garnion, and all the Roman ionldiers that served under him to the end, that they might be transported to Rhegium, they received Amilea: and the Carthaginians into the City, with this condition, that prefently there should be concluded a league upon equall and indifferent coverants and capitulations between them. But the promile in this belialf (when they had once yielded themleves) was nothing well performed: whiles Amilear charged the Lo. rians, with fraudulent difmissing and letting go the Romans : and they again alleaged for their excuse, that they fled away, and made an escape. The horsemen also followed hard in chase by land, if haply either the tide might cause the ships to stay in the current within the straight, or drive them a land. But those whom they purfued, they could not overtake: marry, other thips they espied, croffing the streights from Messanto Rhegium. Roman souldiers they were sent from Clandius the Prator, to lie in C garrison there, and to keep the town. Whereupon they presently departed from Rhegium.

As for the Citizens of Locri, they had peace granted them by express order and direction from Annibat upon these conditions: Imprimis, That they might live free under their own laws: Item That both the City and the haven should jemain still in the hands of the Locrians. The substance of the covenant rested and was established upon these terms. That the Carthaginians and Locrians should aid and assist one another mutually, both in peace and war, So the Carthaginians retiand mount and and a single of an end of the muttering and mutmuring of the Brutit, because they had left Rhogium and Local untouched, which two Cities they made full account to have sacked and rifled. And therefore they of themselves having levied and put in arms a power of fifteen thousand of their own youth, marched forward to assail Croson, a Grecian City likewise, and seanted upon the sea. Assuring themselves, much to better their estate, if they could be possessed of a port and sea-town, senced with strong wals and Bulwarks. This only troubled and perplexed their minds, that they durst not but fend unto the Carchaginians for aid: fearing left they might feem to have entred into action and war, without regard of the common good of their confederats, if they called them not: and doubting besides, that if the General of the Carthaginians should prove again, rather an arbitrator of peace, than a coadjutor in war, they should fight in vain against the liberty of Croton, as they had done before against the City of Locri. Whereupon they thought best to send Embassadors unto Annibal for his warrage, and to be secured from him, that if Croton were recovered by the Brutians, it should be subject unto them. Annibal made aniwer, that this matter required confultation of men present with them in place, and therefore E he put them over to Hanno, from whom they received no certain answer to trutt unto. For willing they were not, that a noble and rich City, as it was, should be spoiled: and besides, they were in good hope, that in case the Brutians should assail it, and the Carthaginians all the while not seen, either to allow or help them in their enterprize, the Citizens would the more willingly revolt unto them. The Inhabitants within Croton were not of one mind, and affected alike. For there was one malady that had infected all the Cities of Italy, namely, the diffention between the Commons and the Nobles. The Senators inclined to the Romans, the Commoners on the other fide took part with the Carthaginians. This division within the City, the Bruii were by a fugitive runaway advertised of in these terms: namely, that Aristomachus, the ting-leader and head of the Commons minded to berray the City: that it was a wide, vafte, and delolate town taking a F great circuit of ground : and all the walls being decaied and in fundry places broken down, the Senators and the Commonskept their severall guards and watches in lundry quarters far asunder. And look (quoth he) where the Commons ward, there ye may enter at your pleasure. Upon this intelligence and direction given by the fugitive, the Brutit environce the City round about and being let in by the Commons at the first assault enveroned the City round about and being let in by the Commons at the first assault were masters of all places, saving the Castle. The Nobles held that piece forefeeing what might happen, and therefore provided themselves of a sure refuge. This there saving the Castle and the Cast thaginians, and not to the Brutii. Now this City Croton had a wall (before Pyrrhus coming into diah) twelve miles in compass; but after it was laid waste by that war, scarce the one half of the town was inhabited. The river that was wont to run through the midft of the town passed now along the wals without those streets where the houses stood thick and well peopled, far from the Sixmiles without the town there flood a noble Temple of Lacinia Juno, more renowned than the City it felf, as being honoured with great religion and devotion of all the Cities and nations thereabout. A facred grove there was in that place compassed with a thick wood, of tall fir trees, naving in the midft within it divers pleasant and fruitfull pastures, wherein were sed beasts consectated unto the goddels, of all fores, without any keeper and paftor. And albeit the cattell went forth in the morning by herds and flocks of their own kind, levered by themselves, yet at night they used to return back again to their own pens and stalls, without harm received either by the wait laying of wild and ravenous beafts, or by deceitfull fraud of men. Great encrease therefore H and much commodity accrued by those cattel, infomuch as thereof was made a maffie Column or pillar of beaten gold, and confectated in that place, so as the Temple was famous, as well for riches, as holines and devotion. And many times it falleth out, that to such notable places there are attributed some strange miracles, For the report goeth, that there standers an altar in the very porth of the Temple, the ashes lying whereupon no wind was ever known to blow away.

But to return to Croton. The Castle thereof on the one side standeth upon the sea, on the other fide it bendeth and looketh toward the land. Defended in times past it was only by the natural fituation of the ground, but afterwards fortified also with a wall; on that part whereas Dionifius the Tyrant of Sicily, having gained the back rocks and cliffs behind, by craft and guile sometime, won it, This Castle at that time supposed to be strong and safe enough, the Nobles seized and sept, notwishstanding the Brutii and their own Commons besieged them. At length the Brutii leting the Castle impregnable, by all the forces and assaults that they could make of themselves, were driven of necessity to crave aid of Hanno. Who having assaid to draw and urge the Crotoniats to yield, upon these conditions, To suffera Colony of the Brutis thither to be brought, and there planted; and that thereby a City lying so waste and desolate, might be replenished and peopled again, as in ancient time : could not move and perswade any one of them all, but Aristomachus For all besides, protested and said, they would die before they would be intermingled with the Brutii, to change their own rites and manner of life, their cultomes, their laws, and within a while their language also, for others that were strange and forrain. Ar flomachus alone, seeing that her could not prevail neither by perswasions to induce them to yield, nor find any means to betray the Cassel like as he had done the town before, sled a way to Hanno. Shortly after, certain Embassadors from Locri, by the licence and permission of Hanno, entred the Castle, and periwaded them to be content for to be translated to Locri, rather than to abide and stand out the extremity: saying that they had fent Embassadors already to that intent unto Annibal, and had got a grant at his hands, that they might to do. So they abandoned Croton, and the Crotoniats were brought down tothe fea fide and embarked, and the whole multitude departed to Locri.

In Applia; the very winter season was not quiet between the Romans and Annibal. Semprania the Conful wintred at Luceria, and Annibal not far from him in Arpi: and as they could spy oportunity, or take their vantage, of the one side or the other, there passed some light skirmishes between them. But the Romans had alwaies the better, and every day more than other, became more wary and secured from all trains and deceitful snares of the enemy.

In Sierly the Romans found a great change, and all out of order, by reason that King Hiero was dead and the Crown translated to his Nephew, or fons fon, Hieronymus: being yet a child, not like to use his own liberty with moderation, and much less to sway the Kingdom and Scepter with differetion. His guardians and friends gladly entertained the protection and government of such a nature, and were ready enough to plunge him headlong into all vice and wickednels. Which King Hieroforefeeing, was willing (by report, in his latter daics, to have left Syracufa free and at liberty, to the end that so noble a kingdom, acquired and established by good means, should not under the Lordly dominion of a child to the great obloquy and shame of the world, be minute, and come to nought. But his daughters with tooth and nail crossed this his designment, and made full reckoning, that the child should only bear the name of a King, but the government of the whole State should wholly rest in them and their husbands, Andronodorus and Zoilus: who were the principall guardians, let to overlee the young Prince. And an easie matter it was not for an aged man, now fourfcore years old and ten, so hardly laid at day and night, by the fair speeches, and feminine flatteries of his daughters, to keep his mind free, and to apply and convert it to intend private regards, and the publike confideration of the State, " And therefore he left fifteen we " tors to overlee and governthe child, whom he befought upon his death-bead, even whenhe "was going out of this world, to maintain entire and unspotted, the faithfull alleageance to the "Romans, which he had kept and observed inviolate for the space of fifty years: and to setten " their helping hand willingly, to direct the young Prince above all, to tread in his steps, and to "follow that discipline wherein he had been nurtured and taught. After he had given this charge, and yielded up his breath, the guardians came abroad, brought forth the Kings last will and tellsment and shewed the young Prince in the open assembly of the people and well near siteen years of age he was.) Where some few, such as were bestowed here of purpose within the press of the affembly for to shout and shew testimony of their joy and good liking, approved with open voice, and allowed the Kings will: whereas all the rest fared as Orphans in a City bereaved of their King and (as it were) become fatherless, and feared all things that might enfine. The King was interred and his funerals folemnized, with the love and kind affection of his people and subjects, more than with any studious care and diligence of his own friends that were nearest to him, After this, Andronodorus removed from about the Prince all other guardians but himself, giving out oftentimes that Hierosymus was past a child, and able to govern of himself as King. Thusby deposing the Protectorship, which was common to him and many others, he took upon him and usurped the power and authority of them all. Hard it was even for a right good King and well governed, that should succeed after Hiero, to find favour and win grace among the Syraufians: To heartily they affected and loved King Hiero. But Hieronymus, as if he had been willing and desirous, that by his vicious and wicked life, they should have a great miss of his grands ther, and wish again for him; at the very first fight, when he " himfelf abroad in open

A place, declared unto the world, what difference and great odds there was. For they who so many years together had never feen Hiero, not his fon Gelo, either in habit of apparel, or in any other ornaments and pore, differing from all other Cirizens, now beheld him in his purple robes, with his regall Crown and Diadem, attended with his guard and train of armed penfioners: yea, and otherwhile, after the manner of Denis the Tyrant riding forth of his Court and Palace, in a Chariot drawn with four white fleeds. This prond pomp and flately array was accompanied and figited with semblable qualities and conditions. He contemned and despised all men: he scorned most proudly to give audience to humble suppliants: and sent them away with reproachful terms and tannes. And not only strangers, but also his very guardians hardly might have access unto him: and co conclude, his lutts and delights whereunto he gave himfelf, were new and strange: his cruelty that he exercised outragious and inhumane. So dread and terrible was he to all, that fome of his Tuxors, either by making themselves away, or by voluntary exile were driven to prevent and a void the danger of cruell torments. Of whom, three only, who alone had more familiar recourse into the Court, to wit, Andronodorus and Zoilin, the ions in law of King Hiero, that hadmarried his daughters, and one Thrafe, had little or no ear given unto them in other marters; but whiles two of them drew toward the Carthaginians, and Thraso to the Roman alliances with their arguing, debating, and dispute, they otherwhile turned the mind of the young King to hearken and give audience to their opinions. Now it hapned that there was a conspiracy intended against the life and person of the Tyrant, and the same detected by one Calo, the companion and playsellow of Hieronymin, and of the same age: one who ever from his childhood had been familiarly acquainted with him, and inward to all his secrets. This revealer of the conspiracy, could appeach and nominate all the conspirators, only Theodorus, by whom himself was made privyto thetreason, and sollicited to be a complice therein. The parry was apprehended incontinently, and delivered unto Andronodorus to be tortured; Who at the first without delay, consessed himself to be guilty, but concealed all the rest that were accessories. At the last, when he had beentorn, mangled, and difmembred, with most dolorous torments, and intolerable for any man to endure: pretending and making femblance that he could abide no longer pains; disclosed not for all this the guilty persons indeed, but accused the innocent, and said faisly, that Thraso was the first deviser of the whole plot: and unless they had born themselves, and relied upon so mighty an head, to fet them on work, they would never have attempted to dangerous an en-terprile. He appeached also some other of the Tyrant his guard and houshold servants and daily waiters: even such as came into his mind during the time of his dolours and paines, and whom amiddthisgroans he imagined to be fuch, as whole lives might be best spared, and deaths least lamented. The naming of Thrase especially made the Tyrant to believe, that the detection sounded to be a very truth indeed: whereupon the man was immediatly led to execution and put to death; and the other innocents, as clear as himfelf, tafted of the fame cup, and fuffered with him for company As for the conspirators themselves, albeit one of their sellows was a long whileput to bitter and extream torture, there was not one of them that either hid his head or made an escape: so assured considence had they in the resolute constancy and faithfull promise of Theodorns and such power and strength had Theodorus himself to keep close the secrets committed unto him. Now when Thrase was once dispatched out of the way, who only was the means to hold them in and to bind them to their alliance and alleageance to the Romans : then forthwith they began openly to encline to rebellion, and fent as Embaffadors for the fame purpole, two noble young Gendemen, Hipportuse and Epicides unto Annibal; From whom also they were sent back again in Embassage. These were both born at Carthage, but descended in bloud from the Syracissans by their grandfather, that was from thence banished; and were themselves by the mothers side meer Carthaginians, By entercourse of these two Embassadours, a League was concluded between Annibal and the Tyrant of Syracuse. And Annibal was content that they should abide still as Leigers in the Tyrants Court,

When Appius Claudius the Prator and Lord Deputy of the Province of Sicily Deard these news, he addressed straight waies Embassadors unto Hieronymus: who saying, that they were come to tenew the alliance which they had with his grandiather, had fcornful andience given them to deliver their message, and were dismissed and sent away by Hieronymus with a frump, demanding of them by way of a scoff," How they had sped at the battel of Canna. For I can hardly beleeve quoth he) that all is true which the Embaffadors report of that field: and I would gladly know the certain truth & thereupon deliberate and take counfel, which fide I were best to take. The Roman Embaffadors faid, they would repair again unto him when he could begin once to give audience with gravity and in good earnest to their embassinge: and to after they had warned & admonished, tather than praised and entreated him, not to change, but to stand to the first covenant and promises, they departed. Then Hieronymus sent his Legates to Carthage, for to confirm the League with the Carthaginians, according to the alliance and amity made with Annibal. In which it was capitulate and covenanted, that when they had expelled the Romans out of Sicily (which would thorrly come to pais, incase they tent thither thips and a power of men) the river Himera, which (as it were) divided the Island in the midth, should confine and limit, both the Syraculian kingdom, and the dominion of the Carthaginians. After this, being puffed up with the fair flattering peeches of such as were about him, with suggested unto him, to remember and call to mind that not only King Hiero was his grandfather, but allo King Pirthu by the mothers fide: he sent Embassadors unto the Carthaginians, to give them from him to understand, That he deemed it right and meer, that all Sicily wholly should lie unto his dominion: and that the EmpireH of Italy only belonged properly to the Carthaginian people to acquire and conquer. This levity and vain glorious humour they neither wondred at as a ftrange thing in a giddy-brained young man; nor yet greatly blamed and found fault with, follong as they might estrange him wholly and alienate him altogether from the friendship of the Romans. But all things in him turned to his overthrow and utter consumon, For whiles Hippocrates and Epicides were lent afore with two thousand souldiers for to sound and sollicit the Cities rebellion, that were held by the garrisons of the Romans: and himself in person entred the country of the Leontins, with all the rest of the forces, which amounted to fifteen thousand foot and horse together: certain conspirators, who chanced all to be his own fouldiers, and bare atms under him, possessed themselves of a rake I house standing over a narrow lane, through which the King was wont to go down into the market place of the City: there, when other flood armed and well appointed, and waiting when the King should pass by, one of the conspirators (whose name was Indigenines) had given himin charge, because he was one of the squires of the Kings body, when the King approached near unto the door of the said house, to find some occasion or others, in that straight passage, to say the troop and train that followed behind. And so he effected indeed, and put in execution, as it was agreed and contrived. For Indigemines, lift up his foot, making as though he would look and flack a ftraight knot of his sho-latchet, which hindring his going, whereby he flaid the company that followed after, to long, that the King passing by alone without his guard of armed men about him, was affunded mean while, and recieved fundry stabs and wounds, before they could K come to rescue and save him. Hereupon arose an outcry and tumult, and divers of the guard let flie at Indigemines, who by this time was ready to oppose himself, and to award all venues: howbeit he was hurt only in two places, and so escaped. The guard seeing the King there lying dead, Aled away as they could. The murtherers, some of them betook themselves into the market-place unto the multitude, that rejoiced for the recovery of their freedom: others repaired to Syracofe, to intercept and prevent the defignments of Andronodorus, and other favourits and followers of the late King.

Whiles things flood in these uncertain and doubtful terms, Appius Claudius foreseeing war like to eniue, and that very fortly, addressed his letters unto the Senat of Rome, certifying them that Sic. In the end of that year, Q. Fabius, by order from the Senate, fortified Fueoli, a town of merchandile, and which in time of wars began to be much reforted unto and frequented, and there he placed a garriion. So the prerogative Century of the younger and puny fort, was called again to a new fcrutiny, and to give their voices again. Whereat when T. Ott acilius began to cry out aloud and fay very floutly, that Fabius his drife was to continue Conful still, and therewith grew to be clamorous and troublesome to the affembly: the Contul commanded the Lictors to go unto him, and to lay hold upon him. And forafmuch as yet he had not entred into the City but came down traightwates into the Mars field prefently from his journey, he put them in mind, that the knitches of the rods together with the axes within them should be born before him. And in the mean time the prerogative Century began afresh to give their voices: and by it were nominated Confuls Q. Fabius Maximus the fourth time, and M. Marcellus the third time: and all the Centuries besides without any jarring and variance elected the very fame. One of the former Prators likewife was chosen again namely ${\cal Q}_*$ Fulvius Flaccus. And other new created, that is to say, T. Ottacilius Crassus the second time. Q. Fabrus the Consul his son, who at that time was Ædile of the chair and P. Cornelius Lentulus. Afterthe Election of the Prators was ended and finished, there passed an Act and decree of the Senate that Q. Fulvius should extraordinarily have the charge of the City, and be Prator there; and that he above all other, when the Confuls were gone forth to the wars should be President and Governour of the City of Rome. There fell great rain and much inow that year, whereby the Tiber overflowed the fields, overthrew many houses, and overwhelmed much cattel and people, so as they utterly perished, Thus in the fifth year of the second Punick war, Q. Fabius Maximus the fourth time, and M. Claudius Marcellus the third time, when they entred their Confulship, set the City on thinking and muling of them more than usually had been known. For in many years there had not been the like couple of Confuls. And old men would talk and fay, that even fo were Max. Rullus and P. Decius declared Confuls against the Gauls war: and after them likewise, Papyrius and Carvin list against the Samnits and Brutii; against the people also of Lucania and Tarentum. Marcellus was created Conful in his absence, whiles he was with the Army abroad and Fabrus being H himself prefent and prefident of the Election, was ordained to continue still in his Consulthip. The occasion of the time, the necessity and occurrence of the wars, and the peril and hazard of the whole flate were such, as no man looked nearly into the example and precedent to find fault withal nor had the Conful in any jealousie of ambition and defire of rule : but rather every man commended his noble and hauty mind, who feeing that the Common-wealth flood in need of anexcellent Captain, and knowing himself without all question to be the man, made less reckoning and account of the envy and ill will of men, that thereby haply might accrue, than of the good and profit of the Common-wealth. The same day that the Consuls began their office, they aficmisled the Senators in the Capitoll: and the first thing they did, was a decree, that the Con-I fuls should either cast lots, or agree together between themselves, whether of them two should assemble the people for the election of Censors, before he set forward to the army. After this all they had their authority prolonged and continued fill, who were employed abroad with the forces; and their commissions were renewed and sealed again, for to abide in the government of their Provinces: to wit, T. Gracchus at Luceria, where he abode with the army of the Voluntaries : C. Terem us Varro in the Picene country: M. Pomponius in the Province of Gaul (on this side the Alpr.) It was enacted also, that of the Prators of the former year, Q. Mutius as Vice-Prator foonld govern Sardinia: that M. Valerius at Brundusium should icoure the river, look to theica-coalis, and have an eye to all the attempts and enterpriles of Philip King of the Ma edopians, P.Corn liss L-ntulus, the new Prator, was appointed to rule the Provin eof Sicily and T. E Off cilius to be admiral of the same Navy, which the year before he had the charge of against the

Many prodigious and strange signs were reported that year and so much the more as they were beleeved to be true of the simple and superstitions fort of people. Namely that within the happel of Sofpit. Ju: o in Lanuvium the Ravens builded their nells. In Apuin a green paim tree was on a light fire. At Manua a pool maintained by the overflowing of the river Mineius, appeared red with bloud. At Cales it rained halk, and at Rome in the beatts market it rained blond, Ina village, called Istricus a spring under the ground, brake our and yielded such abundance of water, that it overtu ned tumbled up and down and carried away (as it had been the ftream of a river) divers veffels as pipes tuns, barrels, and terces that were in the place. The open and publike hall L within the Capirol the Tempie of Valcan in Mars field, a nut-tree in the Sabins country: the high street, the wall, and a gate at Gabii, were a l blasted with lightning and fire from heaven, And by this time. other miraculous and montirous figns, were commonly blown abroad, to wit, that the spear of Mars in Prenefte or its own accord, Hirred and moved forward : that an oxe was heard peak in Secilia: that the Infant within the mothers womb, in the Marrucins country was heard to cry lo Triumpie, at Spole um, a woman turned to be a man, At Hadria there appeared an Altar in the skie, and apparitions or shews of men discovered about the same, arraied in white, At Rome also within the City was seen, now the second time, a swarm of Bees in the very marketplace : a thing wendred at because it was rare and feldom known. Some there were also, thatavouched how they descried armed Legions on the hill Janualumi Whereupon the City roseup M in arms and when they were come into the Janiele, they faid plainly, that there were nonethere appeared but the ordinary inhabitants of the hill. These prodigious fights, by direction from the Atuspices [i.e. the Soothsyers | were expiate, and the gods pacified with greater facrifices : and a tolemn procession and supplication was proclaimed unto all the gods that were shrined at Rome, and had their chappels there.

After all complements performed, that belonged to the pacification of the gods, the Confuk proposed unto the Senat con erning State-matters, and especially about the managing of the wars Namely, what forces should be prepared, what numbers of souldiers levied, and wherether should be bestowed feverally. And agreed it was That there should be eighteen Legions emploid in the wars, Whereo, the Confuls were to take unto them two apiece: the Provinces likewicoln Gaul Sicily and Sardinia, should be guarded each of them with other twain. Q. Fabius the Lord Deputy of Apula, was to have two Legions under his hand to command the Province; and I. Gracehus other two of vo untaries, to keep the country about Luceria: and C. Terentius the Pro-Conful to have the charge of one in the Picene country: and M.V. derius another, for the Navy about Brundusium : and last of all, twain were left behind for the guard and desence of the Cityof Rome, For to make out this tull number of Legions fix of necessity were to be levied new. And the Confuls we e appointed with all convenient speed to enr Il them; and likewise to provide an Armada that year of 150 Gallies, together with those ships which, ride in the river along the coals of Cilabria for the defence of that Country. When the muster was done and the new ships hald and that into fea, Q Fabius affembled the Centuries for the election of Centuries wherein were created M. Attilius Regulas, and P. Furius Philus.

The rimour fill entreated that Stelly was out and up in arms. Whereupon T. Oftacilia was commanded to go this her with his fleet. And because there wanted failers and matiners the Confuls, by versus of a decree of the Senar published an Edic, That as many as in the time of L. St. myllius, and C. Fluminias Centors, either themselves or their tathers were affelfed in the Sahidi book from 50000 Aff, unto 100000 ingoods, or who afterwards grew to that worth should one mariner, and six months pay. Item, That who lover were rated above 100000 unto 30000.

A fhould be charged with three marriners, and one years pay, Item, That who loever were valued in the Cenfors book between 300000 and 1000000 (should allow five marriners. Item, That those above that proportion should set out seven, and every Senat should provide eight mariners, and furnish them with a whole years pay. According to this Edict, the mariners were set out well armed and appointed by their Masters, and having with them aforehand meat dressed and sodden to serve them thirty daies, they were embarked. This is the first time that ever the Roman Navy was furnished with sailers and mariners, at the proper charges of private Citizens.

This extraordinary preparation more than usuall, terrified the Campans most of all other, for g fear left the Romans would begin war that year with laying fiege to Capua. Therefore they difpatched Embassadors unto Annibal, requesting him to come nearer unto Capua with his forces. For why? at Rome there were new armies levied, for to affail that City: and the Romans were not discontented more with the revolt of any than of them. And for almuch as this message was delivered in such haste and fear, Anniba' thinking it good to make speed, lest the Romans prevented him dislodged and removed from Arpi, and encamped upon Tifua over Caputs in the fort, where he kept of old. Then, leaving the Numidians and Spaniards behind him both to guard the Camp, and allo to defend Capua, he went down with the rest of his army to the Lake Avernus pretending in thew there to facrifice, but in very deed to found and folli it Putesti and the garrifon there for to rebell. Maximus was no sooner advertized that Annibal was departed from Arpi, and in his return to Campania; but he journied night and day, and never staid, until he was come again, and repaired to his army. And withail, he gave order and direction unto T. Gracehus, to remove with his power from Luceria, and to draw near to Beneventum: likewife unto Q. Fabius the Prator, (who was the Conful his fon) to supply the room of Gracebus at Luceria. At the same time the two Prators took their journey, and went into Sicily, P. Cornelius to the army there on land, and Offacilius to keep the fea-coast, and to be admiral of the Navy: and the rest spred them every one into their feveral Provinces. They also who had their authority and government continued ruled the same countries that they did before.

Whiles Annibal abode at the Lake Avernus, there came unto him from Twentum, five noble young Gentlemen (Roman affociats) which had been taken pritoners, tome at the pool Threfrme-D'un, others at Canna, whom he had tent home in the same manner of curtese, as he had shewed ever to all the Allies of the Romans. These Gentlemen, in remembrance of his favours and benefits, made report vnto him, "That they had periwaded and induced a great part of the youth of "Tarentum, to entertain rather the amity and alliance of Annibal, than of the people of Rome: "and for this intent they were fent Embassadors from them, to request in their name, that it " might please him to come nearer with his forces to Tarentum. For fay they, if they might but "once fee from out of Tarenum his standard and ensigns, and himself near encamped, the City would without delay be surrendred up into his hands. For the younger people had the com-"mons at their beck and commandment, and the commons ruled the whole state of Tarentum "at their pleasure, Annibal after he had commended and thanked them, and withall loaden them with many fair and great promiles, willed them to return home, to halten and let forward, and effect these intended designments, saying, that he would be there in good and convenient time. With these hopes the Tarentins took their leave, and departed. Annibal himself was wonderfully desirous to be Master of Tarentum. He saw it was a noble City and a wealthy, seated also by the fea-fide, and a very commodious Port, looking and lying toward Macedonia: and well he wist that King Philip (if he should pass over into Italy, seeing the Romans were possessed of Brundustum) would arrive at this haven. When he had performed the Sacrifice for which he thither came, and (whiles he made his abode there) for raged all the Territory of Cumes, even as far as the Cape of the Promontory Misenum: suddenly he turned his army and marched to Puteolis for to surprise and give a camifedo to the fort and garrison there. There were fix thousand of them within the town: and the place not only by naturall lituation frong, but also furely fortified by industry of man. Annibal having staied there three daies, and assaid the fort and the garrison on every side, feeing he could not prevail nor effect any thing, went forward from thence, and proceeded to the wasting of the Territory of Naples, upon anger, rather than any hope of gaining the City. The Commons of Nola, who long time were discontented with the Romans, and at deadly fewd with their own Senators, upon his coming into the territory and confines so near unto them, began to rife in a commotion. Whereupon, there came Embassiadors unto Annibal, requiring him to advance to Nola, upon affured promife, that the town should be delivered into his hands. But Marcellus, who was fent unto by the Nobles prevented this their plot and defignment: and in one day he reached to Sueffula from Cales, notwithstanding he made tome stay to ferry over the river Internus. And to the next night he fent into Nota 6000 footmen, and 300 horse for to aid and defend the Senat. And like as the Contul bestirred himself with all speed and diligence, to make Nola sure to him aforehand, so Annibal contrariwise temporized, being not so ready now to credit the Nolans; as having twice before given the like attempt, and to no purpose in the end, and therefore he trifled out the time, and made imall hafte.

At the fame time also, Q. Fabius the Conful came against Casilinum, which was kept by the garision of the Carthaginians, to see if he could surptife it. And to Benevertum at one time (as if they had been so agreed) came on the one side, Hanno from the Brutii, with a great power of soor and horse; and on another side, Gracehus from Luceria: who entred the town hirt. foon as he heard that Hanno lay encamped within three miles of the City, by the river Calores, H and there walled the Country, he himself issued, and pitched his tents within a mile of the cne. my: where he affembled all his fouldiers together, purposing to make a speech unto them, He had with him the Legions that confifled most of voluntaries, who already two years before, had been more willing to deferve their freedom in filent manner, than to challenge and demand it with 0pen mouth. Howbeit, he perceived when he departed out of the winter harbors, that they begun to murmur and grumble in the army when they marched; and to complain in this wife, What ind we never serve in the quality and condition of freemen? Whereupon he had written unto the Sc. nat, and shewed unto them, not so much what they defired, as what they deserved to have certifying them, that unto that day they had done him good and valiant fervice : and wanted nothing ! fave only their freedom, but they might go for true and lawful fouldiers. Whereupon the Lordsoi the Senat had put it unto his diferetion for to do by them what he thought was expedient for the Common-weal. Thereupon, before that he should join battell with the enemy, he pronounced thele words before them all, and faid: "That now the time was come, of obtaining and acqui-"ring that liberty, which lo long they hoped after. For the next morrow they were to affront "their enemies with banner displaied, and to fight in a plain and open ground, where without " fear of any ambush the triall might be made with meer force and true valour: Whosoever there-"fore can bring me the head of an enemy, him my pleasure & will is, to make free immediativand " who so loseth ground and retreateth, him will I chastise as a bonds ave ought to be punished. "Now every man hath his state and condition lying in his own hands: and of your freedom, K "not only my felf will affore you, but for further warrant, ye have the allowance of M. Marcellan "the Coi, and generally of all the LL, of the Council, whose advice I fought, and who committed "unto my hands the ordering of your liberty. And withall he read the Confuls letters, and thedecree of the Senat in that behalf. Whereat they fet up a mighty cry, in token of their affent and approbation and called for battel and earnefly urged to give the figual out of hand. Then Gra the having pronounced the next day for battel, dismified the affembly. The foul diers were joyousespecially such as were to have their freedom in reward of one daies service, and bestowed the ref of that day in making their armor and weapons ready. The morrow after to foon as the trump to began to found: they were the first of all other that presented themselves before the Generalis pavision, well appointed and ready to fight: and by the fun rifing Gracebus led forth his manimo L the field in order of battel. The enemies for their parts were nothing behind, but for ward to encounter them. They were in number seventeen thousand of footmen most of them Brutii and Lucans : of horiemen, twelve hundred : among whom there were very few. Italians, the reil werein manner all Numidians and Moors. The fight was sharp, and continued long, and for four housin was not feen which fide had the better. No one thing elie troubled the Romans more than their enemies heads, which were the prizes to redeem the fouldiers liberty. For as any had killed their enemies luftily, they were fain fuft, with much ado, to cut off their heads, within the troub clome press and tumult, and so to lose time : and after that by reason that their right hands were emploied and accupied with holding the same heads, it fell out that the best souldiers gave over fighting, and the feeble dastards and earfull cowards only were to maintain the conflict. Which when the M Marshals of the field and Colonels reported unto Gracehus and namely that there was not a fouldier of the enemies standing that was wounded and burt any more: but they that lay along were hacked and hewed as it were by butchers; and that his own fouldiers inflead of fwords, held their enemies heads in their hands: he commanded in all haste, that upon a signal given, they should fling away their heads from them, and charge afresh upon the enemies. For their valous and prowels (faith he) was well enough feen already, and evidently testified, and so long asther were so hardy men, and bare themselves so manfully they should not need to doubt of their liber ty. Then the conflict began to be renewed and withall the horsemen charged the enemies whom the Numidians received with equall valour: infomuch as the fight of the Cavalry was as bravely performed, as the other of the Infantry: whereupon once again the victory feemed doubtilling which part it would encline: whiles in both hofts the Generals reproached and debated theadverse part. Gracehus said that the Brutii and Lucans were so often vanquished and subdued by the Roman ancestors: and Hanno again girded at the Romans, calling them bondslaves, and jouders let loofe out of prison and houses of correction. At the last, Gracebus declared a loud, and land, They were not to hope at all for their liberry, unless that day their enemies were discomited and put to flight. This one word of his at length fet their bloud in such an heat, that they raised a fresh shout & asifthey had been cast again in a new mould, they charged upon the enemies so violent ly that they could no longer be refitted and withstood. First, they that fought in the vangard of the Carchaginians were put out of order; then they about their standards and ensigns; and last of all the wholebattel was driven back and gave ground. Wherupon they fairly turned their backs, and fled so fast one upon another into their Camp, in such fear and fright, that not so much as at the very gates, nor upon the rampier, they flaid once, and turned again to make head : fo as the Ro mans following them hard at the heels into their camp as it were in one train pel-mel made a are skirmish even within the rampier of their enemies. Where the fight was not so cumberione by reason of the freightness of the room wherein they were pent, but the massacre and execution was as cruell and bloudy. The prisoners also that were among the enemies, in this confused con-Bird and mmult joyned themselves and stuck close together; and having caught up some weapons lieled

So of that great army, there were nor all out two thouland (and the most part of them horsemen)that escaped with the Generall himself all the rest were either stain or taken prisoners: and of military entigns were carried away forty fave twain. Of the Victors, there died fast upon two thousand. All the spoil, but only the prisoners, was granted to the fouldiers. The cattell allo was referved, as many as within thirty daies the right owners could justly make claim unto for their own. When they were returned laden with booties and pillage into the Camp there were almost 4000 of the voluntary fouldiers, who had fought but faint, y, and brake not into the Camp with the reft: who for ear of punishment feized Ba little hill not far from the Camp, and kept it for their ho d. But the morrow aircr, being fet from thence by the Colonels, they repaired again to the camp, at wat time as Gracehus had fummoned his fouldiers to an affembly. Where sifter that the Pro-Conful first had rewarded his old fouldiers with military gifts, according to each one his prowels and good ervice in that battell then as concerning the voluntaries, he faid thus much, That he had rather they were all commended by him good and bad, one with another, than that one of them that day thould tafte of any punishment : and therefore he pronounced them all free in the name of God, to the benefit, happinels, andfelicity, both of Common weal, and also of themselves. At which word, they litted up their voices aloud with exceeding cheerfulnels and alacrity: and one while they clipped and embraced one another in their arms, with gratulation and greet joy: another while again, they held their C handstoward heaven, wishing and praying at the gods hands, ali good bletling for the people of Rome and for Gracehus especially. "Then (quoth Gracehus) Betore that I had made you all alike, " and to have equall part in the right and priviledge of freedom, I would not fet upon any of you, "either the mark of a flout and hardy fouldier, or the note of a faint-hearted and beaftly co-6 ward But now that I have discharged my self of the trust committed unto me by the Commonweal to the end, that all difference between provets & cowardife, should not be forgotten aletogether and perish; I will take express order that the names of them, whose conscience accused them of faint fighting, and avoiding the hazard of battell, and therefore crewbile withdrew "themselves apart, be brought unto me. And when they are cited and called forth every one by his "rame, I will compell them to take a corporall oath (quoth he) that unless it he upon fickness, so D "long as they shall continue in souldiery they neithet ear nor drink but standing upon their feet, "And this punifisment (I am fure you will willing y take in good parts when ye that confider bet-"ter of it, and feethat you could not have had an easier note of dilgrace and shame, for your false " hearts and slender service. Then he gave the signall to truss up hag and baggage and sounded the remove, and to dislodged: and thus the souldiers carrying and driving before them their booties, all the way disporting themselves so merily and jocund, recurred to Beneventure, as if they had come from some great dinner, upon a solemn and sestival day, and not from fighting a blondy bartell. All the people of Beneventum came forth ingreat numbers to meet them at the gates, welcomed the fouldiers, bad them joy, embraced them and invited them to their houses, to give them entercainment and lodging. The boords were spread in every mans court-yard, and jurnished E with store of viands: they willed them to come and make merry with them, and requested Gracchus to give his fouldiers leave to feast and make good chear. And Gracebus was content, but uponthis condition, that they should all eartheir meals abroad in the open street. Then all things were brought forth, and let upon the tables at every mans door. The voluntaries took their repast and reflection either with their caps on their heads, or else covered their crown with white wooll, some sitting, some standing : waiting and serving one another at the table, and eat their meat, and fed with them together. This was such a worthy fight and solemnity that Gracehus after he was returned to Rome, caused the representation and retemblance of the celebration of this day, to be drawn and portraied in colours and the picture to remain in the Temple of the goddess Liberty, which his father caused to built in the mount Aventine, of certain fines and forfeits, and afterwards there dedicated it.

Whiles these matters thus passed at Beneventum, Annibal having spoiled and harried the tertitory about Naples, removed toward Nola, and there encamped before the town. Whom when the Conful underflood to be coming, he lent for Pomponius the Pro-Prator, together with that army which lay encamped above above suefuls, and provided to meet with the enemy, minding preently to bid him battell. He tent out Claudius Nero with the strength of his horiemen in the dead time of the night at a back gate, that was farthest from the enemy, giving him in charge to call about closely, and fetch a compass, and fair and fostly to follow the enemy, as he marched: and when he perceived the battell was begun, then to come forward, and fet upon him behind on his back. But whether it were that Nero missed of the way, or having not time enough, could not put this policy in execution, I know nor 'n his abience the armies joyned batte!, wherein no doubt) the Romans had the better hand. Howbeit, for default that the horiemen were not there in ductime the order of the direction failed, and took not effect. And not with standing that the enemies gave ground and retreated, yet Marcellus durit not follow hot upon them, but founded the retreat to his own men, being in a good way of victory. Yet were there by report above aoco of the enemies flain that day, but of Romans under 400. And about the jun fet, Nero who all the day and night paft had tired horie and man, and done no good, and now returned, without o much as a fight of the enemy, was sharply rebuked of the Col. insomuch, that he gave him this check to choakhim, That it was long of him and none elle, that they had not cried quittance H with the enemysfor the overthrow & loss received at Canna, The day following Marcellus came down again into the field, ready to give battel. But Anni al, as one that secretly confessed himself to be overcome, held himselt close within the strength of his Camp. And on the third day, giving over all hope to get Nola, (an enterprise that never sped well) he departed in the still time of the night toward Tarentum, upon a better and more affured hope to gain it by treason.

The civill affairs at Rome were managed with no less courage at home, than the wars in the field abroad. For the Ceniors, who by reason that the City treasure waxed low, were eased of their reare of letting out the publike works of the City by the great; and having nothing elfe to do,emploied themselves in reformation of mensmanners and chaltifung of vices and enormities, which forung upon war : like as mens bodies, which by long and lingring fickness grown weak, everand anon breed new diseases. And first they convented before them those Citizens, who after thebattel at Canna, were (by report) minded and disposed to leave the Common-weal, and to depart out of Italy. The ring leader of them all was L. Cecilius Metellus, who hapned then to be Treafurer of the City. He, with the rest of that crue, who were culpable in the same crime, were commanded to make their aniwer, and plead their caules but when they were not able to clear and quit themfelves, the Cenfors charged them openly, that they had given out certain words, and made speeches against the State, tending to a sociation and conspiracy, forto abandon Italy, Next after them were cited to appear those cunning and crafty companions abovesaid, who with their over-subtill interpretation and confirming of words, would feem to avoid their oath: those captives, I mean, K who being on their way to Rome, came back secretly into the Camp of Annibal, and took themfelves freed and dif harged, because they had sworn to return again. But these and the othersafore rehearted, as many as served upon the City hories, had their hories taken from them, were diplaced out of their Tribe and condemned all to lose their voices, and to serve without Civ pay Neither were the Ceniors carefuli to correct the Senat, and reform the degree of the Knights only, but al o they proceeded to rate out of the publike checkroil of the younger Citizens, the names of all those who for four years space had not served in wars, as many, I say of them, as could not juilly plead and alledge, either ordinary immunity by law, or fickness for their excuse. And of thele were found guilty above 2000: who were awarded to be Ærari, and all of them to be removed out of their tribe. And besides this shamefull disgrace and note of ignominy awardedby the Centors, there passed a heavy decice of the Senat against them, to wit, That all they whom the Cenfors had thus fored and noted, should be bound to serve on foot in the wars, and be confined and fent over into Sicily, to the refidue there of the army that remained at Canna, And no other time of service and warfare was limited unto this fort of the souldiers, but untill theenemy were driven clean out of Italy.

Whiles the Cenfors, as is afortaid, upon occasion that the Cities stock was so decayed, gave over and forbare to bargain for the repairing and maintenance of the Churches and holy Temples, and for the finding and provision of chariot hories for the State and such like; there resorted unto them a great number of thosethat were wont at the spear to take these bargains at their hands by the great, and for a grossium of money: who exhorted the Ceniors to deal in tholematers. fill and to fet, let, and enter into bargain with them, as if the City Chamber wanted no money making this offer that none of them all would demand paiment out of the common Cheft, before the wars were fully ended.

Then repaired unto the Cenfors the Masters of those bondmen whom T. Sempronius had minumited and let free at Beneventum, (aying, that they were fent by the Triumvirs, out of the office of the Bankers, called Menfarii, for to receive again their monies, according as they prized and valued their flaves: howbeit, they would not, before the war was finished. And as the hearts of the Commons were thus favourably affected, to sustain and support the poverty of the treasure house; to the stocks of money also that belonged first to Orphans, and afterwards to widows be gan now to be bestowed in the Chamber of the City: and they that presented and brought in those moneys, beleeved assuredly, that they could not lay them up more sure and safe, than in the publike credit and security of the City. And whatsoever out of these stocks was disbursed and fraied, for to buy and provide any thing for the Orphans or widows aforefaid, the treasurers keep a book thereof, and noted it down in a register. This kindness and benevolence of private performs unto their country, extended it self from the City, even as far as to the Camp: insomuch, that selther horieman nor Centurion would take their wages, but rebuke and rate them that could find their hearts to receive their pay terming them no better than mercenaries and hirelings,

Now Q. Fabius the Conful lay in Camp before Casilinam, which City was kept with a garrilos of two thousand Campans, and seven hundred of Annibathis souldiers, They had for their Cap tain and Commander, one Statius Metius, fent thither by Cn. Magius Attellanus; who for the *The head year was * Mediastricus of Capus. He put the bondslaves and Commons in arms, intermos led one with another, for to enter upon the Camp of the Romans, whiles the Consul was bustoned. affiniting Cassinum. Fabius was nothing ignorant of all these things, and therefore helps unto Nola to his Collegue there, fignifying unto him, that there was need of a second armyo make head against the Campans, whiles the other was employed about the assault of Caster num: and telling him besides, that either he must himself come in person, leaving a mean gair fon behind him at Nola: or else if he might not be spared from thence, for fear of danger tron

A Annibal, he would fend for T. Gracehus the Pro-Conful from Beneventum. Upon this message, Marcellus having left in Nola a guard of two thousand souldiers, with the rest of his forces, prefented himfelf before Cafilinum: upon whole coming, the Campans who were ready to let forward, staid themselves and were quiet. So both Consuls together jointly began to assault Castienum: where the Roman fouldiers that rashly came under the walls received much hurt: and Fahiss feeing little good done, judged it best to surcease and give over the enterprise, being a service of small consequence, and nevertheless very dangerous and to depart from thence, seeing there was business toward of greater importance. But Marcellus contrariwite was of opinion and faid, that as there were many things which great warriors were not to attempt: to it they were once Buken in hand and the adventure given they were not lightly to be given over and laid afide; forafmuch as in it lay matter of great confequence, for fame and reputation, both waies: and fo he prevailed, that the enterprise was not neglected and abandoned. Whereupon there were mantilets, and all other kinds of fabricks and engines of bettery and affault, bene against the City: to as the Campans befought Fabius, that they might depart to Capua in Isleay. And when some few were gone forth, Marcellus posselled himself of that gate who cout they went : & then they sell to kill and flay one with another first about the gate: and after they had inshed once in they put to like execution those also within the City. Fifty there were or the cabout of the Campans that fift got out of the town, and fled for mercy to Fabius: and they by his guard and fale conduct arrived at Capua. But see Casilinum, through the linguing flackness of the Inhabitants that craved C protection, was (by advantage taken of their long parley, and temporizing) won by the enemies. The captives, formany as were either Campans or Annibal his fouldiers, were fent to Rome, and there clapt up fulf in prilons. But the multitude of the townsmen were distributed into fundry Citiesadjoyning and there kept in ward.

At the very fame time that the Confuls after their conquest, retired from Cossimum, Gracehus being in the country of the Lucans, and having gathered and enrolled certain cohorts and companies of fouldiers out of those parts, sent them out a forraging, under the conduct of a Captain of Aliles, into the territories of the enemies. Hanno encountred them as they firagled in feattering wite out of order, and let upon them, and paid his enemies again with the like defeat and loss, or not much lefs than that which he had received at Boscoenium: and in great half withdrew him-

D felf into the country of the Brutis, for fear left Gracobus should overtake him. The Conful Marcellus returned back to Nala, from whence he came, and Falins went forward into Sammium, to poil and waste the country, and to recover by force of arms the Cities which had revolted. The Samuits about Candium, were pittoully and grievoully damnified: their villages in all places fet on fire, their fields laid waste and destroyed, and great booties both of cattel and people driven away, Six towns forced by affault, namely, Computeria, * Telefia, Coffa, Mela, * Thelefia, and Orbitanium. In the Lucans country, the town of * Blanda: and in Apulia, the City * petroda. Anca was assulted. In these towns and Cities, there were taken prisoners and slain 25000 * callipell. of the enemies: of fugitives and runnagate traitors there were recovered 370, whom the Conful sent home again to Rome, and being thither come, they were all beaten and scourged with rods in the Comitium, and then pitched down headlong to the earth, from the rock Tarpeia. These exploits were archieved by Q. Fabius, within the compass of a few daies. But Marcellas by occasion that he lay sick at Nola; was hindred from performing any feats of arms. The Prætor likewife Q. Fabius, who had the charge and juridiction of the province about Luceria, won byforce about the same time the town Accus, and sortified a standing comp planted before Ar-

Whiles the Romans were thus employed about these affairs in divers other places, Annibal was come unto Tarentum, to the exceeding great damage and detriment of all places where he journeyed: but being once arrived in the territory of Tureatum, he began to march and lead his army most peaceably. There he did no harm at all, made no havock nor once went out of the Fhigh way. And it was evidently seen that all this was done not upon any modesty that appeared cither in fooldier or Captain, but only to win unto him the hearts of the Tarentins. But when heapproached the walls of the City, and iaw no commotion, nor infurrection from thence upon the discovery of his Vanguard, as he thought he should, he pitched his Camp almost a mile from the town. Now had M. Valerius the Vice-Prator, who was Admirall of the Pleet at Brundufium, fent T. Vederius his Lieutenant unto Tarentum, threedaies before that Annibal shewed himself before the wals. He had must red and enrolled the slower of the Nobility, and so beflowed at every gate, and about the walls where need required, good guards for defence: with fish vigilant diligence both day and night, thathe gave no opportunity and advantage either to the enemies to adventure any affault, or to the doubtfull and untrulty friends to practice any treaion, So Annibal, having spent there certain daies in vain, and seeing none of them who repaired anto him at the Lake * Avernus either to come themselves, or to send messeger or letters: and * Lago di 274. perceiving now that he had rashly and foolishly followed vain promises, and so was deluded; dislodged and removed from thence. And even then also he spared the territory of Tarentum, and did no hurr at all: and albeit his fained and counterfeit lenity and mildness hitherto took no effect: yet he hoped ftill thereby to corrupt their faithfull alleageance to the Romans: and so he went to Salapia. And (by reason that midiummer was past, and he liked well of that place for awinter harbour) he conveyed thither all the cornfrom out of the Territory of Metapontum and Heraclea. Then he fent out the Numidians and Moors, to fetch booties and prizes from out H of the Salencine country, and all the woods and chases next unto Apulia, from whence they drave of other cattell small store: but of hories e pecially they brought away great numbers, of which there were four thousand divided amongst the horsemen to be handled, broken, and made

The Romans seeing there was like to be war in Sicily, & the same not lightly to be regarded :& that the death of the Tyrant there, rather gave the Syracufians good Captains, than wrought any change in their minds, or alteration in the cause: affigned unto M. Marcellus, one of the Consuls. that I'rovince to govern. Presently upon the murder of Hieronymus, first the souldiers in the Leontin country, began to mutine and make an uprore, and boldly spake and faid, That the Kings, death should be expiate, and his obsequies solemnized with facrificing the bloud of conspirators But afterwards, when they heard often iterated the sweet name of liberty and freedom reflored unto them : and that there was good hope that the fouldiers should have a largess dealt amongst them out of the Kings Treasure, and be under the command of Captains of better quality, and ha ving befides all this, a bedroil rehearfed unto them of the Tyrant his cruelty and foul facts, and of more filthy and loathfome lufts: their affections were to altered that they suffered the body of their King to lie above ground unburied, whom a little before, they so greatly defired and wished for Now as concerning the compirators, whiles the reft of them remained behind to affure and pofteffe themselves of the army. Theodorus and Sofis took the Kings horses and rode post, as hard as ever they could to Syracufa, for to surprize upon a sudden all his followers and favourites (who knew nothing of that which was done) and fall upon them at unawares: but they were prevented not only by the fame (which above all other things in such cases is most swift) but also by courrier one of the Kings fervants. Whereupon Andrenodorus had feized beforehand of that part of the City which is called the Island, together with the Castle, and all other places that he could come at which were thought of any good importance; and them he fortified with good guards. * The City of Theodorns and Sofis being entred within the City at * Hexapylos after fun-fetting, in the twy-light and throtting in of the evening and thewing the Kings royall robes all embrued with bloud, and the ornament and attire likewise of his head, he passed through * Thica, and called aloud unto the people to light and at once for their liberty, and to arm themselves, and willed them to repair into Acr. die. The people some of them ran out into the streets, others stood in their entries and, por hes, divers looked out at the windows from within their houses, and asked what the matter might be? Every place mone with torch and creffet-light, and was filled with fundry garboils and hurly burlies. As many as were in arms gathered together in the open places of the City those that were marmed, took down off the Temple of Jup. Olympius the spoils of the Gauls & the Illyrians, which the people of Rome had given as a present to K. Hiero, and which he set aloft for a memoriall: praying unto fupiter that he would vouchiafe them this gracious favour, as to bestow those facted weapons & harness upon them that meant to arm themselves therewith, for the desence of their country, for the maintenance of the Churches and shrines of the gods, & for the recovery of their liberty. This multitude also joyned with the corps de quards, that in the principal quanters of the City, were believed in places convenient. But Andronodorus amongst other places that befortified made fore also with frong guards of armed men the publike garners of the City within the Island. There was a place enclosed round about with four-square stone, and built strongly likes forces; this was possessed by the youth that had been appointed for to guard and defend that quarter : and they fere messengers into Acrasina, to signific that the garners and the corn were kept by them to the behoof of the Senat, And on the morrow at the break of day, the wholepeople as well armed as unarmed affembled together in Acradina, within the Palace, And there before the altar of Concordia which in that place flood erected, one of the principal and chief Citizens, named Polyneus, made an Oration unto them all, with frankness of speech enough, tending unto liberty and yet featoned with modelty & moderation in this wife: 6 Men (quoth he) that have erperion e of servitude and other indignities, fall to abhor the same, and their stomacks rises. "gainst them as known evils. But as for civil discord, what calamities & miseries it bringeth with" "it the Citizens of Syracufe have heard their fathers tell and not feen and tafted themselves. That "ye have been to ready to take up arms and weapons in hand, I commend you for it: but I would "con you more thank, if ye used them not, unless ye be driven thereto by extream necessity. "For the present, I hold it good, and my counsel is, that Embassadors be sent unto Andronodors, "to intimate unto him, yea, and to require and charge him, to submit himself unto the Senat and "people and by them to be ordered : to fet open the gates of the Island, to put away from about "him his guard, and deliver up the castle and garrison. But in case he intend under the pretence " of being guardian or protector to the kingdom of another, thereby to usurp it to his own us; "hemust be given to understand, by mine advice that we wil seek to recover our liberty out of the "hands of Andronodorus, more fiercely and forcibly than from Hieronymus, And so presently upon this affembly embaffadors were fent. Then the Senat went together and fat in Council: for, as during the raign of Hiero, there was fet an ordinary publike Councill of State: fo after his death unto that day, the Senators were neither called together, nor their advice taken or fought in any matter. When the Embeffidors were come unto Andronodorus, and had delivered their melfage, he was him felt (verily) for his own part moved with the generall confent of the Citizens; but especially when he considered, that among other quarters of the City possessed by the ad-

A verte fide, that one part also of the Island, which was the strongest, was betraied (as it were) and held out against him. But when the Embassadors called fill upon him to come forth, his wife Demarata, daughter of King Hiero, puffed up ftill with the proud mind and haughty ftomack of a Prince, and full of the vain humour and spirit of a woman, put him oftentimes in mind of a saying, that Denis the Tyrine had evermore in his mouth, namely, "That a man should not ride on horie-"back to be depoted from his royall dignity and effate of tyranny, but be led fair and foftly a footpace, and go to that, as a bear to the flake. An easie matter (quoth she) it is for one to yield and forgo the possession of high place and honour, and a thing that may be done in the turning of an whand, when foever one will but to compais and attain thereto is a right hard matter, and of all B" other most dissiduit, You were best therfore to borrow some respit of time of the Embassadors, of forto take farther deliberation of this main point, and in the mean while, to use the advantage thereof, to fend for the Souldiers out of the Leontin country : unto whom, no doubt, if you e would promife a reward out of the Princes treasure, you shall be Lord of ail. This perillous unhappy counsel of a woman Andronodorus neither despised and rejected - leogether, nor yet presently accepted and embraced: supposing it a better and safer course, if he meant to aspire unto high dignity and great puissance, for the present to temporize and give place unto the necessity of the time. And therefore he willed them to carry back unto the Senat this answer from him, That he fubmitted himself, and would be ordered & set down by the Senat and the people. The morrow after, lo foon as it was day-light, he caused the gates of the Island to be set open, & shewed himself C in the market-place of Aeradina: where he assended up unro the alrar of Concord from which the day before, Polyneus had made a speech unto the people. He began his Oration with an excule of day bearing and long flay behind, and craved pardon therefore: alledging, "That he had kept The Oration "thegates shur, not because he meant to separate his own affairs from the State, and not to take of Andoundefirst part as the City took but when swords were once drawn he feared what would be the end 1866. and iffue of murders and maffacres, and whether men would fray their hands, when there was "affirance of liberty effected, (as being contented with the death only of the Tyrant)or whether, assumption and and sindred or in affinity and alliance, or in other offices or service, "were toward the K, and his Court, should be counted culpable in the fault of another. & so like-"wife have their throats cut. For after that (quoth he) I underflood once, that they who had de-D" livered and let freetheir country, were minded and willing to fave & preferve it, thus enfranchi-"fed : and that there was consolving on all hands indifferently, for the good of the state, I made no "longer doubt of the matter, but to yield both mine own person, and also all that ever was under "my hand(as committed unto me upon trust and fidelity)untomy native country: now that he, "who put all into my hand, is through his own folly & outrage overthrown and brought to con-"fasion, Then turning to the murderers of the tyrant, and by name calling unto Theodorus and So-" fr. A noble and memorable piece of fervice ye have already done, (quoth he) but trust me truly, your glory in this behalf is begun only, and not throughly finished and performed inay, a great danger is yet behind, unless ye see to the generall concord and unity of all parts, that the com-

"monliberty of the City, turn not into pride and infolency beyond all measure.

E After this speech ended, he laid down the keys of the gates, and of the Kings treasure, at their feet, And fo for that day, when the people were dilmiffed from the affembly, with joy and mirth they went in proceeding and supplication with their wives and children, round about all the Churches & Chappels of their gods, The day following, the folemn election was held for the creation of Przetors. And first, before all others, Androndorus was chosen, and the rest for the most part, the very murderers of the Tyrant, They elected also two that were absent, to wit, Sopater and Deaments. Who being advertized of all matters that patied at Syracuse, delivered up the Kings treasure which lay in the Leontins country, and was now brought unto Syracuse, into the hands of the Treasurers; who for the same purpose were created Likewise that which was in the Island, and in Acradina, was committed over unto their custody. That part also of the wall, which divif ded the Mand from the rest of the City, and was supposed too strong a bar between, was by commonconfent cast down and rased. And as their minds were thus affected and enclined to procure and maintain liberty, so all other matters forted surable, and followed after accordingly.

Hippocrates and Epicides, when tidings came of the Tyrants death (which Hippocrates would fainhave had concealed and therefore flew the messenger that brought news thereof) being forfaken of the fouldiers, returned to Syracufa; supposing for the present, that to be the safest course they could take. Where, because they would grow into no suspition, nor to be noted to seek for some opportunity and occasion of change and alteration in the State, first they presented themselves before the Prætors and Governors of the City, and so by their mediation, they had accels to the Senat, They gave out, "That they had been fent from Annibal unto Hieronymus a sunto a friend and confederate, and had yielded obedience unto him, as they were willed by "their own Generall and Commander. Now their defire was, to return again unto Annibal, But "foralmuch as they might not travell in lafety, for the Roman forces, that ranged all over "Sicily, they craved a convoy and sufficient guard to conduct them, as far as to Locri in Sicily: "affuring them, that by this small curtesseand desert of theirs, they should reap great thanks of "Annibal, and come into high favour with him. The fuit was foon obtained. For defirous they "were, that those Cavalies that used to lead the King, and were expert and skilfull besides in war, "and therewith needy and audacious, should be sent away : but they made not so good speed to put this their delire in execution as they should have done. For in the mean featon, these young H and lufty matiall men, and fuch as ever had converfed with the fouldiers, went up and down one whileto them, another whiles to the fugitive strangers that were revolted, (who for the most part wete failers and sea men that came from the Romans) yea, and sorted themselves with the baiest and most abject persons of the Commoners, spreading tales, and whispering into their ears fundry suspitious matters of crime against the Senators and great men of the Nobility, laying that they plotted and practifed closely under hand nothing elfe, but that Syracufa, under a colour of reconciliation and accord should be reduced to the obedience of the Romans: and then, the fide and faction and some sew with them that are of councell to renew the affociation, might be Lords, and tyrannize over the rest. By this means there slocked multitudes, every day more than other to Syracufa: whole ears were tickled, and itched fill to hear fuch furmiles, and were aprenough to give credit thereto. And they gave not only Hippoerates and Epicides, but Andronodorus also good hope of an alteration, and a new world. For he being at length overcome with the importunate suggestions of his wife, who ever put into his head, That now was the only time to njurp and take upon him the rule of the State, whiles all things were troubled, and in a confusion, upon their new and unknown liberty; whiles the fouldiers were presented in their way, to be dealt with all, and daily maintained and fed out of the Kings Exchequer; and whiles those captains fent from Annibal, by reason of their acquaintance with the souldiers, were present to setsorword, and further his defignments) first therefore acquainted Themistius, who had married Gelo his daughter, with his complot: and after a few daies (full unadvifedly) imparted his mind allo, K unto one Arifo, an Actor of Tragedies, whom he used aforetime to make privy unto his other fecrets. This Arifto was well born, and descended of a worshipful house, a man in good place and of honest reputation: and his profession (for among the Greeks it is reputed no matter of shame to play either in Tragedies or Comedies Jwas no blot either to his birth, or difgrace to his calling: and therefore as one who made more reckoning of his duty to his country, than of private friend-Thip, bewrayed & disclosed all the treason unto the Prætors. Who finding by good proofs and certain evidences that this was no forged and counterfeit information, after confultation had with the Ancients of the Council, by their warrant and direction, fee a guard of armed men about the door of the Senat House, and so soon as Themistius and Andronodorus were entred in place, slew them outright. And when there began some uprore upon this fact, which in shew seemed very horrible and hainous (especially to all the relt that knew not the cause:) at length they appealed the tumult and caused silence, and brought the informer into the Council House, that had deteded the intended treaton: who declared all things orderly in particular: namely, that this confpiracy was devised and ipring first from the marriage of Harmonia the daughter of Gelo, who was wedded unto Themistius: that divers auxiliary fouldiers of Affricans and Spaniards were appointed and provided to massacre the Prators, and other principal Citizens: that their goods were promifed unto the murderers to be ranfacked and ritled : that befides, there was a band of mercenary fouldiers (inch as were wont to be at a beck, and ready to execute the commandment of Andro nodorus) fet in a readine's to seize the Island again, and keep it to his use. And when he had laid every thing abroad in order, with all circumstances, what the practices were and by whom they were to be performed and executed, and shewed before their eyes most plainly, the whole confirm racy : & namely, what persons and what forces should have been employed. Then the whole body of the Senat were likewise verily perswaded that they had deserved such an end, and wereas justly murdered as Hieronymus, But without the Councel-House door, the consused multitude, compofed of all forts of people who were doubtfull of the matter, and knew not what to make thereof, cried out. And albeit they menaced and threatned before the entry and porch of the Senat, yet at the fight of the dead bodies of the Conspirators, lying before their face, they were affrighted and foon husht lo as with great silence they followed the whole body of the Commonstothe publike place of affembly, Unto whom, Sopater, by order from the Senat, and his fellow Prators, was commanded to make an Oration. He began formally to inveigh against Andronodorus and Themistius, (as they that accusemen N at the bar) and ripped up their former life past, charging them with all the wicked deeds and impious facts, committed fine the death of Hiero: "For what (quoth he) did Hieronymas, may, what could he do of himlelf, so long as he was but a child and stripling, and scarcely come all the while he lived to have any hair on his face? His officers and guardians, were they that toled all and managed the kingdom at their pleasures, but so, as the blame and heavy load lay upon "him, Who if they had perished either before Hieronymus, or at least wife together with him, they had been but well enough ferved. But they, who long ago had deferved to die, and for whom the " gallows had already groned, ceased not flill, after the death of the tyrant, to devile and plot new "michiefs, one in the neck of another. At the first openly in the fight of the world, Androndor, and way of inheritance upon the kingdor, and "lought to seize in his own right, and immediat heir apparant, upon those things that he held "under the Prince, only during his nonage. Afterwards, being betrayed by them that were in the "Illand, & befieged round about by the whole City(which was possessed fully of the Acradina) "(seeing that in vain he had attempted to be King by apert and open force; he sought means now "to aspire theretosccretly, and by cunning sleights. Neither could he be so much as reclaimed "and won by any favours and honours done unto him: who being himself a traitor to the free

A "dom of the state, was notwithstanding advanced to be Prator, among other redemens of the li-"berry of their country. But no marvelit was (quoth he) that thele men were of this haughty "fpirit, and longed to be Kings : for they had to their wives two princely dames, the daughters, "one of King Hiere, and the other of his (on Gelo.

Arthese words, the people from all parts of the assembly began to cry out with one voice; that neither of them both were worthy to live, nor any one befides of the Kings flock and linage ought to remain upon the face of the earth. See the nature and disposition of the multitude; Either they serve basely, or rule proudly. Liberty that is the mean between, they have neither the B skill to despise with reason, or the grace to entertain in measure. Now, there wanted not ve may before, as at all times else ready instruments and firebrands, to help forward, and kindle more anger fuch, as feeing the Commoners differipered already, and bloudily minded of themselves, put them forward to murder and maffacre. As it appeared then; For immediatly, as the Prattors put up a bill, that all the Kings flock should be rooted out, and the whole line utterly extinguished: before in manner that it was all read out and published, it passed clear, and was granted. And prefently there were fent out certain persons from the Protors, that murdered Demaraca and Harmonia the daughters of King Hiero and Gelo, the two wives of Andronodorus and Themistius, Now there was another daughter of Hitro, named Heracles, wife to Sofippus, who having been fent as Embassador from Hieronymus, to King Prolomeus, chose a life in voluntary exile, and lived not with chis wife. She having an inkling given her aforehand, and knowing that the murderers were coming allo toward her, took her two daughters, virgins: and together, with their hair loofe hang-ing down their shoulders, and in other most poor array and rusull habit, able to have moved pity and compassion, they were fled into a privat Oratory or Chappell unto their house-gods, to save themselves. The mother feeing the murtherers fell to entreating them most pitiously, and recom- The pitifull mended unto them the late remembrance of her father. Hiero, and her brother Gelo: "Befeech- words of dame " ing them not to suffer her (an innocent and guiltless person) to fare the worle, and be punished Hiratles. " upon hatred that was born unto her nephew Hieronymus. As for me (quoth she) I reaped no "good by his Reign and Kingdom, unless it were the banishment and absence of my husband: "and as by the life of Hieronymus my fortune was not fo good as my fifters; to after he was mur-"dred and dead, may cause is not so bad, nor like unto hers, Moreover, and besides, in case Andro-De nodorus had effected his designments, my sister should have been a Queen, and reigned together "with her husband sbut as for me, I must have been a subject and servant with the rest. Again, "if there were any messengers sent unto Sosippus, to report the death of Hieronymus, and the re-"Aitution of Stracufe to liberty: who can make doubt, but that forthwith he would be embar-"ked and take the seas, and return again into his country? But how much are men put besides "their hope, and deceived of their expectation? And who would ever have thought to have feen " in a freed flate his wife and children indanger to lose their lives? For wherein do we hinder the "common liberty, or the course of laws? What danger can come to any person from us, one de-"folate lone woman, and in manner a widdow, and two young maidens livings as Orphans fa-"therles? And if it be faid again that there was indeed no fear of hurt to be imagined from us; E_{κ} but only the Kings bloud and kindred was odious in the eyes of the people : Then, quoth the, "let us be fent away far from Syracufe and Sicily, and confined over to Alexandria, the wife to "her husband, the daughters to their own father. But when they would neither give ear to her words, nor encline their hearts to pity and compassion: then because she would not spend longer time in vain (for now she saw some of them drawing their swords sorth) she gave over all entreating for her felf, "and befought them instantly to be good yet, to the young filly girles, and " spare their lives, unto whom being of that age, even the very enemies in their heat of anger for-"bareto offer violence: and that feeing they were to be revenged of tyrants, they would not play "the tyrants themselves, and commit that wickedness, which they seemed to hate in others. A- The tragical midst these words the murderers (lent from the Prators) pulled her forth of the inward and most murder of Lafecret place of the chappell, and cut her throat: and when they had so done, they assailed and sell dy Heraclea upon the the maidens, besprent with the bloud of their mother: who for sorrow of heart and sear and her two algorithm to the maintens, perspective with the choose of their wits, and as it were in a furious fit of frenzy, tan daughters, together, being paft themselves and out of their wits, and as it were in a furious fit of frenzy, young virging young virging. against them, and got out of the Chappell: minding, if they could have escaped forth, and recoveredthe street, to set the whole City on an uprore, And so shifted for themselves, poor wenches, by running to and fro within the house, (which was not large and spacious) that for a good while they elcaped amongst the thickest of so many armed men, and oftentimes avoided their reaches, and caught no hurt : yea; and when they had caught hold of them mot with standing they were to fringele with for many hands, and those so strong, yet they wound away from them all: untill at length after they had received many a wound, and filled every place with bloud, they fainted and funk down, and yielded up their innocent spiries. This murder, no dout, was of it self pitious; but much more lamentable, by occasion of a present accident. For straight after came a messenger with express commandment, to spare the women, and not to kill them: for that upon a sudden the hearts of the people relented, and enclined to mercy. But when they heard there was so quick dipatch made of execution, that neither they had time to bethink themselves and repent, nor space to cool upon their heat, they sell pity and compassion into an extream sit of anger and choler. The multitude thereupon began to mutter and murmur, and called to have an election of Prætors in the room of Andronodorus and Themistius (for they were both of them Pracors) which new election was not like to fall out in the end to the good liking and contentment of the other Prators in place, So a day was fet down, and proclaimed for this election. At which time, it hapned that beyond all mens expectation, one from the farthest part of the affembly nominated E_{Bi} cides and then another from thence named Hippocrates, After which, the same voices came thick and threefold ftill fo as it feemed the multitude would wholly go that way. The people there affembled, were a confused fort intermingled, as well with a number of fouldiers, as of a company of Citizens and Commoners; yea, and many of them were strangers sugitive, shuffled among, fuch as rather than their life defired a generall change and alteration. The Prætors at first diffembled all, and would feem to take no knowledge thereof : but thought in best to put off the matter to a farther day : yet overcome at iast with the common accord and consent of the people: and I fearing withall a mutiny and fedition pronounced and declared the men aforenamed for Prators. Neither would they, at first hand so soon as they were created, set that abroach which was in their mind and defire to effect: notwithstanding they were displeased and discontented much both for that there had been Embassadors dispatched unto Appen Clauden, about a truce for ten daies; and also when it was obtained, that there were others addressed to treat for the renewing of the arcient league with the Romans. At the same time (Ap. Claudius) the Roman General lay at Murgantia with an Armada of 100

gallies, waiting there to hear what was the event of the troubles which arose upon the muder of the tyrants: and how far forth men would proceed upon this their new and unwonted liberty, And much about those daies, when as the Syracusan Embassadors were sent from Appin unto K

Marcellus now coming into Sicilia, Marcellus himself after he heard the conditions of peace, thought they would grow to some good agreement and conclusion in the end : and therefore sent other Embassadors to Syracuse, perionally to debate and confer in the presence of the Prators, concerning the renewing of the League aforefaid. But by that time, they found not the City in the same quiet tune and peaceable state. For Hippocrates and Epicides, after news came that the Carthaginian Navy was arrived and rid at anchor under the bay of * Pachinus, confidently, and without all fear buzzed in the ears one while of the mercenary fouldiers, another while of the fubardo,or Cabo gitive traitors, many take formiles against their brethren in Office, and namely, that they went about to bettay Syracuse to the Romans, But Appins began to keep his Armada at anchor in the very mouth of the river, listning to know what heart and hope they of the contrary saction had, L to effect that which they intended. Much credit was given (as it should seem) unto those slanders and lewd fuggettions: infomuch as at the first, the multirude ran to the waters side in a great hurry and tumu tuous manner to hinder their landing, if haply they attempted it. In this troubleiome confusion of all things, it was thought good, that the people should meet together to deliberate what was both to be done. In which affembly, whiles fome drew one way, others haled and pulled another way, and were at the point to mutine and grow to a fedition, Apollonides, one of the principall and thief Citizens, made a speech to very good purpose for preservation of the publike peace, and thus he said: " Never was there any City nearer, either to hope of assured safety, or to " fear of utter destruction than this of ours at this present. For if all would go one way together, "and with one accord either encline to the Romans, or bend to the Carthaginians, there were M

"not a City under the cope of heaven, whose state were more happy and fortunate than ours. " But in case we de distracted, and the Common-weal go divers waies, there would not be more 66 bitter and crueil war between the Syracufians and the Romans, than among the Syracufians "themselves: when within one and the same walls, there should be banding one against another, " and each fide have their forces, their armor, and their Cr Captains of their own, And therefore "we ought of all hands to endeavour what we can that all may be of one mind and draw in the " same line. As for the main point now inquestion, Whether society and alliance be the better "and more commodious, the Romans or the Carthaginians, is a matter of far less moment and "importance than to be consulted and studied long upon. Howbeit, in choosing our friends and " allies, we are to be directed by the authority and act of Hiero, rather than of Hieronymus; and N

" to prefer that amity which we have tried for fifty years in much felicity, above a friendshipfor "the present unknown, and sometime heretofore found unfaithfull. It maketh somewhat also, to "retolve upon this course, that in case we should deny peace and alliance to the Carthaginians, "we need not presently go to war with them . but with the Romans we must out of hand make account either of peace orelie of hot wars. This speech of his the less that it savoured of lactionspartiality and effection, the more authority and tway it carried with it. And besides thedeliberation of the Prators and choice Senators, the advice also of the martiall men were taken, And therefore the Captains of all their own enfigns and companies, yea, and the great Commanders of the auxiliary forces of their allies were willing to fit in Council together with them. Whenthe matter had been often debated, and much contention and hot words passed between, at the 124,0 because there appeared no colourable reason or cause to make war with the Romans, they agreed that a peace should be concluded, and that together with their Embassadors, there should be o thers also from them to ratifie and confirm the thing.

There passed not many daies between, when out of the Leontins country there arrived cetain Orators, to crave help and fuccour for the guard and defence of their marches. This Emballige seemed to come very fitly and in good time, for to exonerate and rid the City of theus ruly and disordered multicude, & likewise to send out of the way their Captains and ringleadets,

A So Hippocrates the Prator was commanded to lead thither the fugitive strangers. Many also of the mercenary souldiers, that were waged to help them in their wars, accompanied them: so as in all, the number amounted to four thousand. This expedition and journey contented greatly as well the fenders and fetters of it out, as also the parties themselves that were sent forth, For these of the one fidehad a good occasion and opportunity now offered them, to contrive a change in State(the only thing that folong they had defired) and those of the other, were right glad, that the fink (as it were) of the City was now well foured and voided away. But this was like the pallistive cure of a fore, and a lightning for the present of a fick body: whereby it might soon after by o relapse fall back, as it were, into a recidive, and a worse dilease and more dangerous than the other, For Hippocrates began at first to make rodes by stealth into the confines bordering upon the Roman Province, and there to waste & spoil: afterwards when Appins had sent a power of men to defend the frontiers of his confederats, he charged with his whole power upon that guard that was opposed against him, and slew many of them. Whereof, when Marcellus was advertized, he dispatched Embassadors incontinently to Syracuse to charge them with the breach of peace and to give them to understand, that there would never be wanting some occasion or other of quarrell and war, unless Hippocrates and Epicides were removed, and sent far enough out of the way, notonly from Syracufe, but also quite out of Sicily. Epicides for fear left if he remained present in the City he might be charged and brought in question, for the fault and trespals of his brother absent, or he wanting for his part, in the raising of new war; went himself also in person into the Leontins country : and feeing them there forward enough of themselves, and provoked already against the Romans, began also to alienate and turn their hearts from Syracuse. For in these terms he suggested and informed against the Syracusians: namely, "how they had capitulated with the "Romms, that all the Cities and Nations which were under the Kings, should be subject unto "them and within their jurisdiction: so as now they cannot be content (quoth he with their li-"berty, unless they rule also like Lords and Kings. I would avise and counsell you therefore, to "lend word unto them and give them to understand, that the Leonins likewise deem it good " reason, that they should themselves be free: in regard e ther that the tyrant was killed within the ground of their City, or because the first alarm for liberty began there. For they leaving and abandoning the Captains there that followed the King ran at once from thence to Syracufe. And therefore they are (faith he) to rafe that aforefaid article out of the infirmment of the covenants, "or not to accept at all of peace with that condition, Soon were the multitude perswaded hereunto, And therefore when the Embassadors of the Syraculians came to the Leontins, both to make complaint for killing of the Roman Corps de guard, and a fo to command peremptorily, that Hippocrates and Epicides should depart either to Locri, or to what other place they would rather chuse, so they went their waies and voided clean out of Sicily: they returned unto them this fout answer again: that neither the Syracusians had any commission and warrant from them, to make peace with the Romans in their name, neither would they be tied and obliged to any confederacy made by others than their own felves. This answer the Syracusians made report of to the Romans, and faid plainly, "That the Leontins were not under their jurisdiction, to be ordered and censured by them: and therefore, any thing comprised in the league with them notwithstanding the Romans might war against them without breach of any covenant : and in that war they "would not for their parts fail them, but do their best: upon condition, that when they were once "fubdued, they might be reduced again under their obedience, according to the covenant comprehended in the League. Whereupon Marcellus with his whole power went forth against the Leontins, and sent for App us also, to assail them on the other side: and so hot were his souldiers in this service, and bare themselves so resolute, for anger that the guard was slain, during the time that there was treaty of peace between that at the very first affault they won the City. Hipprerates and Epicides, after they faw the wals scaled, and the gates of the City broken open, betook themselves for their safety, with some sew into the Castle, from whence by night they made a secret escape, and fled to Herbesus.

The four and twentieth Book of T.Livius.

As the Syracusians marched from home with a power of eight thousand armed men, and were come forward, as far as to the river Myla, they met with a meffenger, who told them that the City Leonium was forced. They reported other news besides, as well lies as truths, one with another, namely, that townsmen and souldiers indifferently without respect were put to the sword; that he thought verily, there was not left one alive of fourteen years of age and upward; that the City was put to the fack, and all the rich mens goods were given away. At this to fearful and horrible news, the army staid and went not forward. And when they all were greatly troubled, their Leaders Softs and Diomenes, consulted what to do. This loud lie arose not upon nothing, but was occasioned by mistaking of a matter. For there were scourged and beheaded of sugitive traitors, to the number of two thousand. But of Leontins and other souldiers, there was not one hurt after the City was loft. And every man had all his own goods restored unto him again: saving that ony which in the first hurlyburly of a City newly won hapned to milearry and perish. Howbeit upon this bare report, they neither could be induced to go forward to the Leontins, complaining and grieving that their fellow fouldiers were to betrayed and murdered nor yet to abide there still for to expect and hearmore certain tidings. The Prators perceiving their minds disposed to revolt, and yet hoping that this mutinous fit of theirs would not continue long, in case the Captains and heads of their fury and folly were once rid out of the way led the army to Megara: and went themselves in person with a few horiemen toward Herbesus, hoping to gain the City by treaton, H whiles they all there were affrighted. But feeing that enterprife would not prevail, they minded to ule forcible means. The morrow after they dislodged and raised their Camp from Megara, purpofing with all their forces to asiail Herbefus, Hippocrates and Epicides supposing this to be the only way for them, although at the first ight not the faiest. (considering all hopes besides were cut off) namely, to put themselves into the hands of the souldiers, who were for the most partacquainted with them, and belides, upon the bruit of the execution and maffacre of their fellow fouldiers, throughly chafed, went out to meet the army. The formost ensigns in the forefront, happed to confit of those fix hundred Cretentians, who in the wars of Hieronymus had terved under them. and received a favour and benefit at Annil al his hands. For being taken prisoners at Thrasymens, I among other auxiliaries that came to aid the Romans, they were fet at large and fent away withour raniom. Whom when Hippocrates and Epicides knew by their colours, habit, and fashion of their armour, they held out branches of olives and other vails and tokens of suppliants, beleeching them humbly to receive them, and being once received, to vouchfafe to protect them, and not to deliver them into the hands of the Syracufians: by whom they should foon be yielded unto the people of Rome, for to be murdred and cur in peeces. At this they all cryed aloud with one voice, and willed them to be of good chear, for they should fare no worse than their own selves, Upon this communication the entigns staid, and the army stood still and marched not forward: but the generall Captains wift not as yet what the cause might be of this stay. After the rumour was spread that Hippacrates and Epicides were come, and that all the host throughout by a generall applause K feemed to like well of their coming: the Prators in ontinently let ipurs to horle, and rode forward apace to the fore ront of the vanguard demanding of the Cretenhans, what manner and fashion this was of theirs? and how they durst be so boid, as to parl and talk with enemies? and without license of their Prætors to entertain them within their companies? And herewith they gavecommandment, that Hippocrates should be apprehended and bound sure with chains. At which word the Cretentians fet up such a cry, and the rest so answered it again with the like, that it was well icen, in case they had proceeded forward as they began, they should have in used themselves no small danger. And thus in great perplexity, and sear of their own lives, they commanded to turn emigns, and retire unto Megara, from whence they came; and dispatched messengers presently to Syracufe, to fignific in what terms they stood. Hippocrates seeing the souldiers gi- L ven to be suipitious and ready to believe every thing, devised a cunning shirt besides in this manner. After he had fent out certain of the Cretenians to befet the waies between them and Syscufe. he pretended that they had intercepted tomeletters from thence, which he read unto the fouldiers, and were indeed framed and indited by himfelf. The tenor of the letters ran in this form: "The Prators of Syrecufe to M. Marcellus their friend greeting. After their falutations ard com-"mendations premifed, as the manner is it followed written thus: you have done we'll and or-"derly in sparing none at all of the Leontins But all other mercenary souldiers besides are in the " fame Predicament : neither will Syracufe be ever in quiet, so long as any forrain aid beeither in the City, or in your army. And therefore our advice and countell is, that you would endeavour "to getthem into your hands, who with our Practors are encamped before Megara, and by exe- N " cution of them to deliver and let Syracule free in the end.

The contents of their letters were not fo foon read, but with such an outery and alarm they ranto their weapons on all hands, that the Protors amidft this garboil were fain to ride away as fall as they could gallop toward Spracuse. But although they were fled, the mutiny nevertheless continued and was not appealed; for the fouldiers fell upon the Syracufians that were in the camp amongst them, and they had all drank of the same cup, and not one escaped, but that Epicides and Hipporrates came between, and opposed themselves against the multitude in this their furious rage not upon any pitifull compation that was in them, or regard of common humanity, but because they would not cut themselves from all hope of return: and besides, they were not only defirous to have the souldiers themselves affectionate unto them and faithfull, and withall insteads of holtages: but also purposed, by this so great delert, first to gain and win unto them the kindfolk and triends of those souldiers, and afterwards to oblige and bind them fast by so good apawn and gage, remaining still among them. And having good experience, with how small a pust and gale of wind the common people turneth every way, they suborned a fouldier, one of them whowas belieged within the City of Leontium, to carry news to Syracuse, suring with those falle tidings that were reported at the river Myla: yea, and to aver the same confidently upon his own knowledge, and tell things that were doubtfull, as if they were most certain, and by himself seen and known: thereby to ftir up men to anger and indignation. This fellow was not only credited of the common multitude, but also being brought into the Council-House, he greatly moved the Senat: infomuch as some of them, more light of beliefe than others, gave it out openly and sindo "That it was happy that the avarice and cruelty of the Romans was thus discovered among the Leontins. And got blefs us from them here. For if they fet foot once within Syrace fe, they would commit the like ourrages, yea, and worse too a great deal, and more horrible; as the " should find there greater matter to work upon, and to satisfie their covetous and greedy appe "tite to the full. Whereupon they agreed in generall, to shut the gates, and to stand upon their guard, and defend the City. But they all feared not alike nor hated the same persons. For the mar tiall men, in a manner every one, and a great part of the common people abhorred the name of the

A Romans : the Prators, and some few of the principal Citizens, albeit they were in the huff, and noffeffed with the falle report aforefaid, yet they had more regard to provide for a mischief that was more imminent and near, and ready prefently to fall upon their heads. And now by this time Hippocrates and Epicides were come before Hexapylos. Within the City, the kinsfolk and friends of those Cirizens which were in the army, drew together in conventicles, conferred among themfelves to fet the gates open and agreed to have the common country of them all to be defended against the violence of the Romans. Now, when one only wicket of Hexapylos was opened, and they ready to enter in thereat, the Prators came upon them in the manner. And first they commanded by word of mouth, and threatned them; after that, by vertue of their place and authority they feemed to fright and terrifie them : and last of all, feeing nothing could prevail, forgetting their own dignity and majesty of their calling, they fell to pray and entreat them not to betray their country to thole, who aforetime were the instruments and supposts of the Tyrant, and now the corrupters of the army. But so deaf ear gave all the multitude in this their rage and furious fit unto the Prators, that they within, as well as without, fet their hands to, by all forcible means, to burst down the gates, and so when they were all broken open, the army was let in fale, and received within the Hexapylor. The Prators fled for refuge with the youth and fireneth of the Citizens into Acradina. The mercensries, the fugitives, and all the fouldiers that were left in Syracufa (of them who served the King) joyned to the army and augmented their forces, And fo Acradina alfo, was upon the first affault won. All the Prætors, but those that escaped by flight, and lived themselves in the midst of this hurry, were slain : and the night coming upon them, staid the maffacre. The day following, all bondflaves were called to receive the cap, and made free the prilons were fet open and the priloners let go at large. And this confuled rabble and multitude of all forts created Hippocrates and Epicides Prators. And thus Syracufe, having for a short time liberry shining favourably upon it, fell again into her old servitude.

When news hereof came to the Romans, incontinently they dislodged and removed the camp from Leontium, and marched directly towards Syracuse. It hapned the same time that the Embasladors lent from Appins by the way of the haven, were embarked in a galleace of five banks of ours: but another galley of four banks which was fent before, was not fo foon en red into the mouth of the harbour, but it was taken : and the Embassadors hardly, and with much ado escaped in the other. And now, the world there was grown to this pass, that no laws of peace, no, nor so much as the very laws of arms were observed, but broken clean : at what time as the Roman army lay incamp a mile and an half from the City, at Ol; mpium, the Temple of Jupiter, For when it was thought meet to fend Embassadors from thence, Hippecrates and Epicides with their followers encountred them without the gate, and charged them upon their perill not to enter the City. The Roman Orator alledged, and faid, "That he came not to proclaim war against the Syracusi-"ans, but to bring aid and help, as well unto those, who having escaped out of the midst of the "flaughter fled unto the Roman Camp, as also unto them, who being kept under with fear, en-"dure bondage and thraldom more milerable than banishment, yea, and death it self. Neither will "the Romans (faith he) put up that shamefull and cruell murder of their Allies without due rewenge. And therefore, if those persons who were fled for succour unto them, may return home " fafely into their country: if the authors of that massacre abovesaid, be delivered into their hands: "and if the Syracusians may enjoy again their liberty, together with their laws, there shall not " need any hollility or war. But in case these conditions be not performed they would persecute " with fire and (word, all fuch as shall hinder and stand against the same, who soever.

To this Epicides framed his words in this wife: "If (faith he) ye had any message and commission op an inverted with my brother and me, we would return you an answer accordingly. In the mean while ye were best be gone for this time, and return again when the City and state of Syra"cost fhall be under their governance, unto whom ye were sent, As for war, if the Romans think it good to deal that way, they shall find and know by experience, try when they would, that it is "one thing to a skill Syraess frand another to set upon Leontium, And so leaving the Embassadors,
"the made the gates saft against them.

From this time forward the Romans laid fiege unto Syracufe, and began to beleaguer it both by sea and land at once. On the land side at Hexapplos, by water at Acradina, upon the walls whereof the fea beateth. And like as they won the City of the Leontins, by terrifying them at the first assault, and therefore distrusted not, but that they should force and enter this also, one side or other, being so large and vast as it was, not compact, but built so scattering, one part far asunder from another, they approached with all their fabricks, engins, and ordnance of battery against the walls. Which enterprise of theirs, so resolutely begun, and so hotly and forcibly followed, had sped Well and taken effect, if one man at that time had not been in Syracuse, Archimedes was he, a singular Astronomer. A rare man for contemplation and beholding the sky with the Planets, and other stars therein fixed : but a more wonderfull engineir for devising and framing of artillery, ordnance, fabricks, and instruments of war, whereby he would with very little ado, and at ease, check and fullrate all the inventions which the enemies with so great difficulty had prepared for to give the affault. This cumping artificer and admirable workman had planted engins of all forts upon the curtain of the wall, which flood on certain hills, and those not of even height: and having for the most part high places that yielded hard accesse, and some other low again, whereunto men might come on even & plain ground, he fitted and furnished every place accordingly. Now Marcellus from out his gallies of five ranks of oars, affaulted the wall of Acradina, which (as is above-H faid) is washed and dashed upon, with the sea. And from the other gallies, the archers, slingers, yea and the light armed darters (called Velites) whose javelins are of that fashion, that they be unhandfome to be lanced back again (by those that have not the cast and skill of it) so assailed the defendants, that they hardly suffered any one to stand upon the walls without hurt and danger, There I lay kept their gallies far dittant from the wall, because archers and darters had need of some space and compais to lance and let drive their shot. But unto the gallies of five course of oars, there were adjoyned other two of either fide: for which purpole the oars within were taken away that they might close larboord to starboord and so be coupled one unto the other. And thus being rowed as one entire gally, by the help of the utmost oars without, they carried upon I them platforms of timber, framed with sloores and losts of planks, and other engins and instruments within them to batter and thake the walls. Against this artillery from the gallies, Archimedes beliowed and dispoted upon the wallscounter-engins of fundry fizes, fome greater, some smaller, Against those gallies that were furthest off he weighed and discharged stones of exceding main weight, and those that were nearer he annoyed with lighter bullets, but those he shot farthicker pon them. And last of all, to the end that his own Citizens might, without taking harm, make a counter-battery against the enemies, and so annoy them, he caused certain barbacans or loop-holes almost a cubit deep to be pierced through the walls, and to stand thick from the foot the eof, to the parapet; and all to flank the enemy, through which overtures, they within that closely against the enemies some arrows out of bows, some quarrels out of scorpions and K brakes of mean and indifferent bignels. And against those gallies, which approached more close and near under the wals (because they would be within the shot, and that they within might carry and levell over them) hedevised a crane or swipe to be planted alost upon the walls, having at the one end, which hung over the fea, a drag or grapling hook of iron like an hand, fastned thereto with a firong chain: which took hold upon the prow of a galley, and when the heavy counterpoile of lead at the other end weighed it down to the ground, and therewith drew with it the prow up on high, whiles it hung thus eloft in the air, the galley flood in a manner endlong upon the poop, And then the swipe being let go again all at once suddenly with a sway, dashed thegalley tumbling (as it were) down from the top of the wall, with fur ha fwinge and violence against the water (to the exceeding fear of the mariners) that if it had faln directly downright upon the L keel, yet needs it must have received good store of water into it. Thus all their provision for affault by the fea-fide, was deluded and made void: and then they turned their whole forces from then te, to give affault by land. But even that part of the wall likewife, was as well furnished with all manner of engins and ordnance, provided at the great charge of Hiero, and by his carefull forecall for many years together; but devited and framed by the artificial cunning and skill only of archimedes, Besides, the natural licituation of the ground was a great help: for that the rock, upon which the foundations of the walittand, is for the most part to steep and bending forward, that not only the flot levelled out of an engine, but also what soever was but rolled & tumbled down, with the very own weight and poile, came with a great force & violence upon the enemy, Which forefaid cause made the assailants to have difficult climing up, and as unstedfast footing and keeping of their hold. Whereupon they went to counsel, And confidering well, that all their attempts and enterprizes were thus deluded and mocked by the enemy: it was thought good to give over affault, and only by long and continuall fiege, to cut them off from all victuals both by land and tea, In the mean while Marcellus with one third part (well near) of the army, went forth in expedition, to recover again those Cities, which taking occasion upon these troubles, were revolted to the Caethaginians, And he gained Pelorus and Herbefus, which yielded on their own accord. As for Migarit, which he won by affault, he rafed it down to the ground; and lacked it, to the featful example of the rest and especially of the Syracusians,

And much about that time, Himilco alfo, who had a long time rid in the Bay of the Cape Pachynus with his Armado disbarked and fet aland at Heraclea (which they call Minoa) 250co foot-N men 3000 horsemer, and twelve Elephants. He had not all this power of men when he lay with his fleet under Packinus. For after that Hippocrates had taken and held the possession of Syracufus he went to Carthage, where being kent unto both by Embassadors frgm Hippocrates, and also by letters from Annibal (who moved him and remonstrances, That now the time was cometo recover Sicily again with much honour and glory: and being himself there present in person nobad follicitor by word of mouth to further and follow the cause) he easily periwaded the Carthagini ans and prevailed that as great a power both of horse and soot as might possibly be raised, should pass over into Sicily, Being arrived at Heraclea, within few daies after Agrigentum was delivered up into his hands, And all other Cities, which had banded and taken part with the Carthaginians were put into good hope to drive the Romans out of Sicily: that even they who were belieged0 within Spriente, to take heart unto them; and were fo in their ruff, that supposing part of their forces inflicient enough to defend their City, they parted between them the charge and managing of the whole war in this manner: That Epicides should remain behind for the guard and defence of the City, and Hippocrates joyn with Himileo, and war joyntly against the Romans. He with 10000 loot, and 500 horse, set out by night: and passed between the Corps de guard, wherenout at all warded, and encamped about the Acerra. As they were fortifying their Camp, Marcelon came upon them as he retired back from Agrigentum, possessed now by the adverse part: whither

A he had made great hafte, but in vain, in hope to prevent his enemies, and get thither afore: but little thought he (and nothing lefs) than in his return from thence, at that time and in that place, to meet with an army of Syracufians that should make head against him. Howbeit, for fear of Himileo and the Carthaginians; whom he knew to be abroad, and with whom he was not able to make his part good with that power which he had about him, he marched as circumfreedly as he could, having his eye on every side, and led his army in good order of battell against all occurrences whatoever might happen by the way. And so as good hap was, that carefull forecast and diligence, which he was provided with against the Carthaginians, served him in very good stead against the Sicilians, Finding them therefore busic in pitching their tents, without order, and fear put them to the sword, But the Cavalry after a slight skirmish begun, sied with their leader Hipperates to Acra. Marcellus after he had by his slight repressed and kept in the Sicilians, who were at hand to fall away and revolt unto the Romans, returned to Sye a special after some few dates, Himileo joyned with Hipperates, and en amped about eight miles from thence, upon the rivet Mattie.

Likewise about the same time, or very near, it hapned that 55 war-ships of the Carthaginians, under the conduct of Bomilear, Admirall of the Armado put into the great haven of Syracufe out of the deep and main fea: and also the Roman fleet of thirty Gallies, with five ranks of oars, arrived at Panormus, and landed the first Legion there: and thus the war was turned and diverted C from Italy. So wholly feemed both nations, as well Romans as Carthaginians, amused upon nothing now but Sicily. Himileo making full account to prey upon the Roman Legion which was fera land at Panormu, as they should come to Syracus; missed of the right way to meet with them : for he marched and led his power far within land higher in the country, but the Legion coaffed along by the fea fide, accompanied as it were with the fleet which flanked them: and came to Pachinus unto Appius Claudius, who with part of his for es went out to meet them on the way. But the Carthaginians made no long stay about Syracufe, For Bomilear having small trust and confidence in his ships, confidering that the Romans were coming toward him with a fleet, and were twice as many, in number: and withail feeing, that by fo journing there, he did no other good but with his company impoverish and eat out his fr ends, spred and hoised up sai, and with a merry D wind passed over into Affrick. Himiteo also, who had dogged and followed after Marcellus in vainas far as Syracufe, to cipy some good opportunity and vantage to bid him battell, before he joyned with a greater power: feeing that he was hereof disappointed, and the enemy lying about Syracuse safe and secure, as well in regard of their fortifications as their forces : became he would not frend any longer time to no purpose in fitting there still, to look upon their Allies how they were belieged, he dislodged and removed from thence: attending, wheresoever there were any hope and likelihood of revolt from the Romans, thither to come with his army, and thew himself in person, to encourage and annimate by his presence those that savoured his part, And first he recovered Margantia, where the Roman garrison was betrayed by the inhabitants, and delivered unto his hands. Into which City the Romans had conveyed great store of corn, victuall, and pro-E vision of all forts, Upon this revolt, other Cities also took heart unto them, and the Roman garrifons were either thrust and driven out of the Castles and Fortresses, or else were treacherously betrayed, surprised, and destroyed. The City Ænna, seated upon an high hill, and on every side inaccessible, as it was by naturall fination of the ground impregnable, to it had a firong garrifon within the Carlle, and a Captain of that garrilon, one, that was not so easie to be compassed and over-raught by deceitful trains. His name was Pinarius, a witty man, and hardy withalt, who reposed more trust in his own diligence to prevent, that he might not possibly be deceived, than in the truth and faith of the Sicilians. And at this time more than ever before, he flood upon his guard, and took heedfull care of himfelf and his charge, by occasion that he heard of somany treacheries and treasons, so many revolts For Cities, and maffacres of garrifons: and therefore as well by day as night, he looked that the Caffle was well provided and furnished of good watch and ward continually. & the fouldiers never departed from their armour nor their appointed place. Which when the chief Citizens of Anna perceived, who already had covenanted with Himileo, and promised to betray the fort and the garrifons and faw that the Roman Captain was fo wary that he lay not open unto the opportunity of any fraudulent and guilefull courie, they refolved by apert and open means to effect this their designed enterprise. They alledged therefore unto Pinarus, "That the City and Castle "both ought to be in their powershince that they entred into league and amity with the Romans as freemen, and were not yielded as flaves to be kept in durefs and priton, Reason would there-"fore, and meet it was (as they thought) that all the keys of the gates were delivered unto them. With good and trufty allies, their own faith and truth is the fureft bond. And no doubt, the "people and Senate of Rome would con them greater thank, and effect more dearly of them, if to be they of themselves, not by constraint, but of willing mind, would abide and continue in their found allegeance and faft friendship. Pinastus made answer again, "That he was by his General placed there Captain of the garrifon: at his hands he received the keys of the gates, and "the Constableship of the Castle, and the same to hold and keep neither at his own will, nor at "the pleasure of the men of Anna, but at his disposition, who sealed him his Commission, Now, for a Captain to abandon his fort quoth he) is a capital crime among the Romans, by vertue of

Then quoth Pinarius to them, If ye think much to address your messen-"gers to the Coniul, yet do me this favour, as to call a Common Councill of the people formy "lake, that I may know whether these demands proceed from some sew, or from the whole 6 body of the City. So it was accorded and agreed, that a generall affembly should be proclaimed agains, the morrow. Then Pinarius after that he was departed from this parly, returned into the r fortrels, and calling his fouldiers together, spake unto them in this wife: "I suppose ye have heard "already (my ondiers) in what fort the Roman garrifons have, these daies past, been betrayed and murdred by the Skillians, I hat treathery hitherto ye have avoided and escapeds first & prin-"cipally through the goodness of the gods: next and immediatly by your own valour and pro-" weis & by command watch & ward, tranding in your armor both day & night, And I would to "God ye might pais as well the time to come, without falling into this hard choice either to endure and fuffer such horrible mischief: or to execute and commit a fearfull example of cruelry. And " to morrow is the day that the City Enza shall overflow either with the blond of you, or of the "Inhabitants, And be ye well affored, that as ye shall lose ail that you have if they surprise you: of in case you prevent them and begin the fray there shall no peril at all betice you. And now I beseech thee O Dame Ceres, and thy daughter Proserpina, and all other gods "in heaven above, or inhell beneath, who inhabit this City, these holy lakes and sacred grores, "wherein ye are honoured and worshipped to vouchfase to be propice and savourable unto us in case we enter into this action and enterprise, for the avoiding of treachery intended against M "us, and not to offer michief unto other; and not otherwise. I would use more words unioyou my friends and fouldiers, for to animate and encourage you, if it were that you had to deal " with meninarms : but fince they are naked unarmed, & unwarned, you shall kill and flay them at your pleature, and fatisfie your selves with their bloud, And to the end that you need not sear "any harm from Himileo and the Carthaginians, loe the Conful himself lieth encamped near athand. Afterthis exhortation they were diimified, to take their relection and reft. The nest day, they were beslowed in fundry parts of the City, some to beset all the streets, others to sop the passages and the waies against the townsmen, that they might not escape. But the most or them flood upon and about the Theatre, and were nothing inspected as being nied neretoloreto behold and see the assemblies of the people. The Roman Captain Pinarius was by the Magistrates N brought forth and presented before the people : where he pleaded, That it lay not in his hands but in the power and authority of the Conful, to dispose of that which they demanded and heite, rated for the most part the same allegations that he shewed the day before. At first they began gently lome few by little and little; afterwards more and more of them, required him to deliver vp the keys; and so consequently all with one voice, charged and commanded him so to do : and when he feemed to make some stay and defer the matter, they menaced and threatned fiercely, stay and seemed as if they would no longer for bear but proceed to extream violence. Then the Captain made a fign with his robe, according to the former agreement: and with that the fouldiers who had their eyes upon him, waiting wiltly for the fignall and were ready for execution, fee up a lond cry and ran tome from aloft upon the multitude affembled over against them; others stoodthicks at every corner of the Theatre, where the people should go forth, and opposed themselves against them. Thus the men of Enna, thut up and penned within the Theatre were maffacred and by tumbled one upon other; not they only that were killed, but such also as fled one over another head: the found fell upon the wounded, the quick upon the dead, one with another, by heap, Then there was running from thence fundry waies, and as if the City had been taken upon affault by the enemy, there was nothing but murdering and flying away in every place, And as hot and ferious were the fouldiers in the execution of this unarmed multitude (whom they judged wor

A thily and justly to be killed) as if like danger presented unto them or choler raised in set battel had provoked them thereto. Thus Enna was held flill for the Romans by this means: were the deed imply ill, or by circumstance needfull and necessary; Marcellus milliked not of the fact & granted the pillage of the Citizens of Anna to the fouldiers : supposing that the Sicilians throughly frighted by this fearfull example would betray no more garritons. The calamity and hard fortune of this City, (standing, as it did, in the very heart of Sicily) was in one day divulged and noised thoughout the Island, from one end to the other, And otherwise, a famous and renowned town it was, either for the natural fituation fo exceeding strong: or because all places in it were accounted facted and holy, in remembrance of Proferpina; who in times past left her footing & traces there are R what time as the was ftolin away & ravished by Pluto.] Now it was generally thought by the Sicilians, that this curled and detestable matlacre had defiled and pollnted not only the habitations of men, but also the temples of the gods: whereupon even they likewise, who sood but doubtful and indifferent beforesfell now away from the Romans, and turned to the Carth-ginians.

Then Hippocrates retired to Murgantia and Himilco to Agrigentum: who were lent for by the confirmators and traitors within Anna, and approached with their forces, but to no purpole. Marcellus returned to the Leontins country: and after he had brought into the Camp corn and other victuals, and left there a mean guard, he presented himself to the sege that lay before Syracuse. And when he had fent Appius Claudius to Rome to fue for the Confulthip, he committed the charge in his room of the Atmado there, and the old leaguer unto T. Quimins Cristinus. Himself Cerefied and fortified his wintring harbours five miles from Exapples, at a place which men call

Leontia, And these were the affairs of Sicily unto the beginning of winter,

In the same summer the war began likewise with King Philip which long before had been infpeded, For there came Embassadors from Ocicum to M. Valerius the Prator Admiral of the fleer. for the defence of Brundussum, and the sea-coast thereabout of Calibria, and made report that Philip first affired to win Apollonia, and was come up the river with one hundred and twenty light gallies, or foilts with two ranks of oures against the stream; and afterwards, seeing her ould not effect his purpole fo speedily as he hoped, privily by night he approached with his army to Oricum: and that the City, fituate upon a plain, neither firoughy fen. ed with wails nor well manned with fouldiers, nor yet furnished with armor and munition, was at the first assault surprived D'and won. And as they recounted their news to they belonght him to grant aid and fuccour : and to make head against this undoubted enemy of the Romans, either by Land or for es at Sea, and to chase him away from them: who for no other reason were by him assisted, but because they were neer neighbors to Italy, M. Valerius leaving the guard of that place to T. Valerius his Lieutenant General, with a fleet of ships well rigged surnished & appointed; and having embarked these fouldiers (which the gallies for war would not receive) in the merchants ships of burden, arrived at Oricum on the second day after: and finding that City kept with a small and slight gatrison, which Philip when he departed from thence had left there recovered it without much relitance. Thither repaired to him emballadors from Apollonia, who brought word that they were belieged, because they refused to revolt from the Romans: and were not able to hold out any longer against E the forcible attempts of the Macedonians, unless a garriton of Romans were tent unto them. He promifed to effect what soever they defired, and so shipped a thousand electand choice souldiers in gallies, and sent them to the mouth of the river, under the conduct of a Captain of Alies Newins Criffus, an industrious man, and an expert souldier. He having landed his men, and sent the gallies back to Oricum (from whence he came) to the rest of the Armado, conducted his fouldiers higher in the country, far from the river fide, by a way that was not belet nor held by the Kings forces : and in the night-featon, unawares to all the enemies, entred the City. The day following they rested, only the Captain took a survey of the youth and able men of Apollonia, of their armor and the munitions and forces of the City. When he had feen and peru ed all thereupon he was well appaid and encouraged to fight, and withall he had learned by the foots and spies, how retchless, Fide, and negligent the enemies were withour. So at midnight he went forth of the City without any noise, and entred the Camp of the enemies so carelesty guarded as it was, and lying so open: that by credible report, there were above one thousand men got within the trench and rampier, before that any one was ware thereof: and if they had held their hands, and not faln to killing, they might have passed on still even as far as to the Kings Pavilion. But by reason that they slew the watders next the gates, the enemies were railed: whereupon, they were all so frighted and terrified that not only there was never a fouldier took we apon in hand, and went about to repulle the enemy out of the Camp; but even the King himfelf, half naked as he was, and newly wakened out of hisseep, clad in simple apparell, scarce decent for a common souldier, much leis I wor, for a King, was fain to run toward the river fide to his ships. Thirher also the other multitude fled dis-Gordered in heaps. There were not many under three thouland either flain or taken priloners in the camp. Yet there were more by odds of the enemies taken than killed. In the rifting of the camp the Apollonians met with Catapults and Balifts, and other engins provided for the affault of the City, which they conveighed all to Apollonia, to serve for defence of their walls against the like occasion of needfull service. All the booty besides of the camp was granted unto the Romans.

Tidings hereof being come to Oricum, M. Valerius presently set sorth the Armado as far as to the mouth of the river, that the King might not flie away and cleape by fea with his thips: whereupon Philip distrusting his power as well by sea as shore, and doubting he was not able to match the Romans, drew up some of his ships to land, set fire upon the rest, and so by land went into Ma. H cedony, with a great part of his fouldiers difarmed and spoiled. The Roman fleet wintered at Oricum with M.Valerius.

The same year in Spain the affairs went variably on both sides, For before that the Romans pasfed over the river Iberus, Mago and Afdrubal deleated a mighty host of Spaniards, so as, all the farther part of Span had faln from the Romans, but that P. Cornelius made hafte to transport his army over Ilerus, and came in good time to fettle the wavering and doubtfull minds of the allies. At the first the Romans encamped at * Castrum Altum, a place memorable for the death of great Amilear. The Castle was well tortified, and thither afore they had conveyed corn. But because all those quarters thereabout were full of enemies, and fundry times their Cavalry had charged the Roman footmen, and gone clear away without any harm, whereby there had been flain at times upontwo thouland of them, which either made small hatte away, and staid behind, or straggled loolely over the fields: the Romans departed from thence, nearer unto places of more fecurity and peace, and fortified themselves in camp upon the mount of Victoria. Thither came Cn. Scipio with all his forces, and likewise Afarubal the son of Gigo, the third Captain of the Carthaginians, with a ful army. And they all encamped beyond the water, over against the fort of the Romans abovefaid. P. Scipio, accompanied with certain light armed fouldiers, was gone out closely to discover and take view of the places thereabout: howbeit, not so covertly, but he was espied by theenemies, and (no doubt) they had put him to a shrewd foil in the open plain champian, but that he took a little hill thereby for his vantage. Where he was environed and befet round about: but by K the coming of his brother Cneus, he was delivered out of that danger.

Castulo, a famous and strong City in Spain, and so near linked in affinity to the Carthaginians, that Annibal from thence married his wife, ranged to the Romans. The Carthaginians cameagainst Illiturgum and began to assault it because a garrison of the Romans lay there: and likethey were to be Malters of the town, by occasion especially of a great dearth and scarcity of victuals within, But Cn, Sipio for to relieve his friends and the garrison, went out with a legion lightly appointed with carriages, and marching between the two camps of the enemies skirmished with them flew many of them, and entred the City. The morrow after he fallied out, joyned in fight with the enemy, and feed as well: fo as in both battels there were flain of them above twelve thoufand in the place, more than ten thousand taken prisoners, and 36 military entigns carried away. Thus the fiege brake up at Illiturgum, After this, the Carthaginians began to lay fiege unto Biggs ra(a City also consederat with the Romans,) But Cn. Scipio at his coming raised that siege without any conflict. Then the Carthaginians from thence went forward against Munda, and the Romans followed them thither straight after. There they encountred together and fought a set battel with banners displayed, for the space well-near of four hours. And as the Romans bare themselves bravely, and had got the better, and were at point of the victory, the retreat was founded, by occation that Cn. Scipio was hurtfore in his thigh with a barbed javelin, and the fouldiers about him were greatly afraid that the wound was deadly. But no doubt, if it had not been for that flay and hinderance the very camp of the Carthaginians might that day have been forced. For not only the fouldiers, but the Elephants also were driven already so far as the trench, and even thereupon the very bank, 39 of them were slicked with darts and pikes. In this battell likewise were killed (by report) twelve thousand men almost three thousand taken prisoners, and 57 military enigns won. Then the Carthaginians retired back to the City Aurina, and the Romans followed upon them, because they would give them no time to rest and breath themselves after their stight, Where Scipio being brought into the field in a litter, gave them battel the fecond time, and got the victory clear: but fewer of the enemies were flain by the one half than afore, becausethere were not so many in number lest to fight, But (as they are a nation given naturally to renew war, and to be ever fighting, and cannot give over) they foon repaired and made up their torces. For Afdrubal had lent his brother Mage, to levy and gather new fouldiers: whereupon they tookitelh heart again to try another field. These, being for the most part other souldiers (new come) sought N as it were in revenge, and to uphold that fide which in few daies space had so often taken the foil, and demeaned themselves as couragiously as they before, and sped as untowardly. For there were flain of them above eight thousand, not many under one thousand taken captives, with military enfigns 58. In rifling of them there was found very much spoil of the Gauls, as rings of gold carkanets, collars, and bracelets great store. Over and besides, two great Lords and Princes of the Gauls, whosenames were Manicaptus and Civismarus, were flain outright in that conflict. Eight Elephantstaken alive, and three killed.

Now when as the affairs in Spain went thus fortunatly with the Romans, they began at length for very shame to thinke of Saguntum, a town that was the cause of all these wars, and had now five years already been in the hands and possession of the enemy. Whereupon by force of armso they recovered it, drave out of the town the garrison of the Carthaginians, and restored it again to the ancient inhabitants, as many as remained alive, and had escaped these broils of war. Assor the Turdetans, who were the occasion of the wars between the Saguntins and the Carthaginians, they subdued them, and brought them under their subjection, fold them in portsale, and de-Broyed their City utterly. These were the atchievances in Spain, during the time that Q. Fabini and M. Claudius were Confuls.

At Rome, when the new Tribunes of the Commons were once entredinto their office prefently

A L. Merellus one of the Tribunes aforelaid, arrefted the Cenfors P. Furius, and M. Attilius, peremptorily to make their appearance and answer before the people. These Censors had taken from him being Treasurer the year before, his horse of service allowed him by the City, cassed and displaced him out of his Tribe, deprived him of liberty to give his voice, and made him Ararius, and all. for being a party with them at Canna, who complotted to abandon Italy. But by the means and mediation of the other nine Tribunes, they were discharged : for they would not suffer, that the Cenfors should come to their answer whiles they were in office. And the death of one of them, namely, P. Furius, was the cause that they could not accomplish the sessing and numbring of the Citizens, And when M. Attilius surrendred uphis Magistracy. Qu. Fabius Max, held the solemn Baffembly and Parliament of the people for the election of Confuls, wherein were created Q. Fabins Max, the Conful his fon, and T. Sempronius Gracchus the fecond sime, both absent. For Prators, there were elected M. Attilius, and with him, they who at that time were Adiles of the chair to wit, P. Sempronius Tudstanus, Cn. Fulvius Centimalus, and M. Emylius Lepidus,

This year, as it appeareth in old Records, were the Stage-plaies first set out by the Ædiles of the chair and continued four daies. This Ædile Tuditanus above-named was he who at Gannaf when all besides him for fear were astonied, in that wosull calamity) brake forcibly through the midst of theenemies, and escaped. When Q. Fabius the old Conful had finished the Election, then the new Confuls Elect were fent for to repair unto Rome, and they entred their Magistracy. Then they assembled the Senat for to consult and take order for the war, for the Provinces as well their own, C as those that were under the Prators: also concerning the armies, and the disposition of every charge and place of command. So the Provinces and armies were divided in this wife: The war with Annibal, wheresoever it fell out, was committed to the managing of the Coss. with the charge of one army, which Sempronius himself had before under his conduct: and of another, commanded by Fabius the Conful, And those were two legions. M. Emplius the Prætor, whose lot it was to have the jurisdiction over the forreiners, had committed his authority unto his Collegue Atilius, the Prator of the Citizens of Rome, that he might govern the Province about Luctria, and those two legions, over which Q. Fabius, now Conful, had the command, whiles he was Prator, To Semprenius the Prator befell the Province of Ariminum. To Cn. Fulvius was allotted Sneffula, with two legions likewise: fo as, Fulvins should have the leading of the legions D of Citizens, and Tudit anus receive his from M. Pomponius. The government of the forrein Provinces continued fill in the former deputies. M. Claudius ruled Sicily, fo far as the dominion of King Hiero extended: and Lentulus the Vice-Prætor, had the charge of the old Province, T. Offacilius was high Admiral of the Navy, without any new supply or augmentation of forces. M.Valerius was employed in Greece and Macedony, with one legion, and the Atmado which he had before. Q. Mutius was L. Deputy in Sardinia, having under him the old army, confifting of two legi-And C. Terenzius had the administration of the affairs in Picenum, with that one legion which long time he had been Captain of. Moreover, it was decreed and agreed upon that there which only that the induction of the legions of Citizens, and twenty thouland men besides levied of Allies and Associates. With these Captains and these forces above said, they provided for E the defence and maintenance of the State and Empire of Rome, against many wars at once, either in hand already, or suspected shortly. The Consuls having enrolled two legions of Citizens, and chosen a supply to make out the rest, before that they set soot out of the City, procured the pacification of the gods, for the fearfull and prodigious tokens that were reported. For the wall and gates of Rome were blafted and smitten with lightning from heaven: and likewise the Temple of Jupiter at Aricia. Other vain objects and illusions also of the eyes and ears, which men imagined they faw and heard, were beleeved for truths. Namely, there appeared in the river of Tarracina cerrain resemblances and shews of Gallies, whereas indeed there were none such. And in the Temple of Jup, Vicilimus, which standeth in the Territory of Coffa, there was heard, for looth, rustling of armor: and the river of Amiternus seemed to run with bloud. When satisfaction was Finade for these strange signs, the gods pleased, and all well again, according to the direction set downby the Priests and Prelates, then the Consuls set forward in their expedition, Sempronius into Lucania, and Fabius into Apulia. Where it fell out, that Fabius the father repaired into the Camp at Sueffula, as Lieutenant and affidant unto his fon. And when Fablus the younger went forth to meet him, and his Serjeants or Ufhers marching afore, faid not a word to Fabius the father, nor put him aside to give way, for very reverence of his person, (such majesty he carried) theoldman rode forward, and passed by eleven of the said Lictors with their bundles of rods. Then the Conful commanded the Serjeant that was next himself to do his office: and with that fald Uther called upon old Fabius, to alight from his horse back: and at last, he set soot aground: I did all this but to try, quoth he, my fon, whether you knew well that you were a Conful or no.

"Therecame that night feeretly to the Conful while the Camp lay there, one Cassius Alinius, an Appirate, with his three bondflaves, promifing, that if he might have a good reward for his Cervice, he would betray Arpos into his hands, Fabius then proposed this matter unto his Councill, to be debated of. Some were of opinion, that Altimiss was to be whipped and put to "death, fugitive runnagate and false knave as he was: a common enemy, and a dangerous to either "part, and playing with both hands, like a double-hearted hypocrite. Who first, after the over-"throw at Canne (as if he might turn with the wheel of fortune, and go from his word and faithfull promife, and change ever as she changeth) ranged himself unto Annibal; and by his exam-

For if it "may be lawfull for one to turn from the Romans, and held unlawfull to return again unto the "Romans no man need doubt, but shortly the Roman Empire will be for saken of all her confe-5, derats and allies, and we shall see within a while all the Cities of Italy linked and consedered in "fate league and friendship with the Carthaginians. And yet (quoth he) I am not the manthat "thinketh Altiniu worthy to be trusted in any thing for all this, but I would take a mean courie K "& middle way between both extremities. My opinion is therefore that for the present he should 66 be taken neither for enemy nor friend, but commanded to ward, and to have the liberty of a " priloner, and only be kept forth-coming in some confederat and trusty City, not fat from the "Camp during the time of the war. And when the war is once finished and ended, then I hold it " good to de iberate and confult, whether that his former revolt hath deferved more punishment "than this his pretent return meriteth favour and grace. Every man liked well of this advice of old Fabius, and gave their affent. So he was bound with chains, and both himself and his company delivered over and put incustody, and a good roun sum of gold, which he then had brought with him, was by commandment reserved for his use. At Cales he made his abode: where all the day time he field to walk at liberry, with his keepers following him, but in the night they kepthim L close prisoner. But at Arpi, where his homewas, they of his own house began first to mis him, and feek for him: afterwards, when it was noised throughout the whole City, that he was out of the way, and could not be found : the fame hereof couled a tumult, for the loss of a principal perfon as he was, thus revolted to the enemy. And for fear of an alteration in the State, prefently the news thereof was fent to Annibal. Who was nothing offended thereat, both because long afore he had the party himself in jealouse and su pition as one neither fish nor flesh, a man of nocredit, and hardly to be trusted: and also for that he found a good occasion and quarrel to seizeupon the goods of fo rich and substantiall a Citizen and to make sale thereof. But to the end that the world might think that he was more anery against his person, than greedy of his substance, he joyned with cruelty, a grave course also of judiciall severity, that the one might serve as a file to M givelustre to the other. For having sent for his wife and children into the Camp, first he examined them straightly, for to know whither he was fled, and what flore of filver and gold he had lest behind him at home in his house: and when he had learned enough of them touching every particular, and as much as he defired he burnt them quick to ashes.

Fabius being departed from Suessula purposed the first thing that he did to assail Arp. Where he lay encamped a mile from the town: and after he had well viewed by near approach, the fivuation of the City and confidered the wall, look where he faw it was most strong and sure, and therefore guarded most slightly and negligently, there especially he purposed to give the hostest essult. And when he had sufficiently provided and got together all ordnance and engins, requifite for the battery of Cities, he made choice of the most hardy and valiant Centurions of the whole army and set over them certain Tribunes and Marshals, vasorous and doughty good men, and appointed unto them a Regiment of fix hundred fouldiers (for fomany he thought sufficient for the present service) with direction and commandment, that when the trumpet sounded the relief of the fourth watch, they should bring scaling ladders to that place aforesaid. Now there flood a gate low and narrow, answering to the fireet not much used and frequented, by realon that quarter of the City was not inhabited, but flood void. That gate he gave them order fift to scale and clime over, and then to go forward on the wall, and from within-forth to break down the bors, and level the faid gate, and when they were Massers of that quarter of the City, then to wind the horn, and give fignall to the rest of the forces for to approach and come hard to the town, faying, That he would have all things in readinels, and in good order. This direction was 0 performed accordingly with great diligence, and that which was thought and feared would have been an hindrance and let unto them in the action, was the only thing which he ped them mol, that they were not descried, And that was a smooking shower of rain that began after midninght, which caused the warders and watchmento quit their standings, forlake the Sentinels, and to file into the houses for covert. The first noise of the storm pouring down with such a force, made that the rumbling of the fouldiers could not be heard, as they were breaking down the gate; and

A as it grew after to rain more foftly, and so kept fill at one, it sounded gently and sweetly in their eats untill it brought a good many of them falt afleep. Now after they had feized the gate, the Marshals gave order; That the Cornettiers should be bestowed in that void street aforesaid, dithan equally afunder, and to wind their horns, for to waken and raife the Conful. Which being done, according as it was before agreed, the Cof. commanded the standards and ensigns to be brought faith and somewhat before day-light entred at the said broken gate into the City. With that, the enemies at length began to rouse themselves, for now the shower and storm was past, and the day approached. There was a garrifon in the City at hand of five thouland of Annibal his fouldiers, rmed and well appointed: and the Arpins of themselves were 3000 strong. Those Bthe Carthaginians put in the forefront, as a forlorn hope, and opposed them against the enemy, for fear of 16me treacherous prank that they might play behind their backs. First, they began to arrange themselves to fight in the dark, blind, and narrow lanes. For the Romans had filled and rakenup not only all the threets, but also the houses that were next the gate to the end, they might not begauled with shot, and wounded from aloft. Some Arpins and Romans fell at length to meet, to take knowledge and acquaintance one of another, and to began to commune and talk together, The Romans asked what the Arpins meant to rebell; for what offence and harm given of the Romans, and for what defert and benefit received from the Carthaginians should they being naturall Italians) maintain war for Aliens, strangers, and barbarous nations, against the Romans their old friends and ancient Allies; and so to bring Italy in Subjection to Affrick, to do ho-C mage and fealty, yea, and to become tributary, and to pay pension unto it? The Arpins excused and cleared themielves, faying, that they (fimple men, and ignorant in all things) were bought and fold by their great rulers and principall Citizens, and lived in manner as captives and flaves under the command of some few persons, that might do all. Upon this beginning, more and more of them grew to parling and conference. At length the Prator of Arpi himieli was by his own people and Citizens brought and presented before the Conful: where, after faithfull promise passed between the enfigns and the battels; the Arpinsimmediatly bent their forces on the Romans fide against the Carthaginians. The Spaniards likewise (who were not many under a thousand men) after they had capitulat and agreed with the Roman Conful, nothing but this one article. That the garrifon of the Carthaginians might be fert forth and pals away fafe without harm: Deame with their colours to the Conful. Then all the gates were fet open for the Carthaginians to depart : and being fent away upon fafe conduct, without any, harm at all or damage unto Annibal. artived at Salapia. Thus Arpi was restored again to the Romans, without the lois and detriment of any one man, but one only o'd traitor and new fugitive revolt. The Spaniards were appointed to have double allowance of victuals: and they performed good faithfull, and valiant service many times after to the Common-weal.

When one of the Confuls was in Apulia, and the other in Lucania, one hundred and twelve men of arms. Gentlemen of the Nobility of Capua, having licence granted by the Magifirates to go out of the City, pretending to make a rode into the enemies country, and to fetch in booties and prizes, came directly into the Romans Camp ,lying about Sueffula. And meeting with the ECorps de guard, declared who they were, and that they would parl with the Lord Deputy. Now Cn. Fulvius was the General and Commander of the army there: who being advertized and certified hereof gave order that ten only of all that number should be brought before him unarmed. When he heard their fuit and demand, which was nothing eife, but that when Capua was recovered by the Romans, they might have their goods restored unto them : he received them all into his protection. The other Prator also Sempronius Tuditanus, won by force the town Cliteraum: where there were taken prisoners above seven thousand men: and a good deal of copper and silver coingained befides. At Rome there chanced a fearfull and pitifull fire, which continued two nights and one whole day. All between Solina and the gate Carmentalis, together with the Aguimelium and the street Jugarium, were burned down, and made even with the ground. Like wife Fwithout the gate the fire spred far all about, and in the Temples of Fortuna and Dame Matura, and Sper confumed much as well hallowed as prophane.

The same year, when all things prospered well and had good success in Spain, P. and Cn. both Scipios having recovered many affociats and those of ancient league that came in again to him and ielded themselves; and besides, gained some new consederats: conceived good hope, and took heart to proceed farther, even into Affrick,

Siphan King of the Numidians, on a judden fell out with the Carthaginians, and became their professed enemy. Unto him the Scipios addressed three Centurions as Embassiadors, to treat with him about a league and alliance: and to promife withall, that if he went on fill to trouble and moleft the Carchaginians, by making war upon them, he should do an high favour to the Senate and people of Rome: that they would endeavour and bring about, that in good time and place, the should be well required for that kindness, and receive at their hands a double recompence with thanks. This embassage pleased the barbarous King, right well. And after he had conferred and reasoned with the Embassage, concerning military affairs, and the knowledge of warsare: and heard those old & experienced souldiers talk of war, he soon found his own wants, and how unskilfull himself was in many points and feats of arms, in comparison of that methodicall and orderly discipline, whereof they had discoursed. "The first thing then that he requested at their hands, was this: That as they were good friends and faithfull Allies, two of them would go back with their Embassie unto their Generals, and that the third might remain with him, toll " read unto him a lecture in the military science of warfare, Saying that the nation of the Numi-" dians were raw and altogether unskilful in footmens service, and only nimble and practifed in "fight on horseback, So (quoth he) from the first beginning of our nation have our ancestors used "to war: & fo have we from our childhood been enured to fight. Mary, an enemy I have, trufling "and prefuming much upon his Infantry, whom I would gladly be able to match every way in all "kind of fervice, Footmen I am able to fet out as well as another: for why? my Realm ispo-" pulous and yieldeth abundance of men : but altogether ignorant we are, how to fit them with armor, how to marshall them, how to order and set them in battell array insomuch as all my " people in battell go to it pell-mell, and are as a multitude hudled and thrumbled together at a I et venture without skill without discretion and advisement. The Embassadors answered and said, That for the present they would do according to his will and pleasure: but withal, they had his faithful promife & word of a Prince that he should immediatly send back their companion again, in case their Generals approved not their deed in that behalf. Q. St atorius his name was, that staid behind with the King. So Syphax fent by the two Romans his answer to the foresaid Embassage into Spain: and befides, with them other Numidians, Embaffadors of his own, to receive farther assurance and security from the Roman Generals : unto whom he gave in charge, that forthwith they should sollicit, perswade, and entice all the Numidians that were auxiliary souldiers unto the Carthaginians and lerved in any Camp City, or garrison Town of theirs, for to abandon them and come to him. And Statorius for his part, having mustered a great multitude of serviceable young K men, chose forth and enrolled a power of footmen, to serve in the Kings wars: and when he had forted them into bands and companies, and ordred them in battell array, as near as possibly he could, to the manner of the Romans: he trained them in their running to follow their colours: he taught them to keep their places in their ranks, and to double their files: and likewise he accustomed them to travell and do work: and to acquainted them with other military orders and exercises, that within short time, the Kingreposed as good confidence, and was as mighty inhis new Infantry, as in his old Cavalry : and in a fet pitched field on even ground, was able to meet the Carthaginian with banner displaied, and give him the foil in a full battell. The coming of the Kings Embassadors into Spain, was to the Romans also a matter of great consequence and importance : for upon the rumour and tame that went thereof the Numidians began to fail away space, L and to come thick unto the Romans. Thus were the Romans joyned in amity and friendship

When the Carthaginians had intelligence of this new alliance, they addressed immediatly their Embassadors to Gala, who raigned in another part of Numidia, over a nation called Mass, la. This Gala had a fon named Masanissa, of seventeen years of age, but a youth of such towardness, and To forward in vertue, that even then he made good and apparant shew, that he would another day enlarge his dominion, and make a more flourishing and mighty Kingdom than his father should leave it unto him. These Embassadors declared unto Gala, "That sorasmuch as Spipes 6 had entred league, and was banded with the Romans, to the end that by their alliance and so-"ciety, he might be more mighty and puissant against other Kings and nations of Affrick; it M Were also better for him and much more commodious to joyn with the Carthaginians in all "convenient (peed before that either Syphax passed over into Spain, or the Romans into Affrice." And S. phax (say they) may soon be deseated and overthrown now, while that he hath gained " naught yet but the bare name of the Roman League. Gala was foon perswaded to send a power of men especialy at the earnest instance of his son, who was very desirous of that war, and to have the managing thereof He with the help of the Carthaginian legions vanquished Syphan and gave him a great overthrow. So as at that field there were flain, by repoort, in one day thirty thouland, Syphan himself in person, with some sew Numidian horsemen, sled back to the Maurisians, that inhabit the farthest coasts, hard upon the Ocean over-against Gades. But the barbarous people at the same of his coming so resorted in great numbers to him out of all parts, that in a short space N he was able to arm a mighty hoft. And before he could with them cross over into Spain, which was divided from Affrick with a narrow arm of thesea, Masanissa was come with hisvictorious Army: who in that place, of himself, without any help or aid of the Carthaginians, gave Syphax battell to his great honour and fingular glory. In Spain no memorable exploit was atthieved, but that the Roman Generals allured and drew to them the able and serviceable manhood of the Celtiberians, for the same hire and stipend that they bargained for with the Carthaginians: and sent from thence above three hundred Spaniards of the noblest parentage into Italy, to follicit their countrymen, who served under Annibal as auxiliaries to follow them and take part with the Romans. This only, touching the affairs of Spain that year, is a thing worthy to be noted and remembred. That the Romans never waged fouldier to serve in their war before that time, when 0

the Celtiberians began to be their mercenaries, and first received pay,

Publius Cornelius Scipio, furnamed afterwards Africanus, was made Ædsle, before he was of law-fullyears, Annibal won the City Tarentum (all but the Caffle, into which the Roman garrifon was recived) by means of certain young Tarentine Gentlemen, who had made femblance, that they went by night a hunting. The folenon plaies in the honour of Apollo, were now first instituted, upon occasion of certain propheticall verses of Mattins, wherin the overthrow at Canne had been foretold. O. Fulvius and Ap. Claudius Conful, fought fortunately against Hanno, a Duke or Captain of the Carthaginiani, T. Sempronius Gracchus the Pro-Conful, was by a Lucan (his hoft that gave him entertainment) rained into the danger of av ambulh, and slain by Mago. Centenius Penula, who kad served in the wars as a Centurion, having made suit unto the Senat, to have the leading of an army, and promised, if this petition were granted, to win the victory of Annibal, and to vanquish him, took the charge of eight thouland footmen, and gave battell to Annibal: but he was slain him felf, and his who'e army defeated and putto the sword. Cn. Fulvius the Prator fought unfortunately against Annibal, and loft the field: in which fight there died fixteen thousand men. Himself, with two bundred horsemen fled and escaped, Capua was besieged by Q. Fulvius, and Appius Claudius, the Confuls. Claudius Marcellus in the third year of the fiege won syracule, and bare himself in that service like a worthy and noble Knight. Inthat tumult and hurly-burly when the City was taken, Archimedes, whiles he was bufily occupied about certain Geometrical figures and forms that he had drawn in the dust, was killed. The two Scipios, Publius, and Cornelius, efter so many and so worthy exploits performed fortunately in Spain, cameto a wofull and heavy end, being themselves slain there, with the loss well-near of their whole Armies, in the eighth year after that they went into Spain. And the main possession of that Province had been quiteloft, but for the singular manhood and industry of L. Martius, a Knight of Rome, who having rallied and gathered together the remnants of the armies, so encouraged them, that by their valuant service two several encamped holds of the enemies were won seven and thirty thousand of the enemies flain, and eighteen hundred taken prisoners, and a great rich booty obtained. Whereupon he was called Captain Martins.

The five and twentieth Book of T. Livius.

Hiles these affairs thus passed in Affrick and in Spiin, Annibal emploied the summer season in the territory of Tarentum, in hope by treason to be Master of the City of the Tarentins. In which mean while certain base Cities of the Salentins, and towns of no importance revolted unto him. And at the same time, of those twelves States of the Brutii, which the year before had turned, and banded with the Carthaginians, the Consentins and Thurins were rallied wholly again to the devotion of the people of Rome. And more of them had returned likewise, but for L. Pomponius Veientanus, Captain of the Allies: who after he had made certain rodes into the country of the Brutii, and sped his hand well with many booties, took upon him the countenance of a inflicient Colonel, and was no less reputed and having gathered a power of men, suddenly in haste, without good advisement, fought with Hanno. In which conflict, a mighty multitude of his men were either flain or taken priloners. But, as good hap was, they were but a disordered unruly rabble of rustical clowns and bondflaves: and the least loss of all other, was the Captain himself, who amongst the rest was taken captive: a man as then, the author of a rash and sool-hardy fight, and had been aforetime a Publi-can or farmer of the City revenues, and alwaies (through his naughty practises and cunning ferches and thifts wherein he was become skilful) a difloyal perfon and dangerous both to the publike State, and also to those private companies and societies, with whom he had commerce and dealing, Sempronius the Conful lying in the Lucans country made many light skirmillies, but not any one worth remembrance, and won certain poor towns, and of imal regard, belonging unto the

The longer that this war continued lingring, whiles prosperous success and adverse mishap interchangeably wrought much variety and alteration as well in the inward minds of men; as in their outward state and fortune; such religious zeal and superstition (and the same for the most part in forrein ceremonies) had so seized & possessed the City, that either the men or gods therof, were juddenly all at once become clean altered and transfigured. Infomuch as now the Roman tites and holy observations were contemned, not only insecret, & within doors at home in their private houses, but abroad also in the open streets, yea, and in the common place and Capitoli-H where there flocked alwaies a fort of women that neither offered facrifice and oblations, nor faid their praiers, and did their devotions according to the use and custome of their native country and City. Certain odd Priests and Chaplains, yea, and doting wizards and blind Prophets, had inveigled the minds and coniciences of men: whose number was the greater by reason first of the rural people and pealants of the country, who for need and poverty, and for fear together. were driven to quit their lands which they had not tilled and husbanded, by realon of the long wars, and many invalions and rodes that laid all waste, and so retired into the City: afterwards by the ease occupation and ready means of gain which they found by the errour of others, whom they foon seduced and abused: which trade they used and practised openly, as if it had been a I lawfull art and mystery. At the first, divers good and honest persons began secretly to grieve and be offended herewith, yea, and to mutter and utter their griefs in private: but afterwards inprotels of time the matter was presented before the LL. of the Councill, and brake forth to open complaint in publike places. The Ædiles and Triumvirs Capitall were blamed much, and shamly rebuked of the Senate, for not redreffing these disorders: and when they went in hand to rid the common place of this multitude, and to cast down, over-turn, and sling away the preparation and provision for their facrifices and oblations, they had like to have been missied and mischieved by the people. When this malady and miforder feemed now to be greater than might be remedied and reformed by the meaner and inferiour Magistrate, M. Æmylius, Prator of the City for the time being, received Commission by order from the Senate, to see that the people were eased K and delivered from this new religion and superflicion. He not only read unto them in a publike affembly the decree of the Senate in that behalf, but also made proclamation, Imprimis, that whofoever had any books of propheties or prayers, or treaties written of this art and frience of facrifices, should bring in all those books and writings unto him before the Calends of April next eniting. Item, that no person should facrifice either in publike place, or facred Church after any new form or forrein rights and traditions. And in that year there died certain publike Priefls, to wit L. Cornelius Lexitalus the Arch Prelate, or high Priest: and C. Papprius Maffo, the fonos (aus a Bishop, Also P. Furius Philus an Augur, and C. Papyrius Masso the ion of Lucius, a Decemvir deputed for holy mysteries. In place of Lentulus and of Papyrius, were M. Cornelius Cethiqui, and Co. Servolins Cop olubilituted high-Priest and Bishop. For Augurthere was created L. Quin- L tus Flammus: and L. Cornelius Lemulus was cholen Decemvir over facred ceremonies and divine

Now the time drew near of the solemn election of new Consuls: but because it was not thought good to cal the old aways (bufied as they were in the wars) T. Sempronius one of the Confuls, nominated for Dictator, to hold that election aforelaid, C. Claudins Cento, who named for his Generali of the Cavalry Q Fulvius Flacens. This Dictator, the first comitial day following created for Confinis Q. Fulvius Flaccus abovenamed, his Generall of horsemen, and Ap. Claudius Pulcher, who in his Prætorship had the jurisdiction and government of the Province of Sicily. Then were the Prators elected, Cn. Fulvius Flaceus, C. Claudius Noro, M. Junius Syllanus, and P. Cornelius

Sulia. When the Election was ended the Dictator refigned up his place. That year was Adile Curule, together with M. Cornelius Cethegus, one P. Cornelius Scipio, whole furname afterwards was Africanus. When he food and made fuit for the Edileship, and the Tribut es of the Commons were against him, objeding that he was not eligible and capable of that office for that he was not of lawfull age to be a competitor, and to put in for it: If (quoth be) all the Onicites and Citizens of Rome will choose me Ædile, I have years enough on my bak, Whereupon, in favour and furtherance of his fuit, there was fuch running and labouring on all hands to the Tribes for their voices that the Tribunes suddainly surceased their purpole to hinder him. And this was the largers and donative that the Ædiles beltowed. The Roman Games were according to the wealth of that time, exhibited and fer out with great state and magnificence and continued one day longer than ordinary : and for every fireet throughout the City, was allowed a N "Congins of oyl L. Villius Tappulus and M. Fundanus Fundulus Ædiles of the Commons, accused certain dames and wives of the City beforethe people, of dishonest and incontinent life: and fome of them being condemned, they forced into banishment. The Games called Plebeii, were renewed for two daies: and by occasion of these games a solemn feast or dinner was kept for the honour of Jupiter.

Then Q. Fulvius Flaceus the third time entred the Consulfhip, together with Appins Claudius: and the Prators cast lots for their Provinces. It fell unto P. Cornelius Sulla his lot to have the jurisdiction both of Citizens and strangers, which before was executed by twain. To Cn. Fulvisi Flaccus iell Apulia: to C. Clandius Nero was allotted Sueffula: and M. Junius Syllanus his hap WE to have the rule of the Tuscans. The Consuls were appointed by decree of the Senate to war with 0 Annibel, and to have under their command two legions apiece: and that one of them should receive his legions of Q. Falius, the Cof. of the former year: and the other take his at the hinds of Fulvius Centimalus. As for the Pretors, Fulvius Flaccus had Commission for the conductof the legions at Luceria, which served under Emplius Prator there: and Nero Claudius was to have the leading of those that were under the hand of C. Terentius in Picenum: and that they should provide themselves of supply to make up the full number of the Companies. M. Junius had the charge of the legions of Citizens multred the year before to ferve in Tufcany: T. Sempronie

A Gracebus, and P. Sempronius Tudit anus continued fill in the government of their Provinces, the one of Lineania, the other of Gallia, and kept their own forces. Likewise P. Lentulus governed the old Proxince in Sigily: M. Marcellus was Lord Deputy of Syracuje, and fo far as the Realm and Dominion of King Hiero reached. T. Ostucilius. Admitall of the Navy. Greece was governed fil by M. Valerius Sardinia by Q. Murius Scavola, Spain by P. and Cornelius Scrpios, To the old armies before, there were other two new legions levied and enrolled by the Cost. So as in all the whole forces for that year amounted to 23 Legions.

When the Confuls (bould mufter the fouldiers they were hindred by occasion of a lewd prank plaied by one M. Posthumius Pyrgensis, to the great trouble and disquiet of the State and publike peace, This Postbumius was by his vocation and calling a Publican, who many years together for crafty and deteitfull dealing, for avarice and coverousness, had not his fellow in all the City, but it were L. Pomponius Veient anus again; the fame man, whom the year before as he forraged the terntories of the Lucans rashly and unadvisedly, the Carthaginians by the conduct of Hanno had taken prijoner. Thele two (for almuch as it was covenanted and indented before, that the transporting of those things which were for the provision of the armies beyond sea should be warranted by the Gity against all danger of tempest; and that all dammage and loss of goods that way mifcattying should not lie upon the shoulders of the Publicans, who had undertaken by great to serve the armies, but be made good again out of the common Chelt and Treasure:) these publicans (I (av) not only gave false information of certain shipwracks, but also if they brought word at any timetally of some ships that were perished, they were such only as were lost by their own fraud and deceit, and not call away by chance or violen e of weather. For they would fraight & charge certain old vessels and shaken bottoms, with some sew weres of small or no worth at all, and suffer them to fink for the nonce in the deep fea, and tave the mariners and failers with small pinaces and cockboats prepared aforehand for the purpole: and when they had done, lie shamfully and fay that they had loft merchandise and commodities in those ships of fund y forts, and of great value. Thele cunning parts of theirs had been the year past revealed and notified to M. Emplus the Prator, and the Senat by him made acquainted therewith: howbeit there was nothing done, nor any act of Senst deviled for the chattisement of the offender: because the I.L. of the Councill in no case would offend the company and society of these publicans and farmers, in such a time especially, when there was some need of them. Then the common people took the matter into their own hands, for to proceed with more feverity against these level and fraudulent pra-Aties. At length, two of the Tribupes of the Commons, Sp, and Lucius both Carolin aro'e up and shewed themselves. For seeing how odious and infamous an indignity this was, and not to be inffered they brought M. Post humins in question, and laid an action and set a fine upon his head. of two hundred thouland * Affes. When the day of triall was come, whether the fine aforefaid * 625 lib, fler; should stand and be paid; or taken off and remitted; and that the Commons were assembled in so great number, that the great Court yard of the Capitol would fracely hold the multitude : the defendant spake for himself and pleaded at large. But the only hope that he seemed to have was this, in case C. Servilius Safaa a Tribune of the Commons, a friend and near kiniman of Posthumius, would by vertue of his place come between and flop the course of law for proceeding farther before that the tribes and wards were called forth, to go together and to give their voices. The two Tribunes abovenamed, having brought forth the witnesses to depose, and their depositions being taken, commanded the people to void and make way: And the lottery casket or fosfer was brought forth to cast lots in what Tribes the Larines should give their voices. All this while the Publicans were earnest with Casca, to dissolve the assembly by one means or other, and put off the Court for that day. The common people on the other fide called on hard and gainfaid it. And as it fell out, Cafea far formost in one of the points and corners of the affembly. He wist not what to do his mind was so perplexed for shame of the one side if he did not help his friend and kiniman, and for fear on the other fide, because he see the people so eagerly bent. The Publicans seeing small hope of help in him, with full intent to make some fir, and to trouble the Court, put forward forcibly and advanced themselves through a void way, seized upon an high place, and between the Tribunes and the people, rushed in upon them, and fell to quarrell and braul both with the people of the one fide, and also with the Tribunes on the other: infomuch as they were like to go together by the ears. Whereupon Fulvius the Conful, " See yenot (quoth he to the Tri-"bunes how basely ye are accounted of and made of no better reckoning among them, than pri-"vateperlons? See ye not a riot and mutiny toward, unless ye make hatte and break up the af-"iembly? So the Commons were difmified, and a Senate called: Where the Confuls made relation unto the Lords of the Councill, and complained how the folemn Seffici and Court of the The com-Commons, was by the audacious violence of the Publicens diffurbed: "That Court (I fay) plaints of the wherein M. Furius Camillus, upon whose exile ensued the destruction of the City, suffred Consuls to the "himself to be condemned by ungrateful Citizens: wherein the Decemvirs afore him by vertue "of whole laws the City is governed, and we live at this day: and wherein m my principall Ci-"tizens afterwards have been content to be fet down and judged by the people. Moreover how " Post humius Pyrgensis by force wrested from the Commons, the liberty of their voices and suffra-"ges: lubverted and made void the judicial Session of the Commons: curbed the Tribunes and "had no regard of them ; came as it were in warlike manner against the people of Rome: and got for their wantage the higher ground; to keep the Tribunes from coming unto the Commons:

* About a wine gallon. "and to flop the tribes for being called to fcrutiny and to give their voices: and nothing elle ith was that kept men from committing a fray, and fliedding blond, but the patience of the Magi-"Arates themielves : in that for the present, they gave place to the furious rage and malepart fanci-"nels of a few and for his will and pleasure brake up the assembly, before they could go together " about the matter they were met for : (which the defendant himself with force & arms wasrea-"dy to flop and hinder for going forward) because they might have no occasion given them to "quarrel, which was the only thing that they fought for. When this matter with all the circumfrances was throughly scanned of, and the best men there had spoken their minds, and given their opinion according to the outragiousness and indignity of the thing : and thereupon the Senat decreed, that this violence tended to the breach of common peace, and the hazard of the State (4) most dangerous precedent to be suffered) then without more ado, the two Carvilli Tribunes of the Com, laid afide clean all debating about the penall fine aforefaid, and indited Posthumiu of a capitall crime: and commanded him to be attached by a principall Serjeant, and to be led to prifon unless he put in good sureries for his appearance to answer the cause, such as would be bound for him body for body. Posthumisu put in bail: and made default at his day. Thethen Tribunes called the Commons together preferred a bill unto them, which they granted to pass as an act, in this form: That if M. Pifthumius came not forth & made appearance before the Calends of Man. and being cited and called that day, answered not to his name, and no lawfull excuse alleaged for his abience, they judged him to be a banished man, and therefore awarded his goods to be fold in port-fale and himielf to be excommunicate, and interdicted the use of water and of fire: and to I lose the benefit of a Citizen for ever. This done, they began also to endite all those, one after another of a capitall crime, who were his abettors, and the movers and flirrers of a fedition and commotion of the people and to call for personal pledges. At the first they committed as many of them as could find no fuch fureties : and afterwards, those also that were sufficient to put in bail For the avoiding of which danger, most of them departed into voluntary exile. This was the end of the Publicans fraudulent dealing; and this was the iffue of their audacious enterprife, in defence and maintenance of their guile and deceit.

After this, a folemn Court was called for the creation of the Arch-Prelate, and M. Corneliu Cethegus newly elected Prelate, was the Prefident of this election. Three competitors there were, who fired for that Prejacy, and firived earnestly one against the other: namely, Q. Fulvius Flacen. Confui for the time being, who also had before been twice Conful, and Censor besides; also T. Manlins Torquatus, a man of great reputation, for that he had been likewife dignified with a double Confulfhip, and one Centorship; and last of all P. Licinius Craffus, who as yet, was to he for the Ædileship: howbeit, this young man in that sute and contention was superiour, and carried it away from those grave, ancient, and honourable persons. Before him, for the space of an hundred and twenty years, there had not been created any one, the highest Priest, (fave only P.Cormelius * Caluffa) but had fit before in the Ivory Chair and born office of State. The Conful had much ado to go through with the Levy, and to enroll the full legion of fouldiers, by reasonthat the small number of young and able men would hardly afford both to furnish out the new legions of Citizens, and also to supply and make up the old. Howbeit the Senate would not suffer !! them to give over their enterprise which they were about, but agreed that there should be cholen two Ternions of Triumvirs: the one fort of them to be fent out, within the compass of fifty miles every way from Rome, the other to go farther; with commission to take good view and fursey, both within that precinct and without, in all through-fares and market towns: inboroughs and places of frequent affemblies; of all persons of free condition that they could fet eye on: and to many as they thought able men of body to bear arms, although they were not come to the layfullage for fervice, to preis them for fouldiers. Also it was decreed, that the Tribunes of the Commons, it they so pleased, should put up a bill, that all under seventeen years of age, who had bound themselves by military oath, should have as good pay, as if they had been enrolled soulders at seventeen years or upward. By vertue of this decree, the two Ternions aforesaid of the N Triumvirs being chosen, made diligent search, and visited all the country over for free-bom men

At the same time letters came from M. Marcellus out of Sicily, concerning the demands of the e foundiers who ferved under P. Lentulus, and they were read in the Senate House. That any confided of the refidue which remained after the field loft at Canna, and was confined into half (asharh been faid afore) with this condition, not to return back into fealy before the Punick war should be ended. These souldiers obtained licence of Lentulus to send as Embassadors wso Marcellus (where he lay in winter harbour) the principall men of arms, such as served on hot fes allowed by the City, the chiefe Centurions also and the bravest souldiers and choice flower of the Legions. One of these in the name of the rest, having liberty granted them for to speak matto his oration in this wife. "We had come to you into Italy, O M. It is so indeed my LL ? do ye to easily pardon and forgive C "your own felves and children? and deal ye fo hardly, fo rigoroufly and (ruelly, against us base abe ject persons, and vile wretches? And was it no thame and dishonor imputed to the Consul and "other great personages of the Cityeto flie, when there was no other hope? and were the poor "fouldiers fent by you into the field with this intention, to be all killed up, and none to escape? At "the battail of Allia, the whole army in a manner fled away: Also at the fleaights of Candium " (to say nothing of other shameful foils of our armies) the host yeelded up their armor to the "enemy, before they joyned battel, and fought one flrok. Yet, so far off it was, that those armies " suffained any infamy and shameful reproach therefore, that both the City of Rome was recovered "again by the means of those Regiments which fled from Alia to Vet, and also the Caudine legions which returned to Rome naked, were fent again into Samnium well armed: who subdued D "and brought under the yoke of subjection, the very same enemies, who had taken such pride and " joy in that dishonour and ignominy of theirs. And now, for the army before Canna, is any man "able to come forth and charge them juftly, that either they fied, or for cowardly fear behaved themselves unseemly, and not like fouldiers? Where were stain in field above fifty thousand men: "from whence the Consul fied with fifty Horsemen, and no more: and of which company thereis "not one remaineth alive, but whom the enemy, weary with killing, spared and left. I remember, at what time as the prisoners taken there, were denied money to pay for their ransome, then " every man commanded and praised us for faving and referving our felves against another day, to " be employed in the fervice of the Common-weal : for returning unto Venusia to the Conful, "and for making a good shew of a compleat army. But now, in worse case are we, than in our E "fathers dayes, captives have been that were taken prisoners. For they only had their armor and "weapons changed for worse, their rank in the battel shifted, their place in the camp where "they should quarter, altered: which notwithstanding, they recovered again all at once, by per-"forming their good devoir to their country, and winning a vistory in one fortunar battel. Not st one of them was ever confined (as it were) to a place of exile: none put befide hope to be dif-"charged from fouldiery by ferving our his full time : and to be brief, they were fet to fight with "fome cremy or other, where they might once for all, either lose their life, or end their dishonor. "And we, against whom nothing can be objected at all, unless it be this, that we were the cause, "and none but we, that some citizen of Rome might be said to remain alive of all those that were "at the battel of Canna: we I fay, are fent far enough off, not only from our native country, and F' Italy, but also from all enemies: where we wax old inexile, to the end, that we should have no "hope, no occasion and opportunity to wipe away and cancel our digrace, to mitigate and paci-"fie the anger of our fellow-citizens, and finally to die with honor. But it is neither end of "shame, nor reward of versue and valour, that we defire and crave : but only that we might be "permitted to make proof of our courage, and shew our prowels. Pains and perils we seek for, and to be employed in dangerous adventures, like hardy men and brave fouldiers. Two years " already there hath been sharp and hot war in Siedy. Some Cities the Carthaginians won by "force other some the Romans took likewise by assault, Whole Regiments of soot, many troops "and corners of Horse encounter together, and assail one another. At Syracuse there are great semerpiles and worthy feats of atms, both by Sea and Land. The shouts of them that fight, the "wety clattering and ringing again of their armorand weapons, we can hear where we are, and we we fit fill like idle lasks, and do nonling, as if we had neither hands nor weapons to fight with. "The samponium the Conful, with legions of bond-flaves, hath bidden battel to the enemies, and fought with them in plain field to oft that they are well recompensed for their labour with gaining their freedom first, and then the Burgeofie of the City. Let us yet, in place and qualk-"tyat leastwife, of bondslaves taken up and bought for money against these wars, fight with "thole enemies, as well as they have done, and by our fight stie, whether we can regain our ena largement and liberry. Wilyon your felf, O Marcellus, make tryal of us, and of our valour, by Sea,

"by Land, in pitched field, and battel ranged or in giving affault and winning of walled Towns? It "Put us to it, and sparenot. The hardest adventures, the most painful and dangerous enterpries, for are they which we require most gladly: that we may have that betimes, and at once, which we should have come unto at Canke: teeing that all the time we have lived fine that been deslined to our ignoming and disprace.

At the words they lell down profitate at Marcellus his feet. Marcellus answered them, that he had neither power of himself, nor commission otherwise, to content them, and satisfie their request. Howbeirs, write to the Senat he would: and according as the LL. should give advice and direction, so he would do and not fail. These letters (as I said before) were trought to the Consuls, and by them read in the Senat-house. And after deliberate consultation about their contents, the Senat passed this decree: That so concerning those similaters, who had for sakentheir tellows sighting before Cana, the Senat saw no reason, why they should be put intust any more with the affairs of the Common-wealth: but if M. Claudius the Procombit thought it good otherwise, he might do according to that which he judged convenient, and to stand with his own credit, and the safety of the State. Provided alwayes, that not one of them be dispersed with and freed from service or charge of souldiery: nor rewarded with any military gift in testimony and token of his valour: nor yet reduced home again into Italy, so long as the enemy made abode

After this, the Pretor for the City, by vertue of a decree from the Senat, and an act of the Commons, affembled the people rogether. In which Session were created five Commissioners & called Quinqueviri, for the reedifying and repairing of the turrets and the walls: Likewile two other fraternities of Triumvirs; the one for taking an inventary of all facred things, and to fen and note all offerings and oblations: the other for reedifying the Temples of Fortune and dame Matuia, within the gate Carmentain, and likewise of Spes without the gate, which the year past were confumed by fire: Great and fearful tempells hapned this year. On the Alban mount it rained flones continually for two dayes. Many places were blaffed and imitten with lightning from Heaven; and namely, two Chappels in the Capitol, and the Rampier about the campard fort above Sueffula in divers places thereof: and two watchmen in their Sentinels firiken flark dead. The wall and certain turrets thereon at Cumes, not only imitten but also shaken down and overthrown with lightnings and thunder-boits. At Reate there was feen an huge flone to flieto, and fro in the air. The fun also appeared more red than it useth to be, and like to bloud. In regard of these prodicious fights, there was a solemn Procession and supplication all one day; and the Confuls for certain dayes together, attended why upon Divine fervice of the Gods: and the Novendial Sacrifices were devoutly celebrated nine dayes together.

Now whereas a long time already both Annibal hoped, and the Romans also suspected that the Tarentins would revolt: there fell out between, an occurrence and outward accident, which halfned it the rather. There was one Phileas a Tarentine, who having abode long at Reme under colour of an Embassador leger, a busy headed man, and of an unquiet spirit, one that of all things could not away with rest and peace, in which so long as he lived he thought every day a year, and that now he was waxen old and aged therein found means to have accels unto the holitages of the Tarentins. Kept they were in the Cloic belonging to the Temple of Liberty, with the less attendance and careful eye because it was expedient and good neither for themselves, nor for their City, to make an escape, and deceive the Romans. These hostages he had oftentimes sollicited and perswaded by much talk and many reasons, and at length having bribed and compted two fextons and warders of the faid Temple, he trained them forth in the evening out from the place where they were in fate cust ody: and when he had accompanied them onward on the way as a guide, and directed them how to pais secretly, he fled himself and they together. By day break the next morning they were missed, and their escape was noised throughout the City Whereupon, men were sent out after them from all parts, to setch them in again: who having overtaken them at Turracina, laid hold of them, and brought them back to Rome: wherein the N Comitium, they were, by the content of the people, beaten with rods, and then thrown down headlong from the cliff Tarpeia.

The cruel tigor of this publishment, caused much anger; and provoked two of the noblet and most famous Grecian Cities in Italy to indignation, not only in publick generally, but also inquired to famous Grecian Cities in Italy to indignation, not only in publick generally, but also inquired to them who were thus fouly and shamefully put to death. Amongst whom there were beet thirteen noble Gentlemen of Taventum, conspired together and the chief of them were Nivard Philaments. These conspirators before they would fit ard enter into any action, thought bette of speak and confer with Annibal sistem and to having gone forth of the City, under a pretence if they went to the chace a huming, by night they came unto him. But when they drew neer unso, the camp, the rest hid themselves within a wood neer unto the high way: Nice and Philament only went forward to the watch, and there being taken (as they requested themselves) were brought before Annibal. Who when they had delivered unto him their complot and upon what because the control into that designment they were highly commer ded, and promised greatewards, and willed and charged by him, that to the intent they might bear their control man hand, how they ever went out of the City to feeth in tome booties, they should drive afore them into the City, certain cattel of the Carthoginians, which were pur out to passure and seeding

a and herewith gave them his word to do it fafely, and without any impeachment and refiftance whenfoever. Thus thefe youg Gentlemen were feen to bring in good ftore of cattell: and as they were known to make this adventure the fecond time and oftner ftill, men marvailed the leffe at thematter, and suspected nothing. Now upon a new parling and communication with Annibal, they covenanted with him upon his faithful promise in these terms. Imprimis, for the Tarentins themselves, to enjoy freely their Lands and goods, and live under their own laws. Item, to pay no pension nor tribute unto Annibal, nor be forced to receive a garrison against their wills, And last of all, to berray thegarrison souldiers of the Romans, and all their fortresses and places of frength deliver up into the hands of the Carthaginians. When these conditions and capitulations B were agreed upon, then Philomenes nied much oftner to go forth and come in again in the night: and as he was known to be a great hunter, and much delighted in that exercise, he had his hounds following him hard at his heels, and all other furniture about him fit for huntimen: and lightly ever he took some wild beast or other with his hounds, or elegor something from the enemy, that of purpole lay ready for his hands: and alwayes as he brought home ought with him, he would bestow it either upon the Captain of the Roman garrison, or deal it among the warders of gates, And they all, verily believed and were perswaded, that his going out and in thus, most by night, was only for fear of the enemies. Now, when he had used this fo accustomably that he had made it an ordinary practife, in so much, that at what time of the night so ever he had but once lured or whiftled, the gate was fireight fer open for him: then Annibal thought it time, to put the C plot above said in execution. Three dayes journey he was off; Where became he would have men the leffe marvail, why he kept a standing camp to long still in one place he seigned and made himselffick. The Romans also, that lay in garrilon at Ta entum gave over to impect his long abode and leaguering there. But after that he was determined and resolved to advance toward Torenrum, he picked out ten thousand foot and horsemen together, whom he supposed for nimble bodies, swift footmanship, and lightness of armor, to be most meet for expedicion; and with them at the fourth watch of the night, he marched forward with his emigns. And having fent our afore-hand fourfcore Numidian light Horses, he commanded them, to ride about and it our all the wayes on every fide, and to cast their eye to espie and discover a lithe coasts, that no country people a far off might defery and view the army on foot, but they thould be feen: and withal to bring in, asmany as were gone before, and kill all them they met and encountred: to the end that the Pealants there inhabiting, might think they were Theeves and Robbers, rather than the vanteurriers and fore-riders of an army. Himself in person marching with great speed and celerity,pitched his camp almost 15 miles from Tarentum. Neither would be there, be known unto his men of his purpose, nor tell them whither they should go: only he called his souldiers together, and charged them to hold on the direct way, and not suffer any one to turn aside, nor in the march go out of his rank or file: and above all things, to be ready for to receive their charge and commandment from their Captains, and do nothing without their warrant and commission. As for himself, he would when he saw his time, let them know his mind, and what the service was that he would have done. And about the same very hour and instant, news came as far as Tarentum that E some sew Numidian Horsemen sorraged the country, and had put the villagers in great fright all about. At which tidings, the Captain of the Roman garrison was no more moved, nor made any other half, but only gave order, that some of the Horiemen the next morning by day light should ride forth, to keep the enemy from farther excursions. In the mean time, they that had this charge, bare themselves so carelessy in providing themselves to execute that which they were commanded, that contrary-wife, they took those outrodes of the Numidians for a good argument, That Annibal with his army was not dislodged, but abode still in leaguer where he lay first. Annibal when it was once dark and dead night, began to set forward. Ph. Innenes was there ready to be his guide, loden with his game hunted as his manner was. The rest of his conspiracy waited their time to execute their several charges, as it was agreed among them. Now it was ordred between them afore, that Philomenes coming in at the ulual little wicket, with his venifon that he had hunted, should bring in with him some armed men: and Annibal on another part, come to the gate called Temenia, which looked toward the East, and stood on the Land side of the City, a good way within the wall, as it were in a nook. When Annibal approached the faid gate, he made a fire in token that he was come (as it was devised between them before) and it flamed forth and gwea shining light. The like did Nico again. Then the fires on both sides were put out, that they made no more blaze. And Annibal in great and still silence, led his army close to the gate. Nico came fuddainly at unawares upon the watchmen fast asleep killed them in their beds, and opened that gate. Annibal entred with his Regiment of footmen, and commanded the cavalry to stay behind, to the end they might have liberty of open ground to ride, whitherfoever there was need, G and as occasion required. Now by this time, Philamenes also was come neer to that little gate on the other fide, where he used to make his egress and ingress to and fro. And when he had raised the watchman with his voyce fo wel known and with his whiftle wherewith now he was familiarly acquainted, & faid withal, that he was troubled with rugging and lugging of a foul & heavy beaft: therewith the wicket was let open. Two lufty fellows there were carrying in the wild bore between them, and he himself followed with one of the huntimen, lightly & nimbly appointed, and whiles the watchman his eye was upon the two porters that carried the beaft, wondring at the bigness of the bore, and took no heed to himself, Nicon, throft him through with his spear. Then Qq 2

tred in after them, about thirty men armed, who killed the rest of the watch, and brakedown the great gates withal: and immediatly there entred the companies with banner displayed; and fo, forth from thence they were conducted and brought to the market place, without making any noise, and there joyned themselves to Annibal. Then Annibal divided two thousand Gaule into three Regiments, whom he fent into fundry parts of the City : and gave order to the Tarentins and the Affricans, to get possession of the most principal and populous places of the City;and when the cry and shout was once up, to kill all the Romans whereloever, and to spate the Townimen. But to the end that this might be orderly done, he gave direction to the yong Gentlemen aforesaid of Tarentum, that so soon as they espied a far off, any of their own Citizens and Country-men, they should bid them be quiet and still, to hold their peace, to be ofgood cheer and fear nothing. By which time, they began to let up a shout and cry, as menule todo in a City taken by affault, but what the matter should be, no man of the Town or garrison could certainly tell. For the Tarentin inhabitants supposed verily, that the Roman souldiers of the garrison were risen up to fack the City: the Romans on the other side, thought that the Townsmen mutined, and they were in doubt of some traiterous practife. The Captain himself awakened and raised at the first tumult, escaped to the key, where he took a small Barge or whitry-boat. and fled to the Castle. The Trumpet also that founded from the Theatre, made the greater terror: for it was both a Roman Trumpet, provided aforehand for the purpose by those Traitors, and a Grecian blew it, one who had no skill; and to it was doubtful, both who he was that founded, and who they were that he gave fignal unto, When day appeared, and the Romons faw they armour of the Carthaginians and Gauls, then they wift well in what door the wind was, and how the World went: and the Greeks seeing the Romans lying along every where slain, were son aware that the City was taken by Annib. I. But after it was broad day light, and that the Romans who remained unkilled, were fled into the Castle, and the noise and hurliburly began by little and little to flake and give over: then Annibal commanded the Tarentins to be called to ageneral affembly, and to prejent themselves without arms. When they were all come together, but only those who with the Romans were fled for company into the Caltle, there to abide in h fortune as they; Annb. I spake kind y unto the Tarentins, gave them good and friendly words, rehearfed with great protestation what favors he had shewed to all their Citizens, whomhe had taken prisoners either at Throsymenus, or at Canna: and withal, after he had bitterly in eigh-I ed against the Lordly and proud rule of the Romans, he commanded every man to repair hometo his own house and set his own name upon his dores for that so many houses as had not the name written upon them of the Maller thereof, he would prefently upon found of Trumpet, command to be rifled. Over and befides, that if any one should hap to write his own name, and set it on the door or lodging house of a Roman (for he saw divers of their houses empty) he would take him for an enemy, and deal with him accordingly. After this speech ended, and the assembly dissolved, when the doors were marked with their titles and interiptions aforefaid, whereby the houses of friends and enemies were known diffinctly one from another: the fignal was given by found of Trumpet: and then there was running every where from all parts to ranfack the lodgings of the Romans. And some prety sprinkling of pillage they met withal. The next day after he advanceda- M gainst the Castle to assault it, which after he saw impregnable and not possible to be won, either by forcible affanit, or by artificial devices of fabricks and engins, by reason that both the Sea came to it, wherewith the greatet part therof was compafied, in manner of a demy lland, and also fortified befides on another part with exceeding high and fleep rocks : and withal, fenced from the City with a strong walk and deep ditch: therefore, because he would neither let nor hinder himself from atchieving greater affairs, whiles he was carefully bufied onely about defending the Tarentins nor yet leave them without a strong guard, for fear lest the Romans from out of the Caste, might at their pleasure come upon them, he determined to raise a rampiar for a partition between the Cafile and the City, for their defence against the said garrison. And he was not out of hope, but that when the Romans should offer to issue forth to hinder the said work, they might also be N fought withal: and in case they adventured rashly to run on, and engage themselves too far, they might be cut off in their heat, & the forces of the garrison might be so diminished & abated by some great flaughter & execution, that the Tarentins of themselves should be able with ease to defend their City against them. The said work was not so soon begun, but the Romans all of a suddains set open the Cattle gate fallied forth & charged upon the pioners as they were labouring about their belwark. The guard that attended for the defence of the workmen, and flood before their work, feil off and suffered themselves to be put back, to the end that the enemies upon their first success should be more adventurous: supposing that the further they gave ground, the more of the obse would follow after and chase them. Which being perceived, the Carthaginians whom Annibalish kept close for this purpose, and had in readiness very wel appointed, rose out of all parts, and made () head again. Neither were the Romans able to abide their forcible violence. And flie they could not in multitudes by occasion that the straightness of the place would give no leave: and besides, many things lay in their way: partly, the work that was begun, and partly, other provision of futte brought for the same, which mightily hindred and impeached them. Most of themsell headlong in to the trench : and to be short, more perished in their flight, than were killed in the fight. After this the fortification went in and agair, and none durst venture to hinder it. So he cast a mighty deep dirch, & raised an high rampier within it. Also behind it, a prety distance off, he went in hand

At the build a mure or wall to it, in the very same quarter; that they might be able even without any guid at all, or strength of men, to defend themselves against the Romans. Howbeit, he left them an indifferent band of souldiers, which might withal help out somewhat in making of the wall. Himself then departed with the rest of his army as far as the River G-lessels (five miles off from the City) and there encamped. From which standing camp, he came back once again to survey the work: and finding that it went better forward than he looked for, he began to conceive some good hope that the citadel also might be won by assure, for why it was not defended strely by situation on high ground, as others are, but seated on a plain, and divided from the City, by a wall only and a ditch. Now when as it began to be assailed with sabricks, and artillery devised of all giorts, there happed a new supply to be sent from Metapparture to aid the garrison: whereby the Romans took heart unto them, in so much as in the night time of a suddain, and before they were looked for, they set upon the fabricks and ordinance of the enemies planted thereupon: some they sall down and overthrew, others, they fired and contumed. And there anend of Annibal his assail of the Castle from that side.

The only hope behind now, was in continual fiege: and yet that hope promifed no great effeet, because they that held the Castle, had the Sea free at their command, all that side, whereas the faid fort (standing as it were in an half Island) overlooketh the mouth of the haven and the City contrary-wife, was wholly feeluded from al entercourse of passage and commodities coming in by Sea, and liker were they that belieged the fortrels, to feel the want and fearcity of victu-Cals than those that were besieged within it. Then Annibal after he had called together the principal citizens of Tarentum, laid open unto them all, the present difficulties, faying; "That he "neither faw any way to win by force the Castle to strong and sortified as it was, nor had any "hope at all to gain it by fiege, fo long as the enemies were Lords of the Sea. But if they had "flips once, whereby they might hinder and flay the coming in of their victuals and other "commodities, the enemies immediatly would either quit the peece, or yeeld themselves. The "Tarentins held well with that, and approved the device. But (fay they) he that giveth us that "counsel, must also affoord us means to effect the same. For the Carthaginian thips if they were "fent for, and fer out of Sicily might well do the feat: mary, as for our own which lie shut up "as it were, within a little creek and bay, confidering, that the enemy keepeth the mouth and en-"try of the haven, how is it possible that they should get out from their harbour into the open "Sea, and pifs without danger? Pafs (quoth he?) Pafs they Thall, make no doubt of that "Many things, I tell you, confidered in their own nature are cumber ome and difficult, but by " pollicy and wit of man are easily welded and wrought with a sleight. Ye have a City here leated "upon a plain and champain ground, the wayes answering to every side of it are even, large, and broad enough, yea, and open to all quarters. I will chute that way which croffeth the midft of "the City, and passeth along to the haven and the Sea, and so will carry and transport the ships "upon wains, with no great ado and trouble. And so, both the Sea shall be outs clear, which "now the enemies keep, and also we shall befrege the Castle round, as well by Sea as by Land's "nay, more than that, within short time we shall either enter it, being abandoned of the ene-E " mies, or else be masters both of it and them together.

Their words not only put them in good hope, that the enterprife would be effected, but also fet them in a wonderful good conceit and admiration of the Captain himiels. Then out of hand, all the wains and carts were taken up from all places as many as could be had, and were put together, and coupled one to another. Divers cranes and other instruments were set to, for to draw up the ships to Land the way made plain and level, that the carts might go more easily, and pais away with less trouble and more expedition. After this they got together draught oxen.cart jades and other labouring beasts, yea, and men also for to draw: and thus the work was lustily begun, insometh, as within sew dayes; the fleet well rigged, appointed, and dressed, was brought about the Cassle, and rid at anchor even in the avenue & entry of the haven. In these terms stood Tarentum, when Annibas left it, and returned back to his wintering harbours. But authors write diversly of this revolt of Tarentum, whether it happned the year past, or at this present. But the greater number of them, and those that lived neerer to that time, when the remembrance of these matters was fresh, affirin that it was this very year.

At Rome, the Confuls and Pretors both remained fill, until the *fifth day before the Calends of May, by occasion of the Latin boly-dayes, upon which day, when they had performed a folemn factifice, with all complements thereto belonging, on the Alban Hill, they departed every one to his several charge and Province. After this, there crept into the minds of men a new scruppliosity of conscience upon certain prophetical verses of one Mattins, a noble and famous Prophet in times path. Now, by reason that in the year before, there was diligent serch and inquisition made, for such books of Foriume, according to a decree granted out of the Senat, those verses came to light, and to the hands of Mi. Emplius Pretor of the City, who sat upon that commission. And he immediately gave them to Sulla the new Pretor. Of two Propheses of Martins, the one, which afterwards caried the greater authority with it; by reason of the event, that happed so right, and declared it so spidently, caused the other also, whereof the time was not yet come, to be of credit and believed. The former contained a Prediction of the overthrow at Ganne, in thee or such like words:

From Trojane line, O Romane once descended, Flie Canna River, neer to Canna Town : Lest strangers born, who have thy death intended, Force thee to fight on Diomede his down. But warning mine, thou wilt not rest upon, Until with bloud thou first do fill the plain; And then to Sea from fruitful Land, anon Thy men hall down the stream by thou fands flain. Thy flesh must bait the fish in Ocean deep, And lure the foules that flie from high to prey, And feed wildbeafts, on earth below that keep. Mark well my words. Jove thus metaught to fay.

* The fame that Aufidus.

And they who had been fouldiers, and served in those wars, knew as perfectly Diomedes his plains, and the River * Canna, as they did the very defeat it felf, and loffe at Canna. Then was the other Prophefy likewife read, which was the darker of the twain: not only because future things are more uncertain, than those which are past already; but also by reason of the kind of writing, which was more obscure and intricate, in these terms:

* Apollo is called in Homer llia. a. Ekeboafar off.

If enemies ye would expely if botch and plaguie fore * Sent from a far, ye would drive forth, and vexed be no more; To Phobus (Romans) I advise, ye vow, from year to year To let forth playes in folomn wife, with mirth and merry chear, From publick flock, the people must, part of the charge disburse: The rest shall ye, for you and yours, defray with privat purse. The soveraign Pretor must procure these games to be persorm'd, Who fits in place, mens pleas to hear, and fee all wrongs reform'd. Then (hall the ten Decemvirs hight, the Greekish rites ob erve, In flaying beafts for facrifice, and nothing from them swerve. If all be done accordingly, your joy shall are increase, Your State shall daily grow in wealth, and fruits of bleffed peace. For God Apollo will you fave, he will your foes destroy, Who at their pleasure wast your fields, and work you much annoy,

. For the explanation and expiation both, of this prophetie, they took one whole day. And the morrow after, there passed a decree from the Senate, That the Decemvirs should perule and look into the books of Sibylla, about the exhibiting of those faid games, in the honour of Apollo, and celebrating likewise of the sacrifices. And when all was perused, and relation made before the Senat : the Lords made an Act, and fet down an order ; First, to vow and set forth seems pa-Rimes accordingly, to the honour of Apollo. Item, After the Games were done and finished to allow the Pretor twelvethouland Affes, toward the expenses of the divine service, and two greater beafts for facrifice. There passed also another Act of the Senat, That the Decemvirs should celebrate divine service, and sacrifice after the observance and rites of the Grecians; and offerupon the Alar these beasts, to wit, an Ox with guilded horns, and two white semal Goats, with guilded horns likewise, for Don Apello: and a Cow with horns, in like manner guilded, for Danc Latona. The Pretor, when he was to represent the Games within the Circus Maximus, gave commandment, and made proclamation, That the people, during the time of those solemnites, should contribute money, for an offering to Apollo, every man according to his ability, and as he N might well spare. This is the beginning of the Apollinare Games and Playes exhibited fortoobtein victory, and not for to escape some plague or pestilence, as most men suppose. And when they were celebrated, the people food to behold and look on, adorned with garlands upon their heads, and the dames and matrons of the City went in procession, and made supplications. Every mans doore was fet open, and they feafted and made good chear generally through the City in the open street; and a high holyday this was, solemnited with all kind of ceremonies that could be

... But to return again to Annibal, who was about Turentum; and both Confuls remaining in Samnium, but ready, as it feemed, to befiege Capua: it fell out, that the Campans already were de firefied with hunger and famine, (a calamity that usually followeth long and continual fiege) and 0 the reason was, because the armies of the Romans had impeached and hindred their seednesse. Therefore they dispatched Embassadors to Annibal, beforehing him, that he would take order for grain to be brought into Capua, from all parts neer adjoyning, before that the Confuls were come abroad with their legions into their territory, and all the wayes beler, and passages stopped by the guards and companies of the enemies. Whereupon, Annibal gave direction to Hamiltonian that he should remove out of the country of the Brutii, and passe over with his forces into Campania, and endeavour so, that the Campans might be provided of sufficient store of com. Then

Hanno dislodged anon, and departed with all his power out of the * Brutians countrey, purposing + abrusqua. to avoid the leaguer of his enemies, and namely the Coniuls, who lay in Samnium: and when he approached neer to * Benevenum, he pitched his Tens three miles from the City it felf, upon a * Benevent, or high ground. After which, he commanded, that the corn flould be brought to him into his Commanded Cacamp, out of all the affociat and confederat Cities thereabout, into which it had been carried in lonia. the fummer afore; and allowed a good guard for the lafe convoythereof. After this, he fent a messenger to Capua, to give them notice, upon what day they should attend, and be in readinesse to receive their corn; and against the time, provide out of the countrey for the carriage, carts, wains, and draught-beafts, and pack-hories of all forts. But the Campans, like as they carried themselves in all things else, idly and negligently, so in this they were very slack and retchless for they fent little above forty carres, and some few beafts for carriage besides. For which they had a check given them, and were rebuked by Hanno; because that hunger, which canset the very dumb beaft to bestir it self and make hard shifts, was not able to prick them forward to be more careful about their own business. So there was a farther day appointed for to fetch their corn, and to come more furnished and better provided for carriage. All this being reported to the men of Beneventum, with the circumstances and particulars, as it was, they addressed with all feed ten Embassadors to the Roman Consils, encamped then about Bonianum. Upon which intelligence given of the affairs at Capua, they took order, and agreed between themselves, that one of them should conduct an army into Campania. And Fulvius, who undertook that charge, marched by night to Beneventum, and put himielf within the walls of the Town. And there he was advertised by them that dwelt neer hand, That Hanno was gone out with part of his forces, for to purvey, corn; that there were 2000 carts come, with a rude and diforderly multitude befides of people, without armor; that all that they did was in hurry, in half, and great fear; and finally, that the camp was out of form and fashion, and all good military order clean gone, by reason of a rabble & multitude of country clowns, come out of those quarters, and entermingled amongst them. The Consul, I say, being enformed for certain by credible persons, of these things, gave his fouldiers warning to make ready against the next night ensuing, nothing but their enigns and weapons, for that they were to charge upon the camp of the Carthaginians. And fo they fet forward at whe relief of the fourth watch, leaving their packs and truffes with all their bag and baggage behind them at Beneventum: and prefenting themselves before the camp, somewhat before day, they rut them into such a bodily fear, and so terrified them, that if it had been pitched upon a plain ground, no doubt, it had been won at the first assault. But the height of the place, and their rampiers and fortifications befides, which could not possibly be entered upon, without climing upon the steep hill with much difficulty, were a defence unto it. By day light there was a lufty affault given, and a hot skirmish begun, but the Carthaginians not only defended and kept their rampier, but also (as having the vantage of the ground) they chased and thrutt the enemies back, as they mounted up the hill. Howbeir, resolute hardinesse overcame all hardness and difficulties what foever; For in diverse places at once they advanced as far as the banks and trenches; but it cost bloudy blows first, and the death of many a souldier. The Consul therefore Ecalling the Coronels and Marshals together, said, it were not amisse to give over that rash and heady attempt, and, as he thought, it were the safer course, for that day to retire the army to Beneventum, and on the morrow to encamp themselves assort the enemy, to the end, that neither the Campans might get forth, nor Hanno return and enter into the Town again. And that this might be the sooner effected, and with a great deal more ease, he would send for his Colleague allo with his army, and both of them jointly bend their forces that way. But these devices of the Captain general were foon dasht. For as he was about to found the retreat, the fouldiers with a loud voyce cried out, that they could not away with such faint Captains; they scorned to becommanded in so cold and slothful service; they would none of that: and so put the Consul out of his bent. It hapned, that next unto the gate entring into the enemies camp, there served a cohort or company of the Peligni, led by Captain Vibius, who caught the banner out of the beater his hand, and flung it over the rampier, and with that, fell to cutting himself and his company both, wishing a plague light upon him and them to, if the enemies went away with that banner: and therewith led himself the way, and brake first through the trench, and over the pallaided into their camp. Now by this time the Peligni fought within the rampier: and then Valerim Flaceus a Coronel of the third legion, from another fidefell to upbraid the Romans, and hit them in the teeth with their beaftly cowardice, for suffering their allies to have the honor of enting and taking the camp. Whereupon T. Pedanias (a centurion of the Regiment called Principes, and serving in the first place thereof) took likewise an ensign from him that carried it, and withal, Now shall, quoth he, this ensign, and this Centinere (meaning himself) presently be within the rampier of the enemies: let me see who date follow, and save it from being taken by the enemy. At first, his own band and company followed him hard at heels, as he clambred to get over the rampier, and then the whole legion came after likewife. By this time, the Conful also feing his fouldiers climbing over the rampier, changed his purpofe, and was of a clean other mind: and from calling and reclaming his fouldiers back, fell to exhort and encourage them, hewing in how great hazard and danger a right hardy and valiant cohort of allies were, and the whole Legion of Citizens befides. They all therefore fer to and every man did his beft; and not withflanding there was many a dart driven and javelin lanced, notwithflanding the enemies opposed their armor and bodies full against them yet they never stinted to assay every place, as well u high as low, until they were broken through, and gotten in. Many a man was hurt (ye may be fure) but yet even they that bled until they fainted, and were not able to fight any longer, carried this mind and strove withal, to die yet within the rampier of their enemies. Thus in the turning of an hand the camp was won, as eafily as if it had been pitched upon a plainand even ground and not fortified at all with trench and rampier. From this time now, there was no more fighting, but killing on all hands in that rumult and confusion of pell mell within the camp. Slain there were of enemies more than fix thousand, and above seven thousand taken prisoners, together with the Campan purveiors for corn, and all the provision of wains, carts, and laboning bealts. Besides, another huge booty was taken, which Ha: no when he went a foraging all abroad, t had raifed out of the country of the affociats of the people of Rome. Then the Conful after he had cast down all the fortifications of the camp, returned from thence to Beneventum. And there both the Confuls together (for Ap. Claudin also thither came after a few dayes) made sale of all the prizes and pillage, and divided the same. Vibius the Pelignian, and T. Pedanius a principal centurion of the third legion, by whole forward and fingular good fervice, the camp of the enemies was forced, were rewarded especially above the reit. Hanno then together with some few forragers whom by chance he had with him returned from Cominium Ceritum (whither the news came of the loffe of the camp) into the Bruerans country, more like one that fled in rout, then

The Campans allo having heard, as well of their own leftes as of their allies, fent Embaffador, mno Annibal, to certify him; "That both the Confuls were at Benevenum, that the war was within a dayes journey of Capua, and but a flep from the very gates and walls of the City; and "unlefs he made good haft to fuccour and refue them, Capua would fooner come under the obedience and fubjection of the enemies, than App did. And he was not to make fuch a red. Annibal promified that he would take cate for the good ellate of the Campans: and for the prefent he ientition thought Horiemen with the Embafface.

dors, as a guard to keep the country and territory from invation and spoil.

The Romans in this mean time, among other their affairs, neglected not the fafety of the Calle of Tarenum, and the garrison there beneged. For C. Servilius, Lieutenant, by order and authority of the Senat, was fent by P. Cornelius the Pretor into Hetraria, to purvey for comand to buy flore: who with certain ships laden therewith, arrived in the haven of Tarentum, passing even through the guards of the enemies. At whole coming, they that before whiles they had but small hope, were oftentimes by way of parly moved by the enemies to go to the contrary fide, now themselves began to periwade and sollicit the enemy to come unto them. And the earriforfinely was firong enough, confidering that the fouldiers which lay at Metapontum, were drawnfrom thence to the defence and keeping of the Castle of Tarentum. And therefore the Metapontins, so foon as they were delivered of the fear whereby they were kept and held in as with a bit, revolted unto Annibal. Semblably did the Thurins allo, who inhabited the same tract by the Seafide. They were moved and periwaded thereto, not fo much by the rebellion of the Tarentins and Metapontins, with whom they were linked in kindred, and joyned neer in bloud (over and befides that they were descended as well as they out of Achaia) as with anger toward the Roman for the hostages lately by them killed. Their friends therefore and kinsfolk dispatched letters and mediengers into Hanno and Mago (who were in the country of the Brutii neer at hand) offering to deliver the City into their hands, if they brought their power and prefented it before their wails. Now was there one M. Atinius, Captain there over a small garrison, whom they improfed might be eafily drawn forth of the Town to make some rash and inconsiderat skirmish, pressming not so much upon his own souldiers (who were but an handful) as upon the youth and som of the Thurians, whom he had of purpose enrolled into bands and companies, and furnished with armor against the like occasions of service. The Carthaginian Captains afore named, had divided all their forces between them in two parts, and were entred into the territory of Thuri: and Hanno with his Regiment of footmen, advanced with banners displayed before the City: Mago with the Horsemen, staid behind close among the Hills, over-against the Town, and there lay fecretly in ambush. Atinius then, who by his espials was enformed only of the squadrons of footmen, came forth with his forces into the field, ignorant (God wor) both of the falshood and treason of the Townsmen, and also of the covert trains and ambushment of the enemies. The skirmish of sootmen was exceeding saint and cold, whiles the Romans being but sew, sought in the vanguard: and the Thurins looked rather when the skirmish should end, than made any ball to fight themselves and help: and withal, the squadrons of the Carthaginians gave ground for the nonce, to train the enemy as far as the fide of the Hill, under which, on the other fide that Horfemen lay in wait and were ambushed. And thither they were not so soon come, but the Horsemen made hast to shew themselves, with a great outcry, and presently put to slight theraw and disordered company and multitude of the Thurins; who were not very fast and sound heart to them on whole fide they fought. The Romans, albeit they were environed round, while the footmen lay fill at them on the one fide, and the Horlemen charged them a-fresh on the other fide, yet they mainteined fight, and held out a long while: but at last, they likewise turned their

Aback and fled to the City. There the traitors and conspirators being gathered together on helps, so soons they had let in at the gates standing wide open, the companies of their own cincures: when they saw once the Romans running apace in disray toward the City, made a salfe datm, crying aloud that the Carthaginians were at hand, and that both enemies and friends together intermingled, would enter the City, unless they made better hast to shut the gates. So they excluded the Romans out, and gave them as a prey to be hewn in peeces by their enemies. Howelt, Atmiss with some sew, was received within the Town first, After this, there was some mutiny and diffention between the citizens, themselves, for a little while. Some were of mind to stand upon their guard and defend the Town: others were of opinion, to yeeld unto fortune of the time, and deliver it up to the victors hands. But in conclusion, fortune and bad counsel together, (as for the most part it falleth out) prevailed. And so, after they had brought Atmiss and his soldiers to the haven side, unto their ships for to be embarked, more upon good will that they bare to him for his mild and just government, and therefore were ready to save him, han for any regard at all they had of the Romans, they received the Carthaginians into the

The Confuls then led the legions from Beneventum into the territory of Capua, not only to make fooil and marte the corn, that was laid up already in flrong Towns against winter; but allo to assist lappas; supposing they should make their Confulship renowned unto posterity, by the destination of for ich and wealthy a City; and besides, do away that great dishonour and shameful blemish of the Empire of Rome, in suffering a City so neer unto them to continue now three years in rebellion, without revenge and condign punishment. But to the end that Benevenum should not be without a guard, and that against all suddin accidents and occurrences of war, in case Annitas should come to Capua, for to rescue and aid his allies, (which they made no doubt but he would do) there might be Horsemen to withstand his violence: they commanded T. Gracchus to come out of Lucania, with the cavality and light armed stoomen: and to take order and leave some other to govern the legions and the standing camp, for the guard and defence of those parts there.

Gracehus before he dislodged out of the Lucans country, hapned to have a fearful and prodigious token, as he offred facrifice. For after the facrifice was performed and accomplished, two Snakes came gliding out of a blind hole, no man knew how, to the entrails of the beaft, and fell to eat the Liver: and so soon as they were espied, suddainly glid out of fight and were no more ieen. Now, when as the bowel-pryers had given advice to kill a new facrifice, and to foon as the inwards were opened and laid foorth, to tend and look unto them more heedfully; the Snakes came again, as it is reported, the second and third time: and when they had once given as it were an affay, and tafted the Liver, they went cleer away without hurt and untouched. And albeit the Soothlayers aforesaid, had given an Item, and foretold, that this prodigious fight perteined properly unto the chief Captain and General, and warned him to take heed of some close persons and fecret practiles: yet his fatal destiny of death that hung over his head, could by no forecast and providence be altered and a voided. Now there was one Flavius a Lucane, the principal head of that bend and fide of the Lucans, which when the other faction revolted unto Annibal, took the Romans part; and having been by them chosen the Prætor, had continued in that place of Magifiracy a year already: this man all on a fuddain chanced his mind and affection, and feeking to wind and enter into the favour of Annibal, could not be content to revolt himself, and to draw with him the Lucans to rebellion; unless he made a league also and covenant with the enemies. and sealed it with the murder and bloud of his General: of him (I say) who being enterteined and lodged in his house, he purposed villanously to betray. He entred therefore into secret speech and conference with Mago, Governour over the Brutii, and having capitulated with him, under his faithful word and promise, That if he delivered the Roman General into his hands, the Lucans might live in freedom under their own Laws, in league and amity with the Carthaginians; he toldhim of a place into which he would bring Gracehus, with a small company and guard about him : willing Mago to put his foot and horie in arms, and in such a place aforehand, whereinhe might bestow closely and secretly a mighty number of men. When the place was well viewed and considered all about, they agreed upon a day, for putting this plot in practife. This done, flavius cometh to the Roman General Gracehus, and enformeth him that he had begun an enterprile of great consequence, for the accomplishment and full perfecting whereof, he needed the helping hand of Gracehus himself; "Namely, he had pertwaded with all the Prætors and Govemors, who in that universal and general trouble of all Italy, had revolted unto Annibal, for to teuten again into the league and friendship of the Romans: seeing that the Roman state and their Dominion, which by the overthrow at Canna was come in a manner to the lowest ebb, and saln into extream despair, flowed now again, and grew every day more than other, greater and mightier; whereas contrary-wife, the puissance of Annibal decayed much, and was wellneer come to nothing: besides, the Romans were men that might be appealed and reconciled again, especially the trespals being so long ago done and past: for never was there nation under the fun, more tractable, more exorable and ready to pardon a fault: and how often have they (to go no further for examples) forgiven the open Rebellion even of their fore-fathers and anceftors? These (quoth he) were my words unto them, and indeed, but my words. Mary they had rather hear Gracehus himself speak, and hear the same from out of his own mouth:

"they would more gladly talk with him in person, and take hold of his right hand, which as then " affured pawn of his faithful promife, he carieth alwayes with him wherefoever he goeth, and "they delire no more, I have therefore (faith he) appointed a convenient place of enterview and "conference: lying out of the way and forth or fight, but yet not far from the Romanscamp, "There the matter may be dispatched in sew words, and all the name and nation of the Lucans. " reduced under the obedience and alliance of the people of Rome. Gracehus inspecting no fraud nor harm neither in his words nor deeds, founding all to a great likelihood of f mplicity and truth in his con eit, departed out of the camp attended upon with his Sergeants, and guarded only with a cornet of Horsemen: and so by the guidance of his own host, in whose house he lodged, was plunged headlong within the danger of the ambush of his enemies; Who suddainly arose; and Plavins because he would put it out of doubt that he was a traiter, went to their fide and joyned with them. Then they let flie arrows, and shot darts against Gracehiu and his Horlemen on every fide. "Whereupon Gracehus alight from horseback, and commanded the rest to do the " fame, exhorting them, that the only thing which fortune now had left unto them, they would er grace and honour with vertue. For what remaineth else for us , (a small handful unto them) " nvironed as we are with a multitude of them, within a valley compafied about with hills and "woods, but present death? This only we are to retolve upon, Whether in this present amazedconess and heartless fear, we will as beafts suffer our throats to be cut without revenge again; or "turning wholly our timorous expectation and fuffering of death, into choler and conrage fight "adventuroufly and manfully, and bathing our hands in the bloud of our enemies, lofe our lives, and fall down dead, upon the weapons and bodies of them, lying gasping themselves under us "Ah! that Lucan, that fugitive rogue and rebel, that treacherous and falle traitor, see ye all layar him. Whole hap it will be, ere he die, to be his Priest, to sacrifice and fend him to the Devil, "he shall win an honourable prize, and find no small solace and comfort in his own

led by his hoft, a Lucan.

With these words, he wrapped his rich coat of arms about his left arme (for they had not brought forth with them so much as their shields) and charged with exceeding force pronthe enemies. The fight was far greater on their part than for the proportion and number of the men. The bodies of the Romans lay open most unto the shor, And thus overcharged on all sides from the higher places: as being in the valley subject to the volley of their darts, they were soon given ced through. When Gracehus was left naked alone, and his goard dead at his feet, the Cathaginians did what they could to toke him alive : but he having cloid among the enemics his good host and friend, that Lucan, ran among the thickest presse: where he was so fully bent to mikhid him, that they could not will nor choose but kill him outright, without they would have lost the lives of many other. He was not fo foon dead, but Mago fent him fireight wayes unto Annibal, and commanded that his body together with the knitches of rods (belonging to his Magifiracy) should be presented and shewed before the Tribunal seat of the General. And this is the true report of the end of Gracehus: to wit, that he let his life in the Lucan Land, about the plains which are called Veteres Campi. There be some that tell it otherwise, how he being accompanied with his Serjeants, and three ferving men his bondflaves, went out from the camp within the territory of Beneventum, neer unto the River * Calor, for to wash himself: where there chanted his enemies to lurk, and lye in wait among the willows and falows that grew by the bank fide, and so being unarmed and naked too, he was assaulted, where he defended himlelf as well as he could with flinging at them pible flones fuch as the River afforded and carried down with the stream, and to was flain. Others write, that by advice of the Bowel-pryers, he went out of the camp half a mile off, for to purge and expiate in some pure and clean place, those prodigious tokens above rehearfed: and there was befet and environed round about with two troops of Numidian Horsemen, who happed there to lie in ambush. See how variable and uncertain the same goeth, both in what place, and after what manner, this so noble and famous person cameby his death. Nay the very funeral and sepulture also of Gracehus, is diversly delivered. Some say he wish enterred by his own fouldiers within the Roman camp. Others give out and fay (and that is the more common report) that by the appointment of Annibal he was buried in the very entranced the Carthaginian leaguer; that there was a funeral fire made in solemn wise to burn hiscorps; that the whole army justed and ran at tilt and tornment in their compleat armor; that the Spiniards leaped and danced Morrice; and each nation according to their guife and manner performed fundry motions and exercises as well of their weapons, as of their bodies : yea, and that Annibel himself in proper person, with all honor of suneral pomp that might be devited, both in word and deed, solemnized the obsequies in the best maner. This say they that affirm the thing so have hapned in the Lucans country. But if a man should believe them, who record how he wis flain at the River Calor, then the enemies gat nothing of him but only his head. Which being 0 presented unto Annibal, he sent Carthalo immediatly with it into the Roman camp, untole, Cornelius the Treasurer or Questor: who there within the very camp performed the funerable the General, and both army and citizens of Beneventum together folemnized the same righthonourably.

The Confuls being entred into the territory of Campan, as they forraged all abroad, straging one from another, were by the Townsmen of Capua which sallied out, and by the Horsemend Mago, put in fear; whereupon in great fright and hast, they rallied the souldiers to their colouns

that were ranged over the Country: but before they could well embattail them, and fet them in array, they were discomfitted, and lost above a thousand and five hundred men. Upon which good faccefs, the enemies (as they are a nation by nature proud) began to be very lufty and exceeding audacious, infomuch, as they offered to skirmith fundry times with the Romans, and ever challenged them to fight, But that one battail, to unadvitedly and inconfiderately atchieved; made the Confuls more circumiped and wary afterward. Howbeit, one small occuffence h ned, which, as it encouraged and animated them again, to it abated the hearts, and danneed boldness of the other. For in war there is nothing (be it never fo little) but one time or other; it is the occasion of tome great consequence and importance. There was in the camp one T. Quintius Crifpinus, linked in special friendship and familiarity with Badius, a Citizen of Capra. Their acquaintance grew and encreased upon this occasion: This Badius upon a time, before the revolt of Capua, fell fick at Rome, and lying in Criftinus his house, was interally and kindly used. yea, and cenderly feen thro by him, during his fickness. This Badius having put himself forward before the standing guards, that warded at the gate of the Roman camp, willed, that Crispinus should be called out unto him. Which being told unto Crispinus, he supposed no otherwise of it, but that he should talk friendly and familiarly with him. For albeit both nations generally were at epmity, in regard of the publick State, yet the private right and band of hospitality, remained fill in force, and was not forgotten, and therefore he went out somewhat apart from the reft of his fellows. Now, when they were come in fight and interview one of the other. I challenge thee, O Criffine (quoth Badius) to combat : let us mount on Hor eback, and trye it out between,us two, without any other companion, whether of us is the better man at arms. To this Crispinus made answer again and taid, We want no enemies, neither you nor I, upon whom we may make proof of our manhood : as for me, if I met and encountred you in the very bartail, yet I would decline, avoid, and thift from you lett I thould defile and thain my hand in the murder and bloudshed of my guest and friend. And with this he turned from him, and went his way, But the Campane contrary-wife, upon these words, was the more eager with him, railing and rating at him for his effeminat cowardife and dallard inefs, letting flie at the harmless and innocent man, all spightful terms and reproachful language; which himself I wot (if he had his due) was well worthy of: calling him a friendly foe, and a kind enemy indeed, and finally charged him, that he made his excuse of sparing him, for friendship take, whom he knew he was not able to match in manhood and valour. But if (quoth he) thou thinkest, that by the breach of publick league and covenant, our private bands of autity and hospitality, are not yet enough broken in funder, then here I pronounce openly, in the hearing of two armies, That I Badius a Campane, renounce all hospitality with thee T. Quintius Grispinus a Roman, and so farewel all friendship for ever: I will, I say, have no more to do, way of acquaintance with thee, no fociety, no altiance, no hospitality will the guest have will at host, who in hostile manner is come to invade his native country, and to make assault upon the publish buildings and private houses thereof. And therefore, if thou be a man, meet me in the field, Cripinus drew back a long time, and was lost. to enter into the action, but at last his fellow Horsemen, serving in the same troop and corner with him, forced and periwaded him, not to fuffer that bragging Campane, thus to infult over him without revenge. Whereupon he made no more ado, nor any longer delay, but whiles he went unto the L. Generals to know their pleature, whether they would permit and license him, out of his order and rank, to fight with an enemy that challenged him, and gave him defrance. And having obtained leave, he buckled his armor about him took his weapon, mounted on Horseback; and calling upon Badius by name, bad him come forth it he durft to fing e fight. The Campane made noftay, and so with spear in rest, set spurs to, and they ran their Hories full carrier one at the other. Cristinus with his lance pierced Badius above his shield, through the lest thoulder, and therewith unhorsed hint, and when he was faln to the earth with the push, he alight himself from his horse, minding on foot to fall upon him as he lay along, and to to dispatch him outright. But Badius, before his enemy feifed upon him, left his rerguet behind and his horse, and by good footmanship recovered his own fellows. Crespinus then, all goodly to be seen with the spoils of his enemy, made shew of the horse and armor that he had won, and bearing up withal the bloudy point of his lance, was with much praise and great gratulation of the souldiers, brought honourably to the Confule, and presented before them. At whose hands he was both highly commended, and also liberally rewarded;

Annibal having dislodged out of the territory of Beneventum, and removed into Capua, Within three dayes after he was come thither, brought forth his forces into the field, making no doubt at all, but that, confidering the Campans in his absence, had but few dayes before sought fortunally, the Romans now would be so much leffe able to abide his royal army so often used to victory. And verily when the conflict was once begun; the Roman bettailens of the Infanty were much stronbled and diffrested, effectially with the file of allult of the Horsemen. who over harged and pelted them mightily with their darts and Javelins, until the fignal was given to their own Cavalry also, to set hard to, and charge the enemies with their horse. Now whilesthe men of arms were buly in fight on both fides, it hapned that the Regiment of Semproin [Gracebus lately flain] were descried marching a far off under the conduct of Cn. Cornelius the Treaturer, which put both parts in like fear, left they were some new and fresh enemies that advanced against them. So they sounded the retreat on either side, as if they had been agreed so to do, departed out of the field (as a man would fay) on even hand, and retired themselves unto their several holds: howbeit, the greater number was flain of Romans, upon the first violent charge given by the Horsemen. From thence, the Consuls intending to draw. Annihal ways from Capsa. Geparted sundry wayes, Fabruai into the territory of Camer, and Claudius into the Litera Country. The next day, when Annihal was advertised, that the Romans had abandoned their Capsa, and what they were gone into divers parts with their several armies; being at first uncertain whom to pursue, refolked at length to make after Appins, and so began to do. But after had once trained the enemy about to the place that he defired, he returned himself another way to Capsa. And Annihal happed also upon a new occasion presented, to have a good hand of his capmes in the focasts.

There was one M. Censenius, furnamed Penula, one of the chief Centurions of the Pilania fingular good Captain in that kind, as well in regard of his mighty and goodly body, as also of his brave mind, and valiant courage. This man having fested out his ordinary time required by Law, was by the means of P. Cornelius Sulla the Pretor, brought into the Senar-house, and became a Petitioner unto the LL. of the Councel, that he might have the leading of five thousand footmen: promising that within short time, by reason he was so well acquaimed with the nature and qualities of the enemy, and withal so much beaten in coasting those quarters, he would do fome great deed, and atchieve a piece of notable fervice: and look, by what cunning devices and ftratagems, both our leaders and our armies had been until that day, entrapped and over-raught, the very same would be use and practise against the enemy. He was not so vain and unadvised in making this offer, but they were as tottish and foolish again in taking him at his word, and truffing him: as who would fay, A good Leader and Commander, and a front and hardy fouldier were all one. And so where as he demanded but five thousand, he had the charge given of eight thouland: whereof the one half were citizens, the other allies and confederats: and being them, he himfelf also gathered together out of the country as he marched, a good Companyof Voluntaries: info much as his power was doubled, by that time he came into the Lucans Country, where Annibal abode after that he had followed Claudius in vain, and to no effect. Buta man that had but half an eye. might fewwhat the fequel and event would be of the conflictetween General Annib. 1, and Centinere Centenius: between both armies also, the one of old beaten fouldiers used ever to victories, the other of raw novices and yong beginners, yea, many t of them taken up fuddainly in haft, and flenderly armed by the halfs. For fo foon as both hofts had confronted one another, and that on neither fide they dallied and shifted off, but minded presently to go to it & fights soon were they on both parts arranged in order of battail, And about the Romans had many defadvantages, yet they mainteined skirmish more than two hours and that is horly and couragiously, that they shrunk not one is to follow a stheir leader flood on for. But after that he once was strucken down and slain, which only in regard and remembrance of the former name (that he had won) of valour and prowed but also for sear of sisting shame and dishonor, in tase he should remain alive after the delete of his forces, whereof he was the only cause through his fool-hardy rashness, presented himself desperately upon the pikes of his enemies, where he might be fure of nothing but prefent death: and incontinently the Roman battailon was discomfitted and put to flight. And so hard bestead they were, in seeking wayes and means to escape (all the avenues were so laid and belet with the Horsemen) that of so agrees multitude, there were hardly one thousand saved, all the rest miscarried here and there, and came by their death one way or other.

In this mean time, $\tilde{C}_{opta}$ was freightly beleaguered by the Confuls, and they began to assult in most fortible manner great preparation there was of all things needful must finch an exploit, and with great diligence every thing provided and brought accordingly. Corn was conveighed to $Cassilinum$, and laid up there for flore: at the mouth of the River $Vallanting$ (where now the City standeth) was the sconce and castle fortisted (which $Fabius before $\frac{1}{2}\text{all builty}$) and as strong gartifion therein planted, to the end that both the Sea so neer, and the whole River also mightles at their command. Into these two fortresses shanding on the Sea side, as well the com which lately was sent out of $Sardinia, as also that which $Muting$ the Pretor had bought out of $Hatmis, was transported from the Port of $C\text{sia}$, whereby the army might be ferred plentifully all with season. Over and besides that losse received in the Lucans country, the army likewise of the $Vallanting$ (which during the life of $Crassiling$), had served truly and saithfully now a bandoned their colours; as if by the death of their Captain they had taken themselvessimy discharged from warfare.

Annial made no final account of Capua: for willing enough he was that his allies and frient there, hould not be for faken and left in for great per il wherein they flood; and yet upon that the tunat fuccels which happed unto him through the rashhe's of one Roman Captain, his singular inched to be doing with a there of them, and hoped to find some good opportunity and as taget to surprise and overthrow both Captain and army. Whereas therefore certain Apslian Behassitators advertised him, that Cn. Futories the Prepor, (who at the first in assaulting of certain the sind Applian, which had revolved unto Annibal, bare himself like a wife and prudent Captain now afterwards, upon his good fortune and happy speed in those affairs, whereby himself and bis fouldiers had made up their mouths and filled their hands well with booties and pillage) but himself and his men were grown so idle, and so difficilite, that no good government nor milital.

A discipline remained among them: hereupon Annibal having good experience; (as often heretofore, lo in this late initance but few dayes, path) in bow imail itead an army fer eth, when it is directed by an unskillful Leader, removed histories into Apulia. Now lay the Roman legions and Fulvin the Pretor, encamped about Herdonia. And when the news came thither that the enemier were on their journey coming toward them., hardly might the fouldiers be reclaimed and haved, but they would in all haft pluck up flandards and enfigns, and trenght wayes go into the field and bid them battail, without commission and commandement of their Presour. And no one thing more held them back, than the affured hope they hard, to do it at their pleasure whenfoever they would. Anubal the night following, having certain intelligence, that there was a tu-R mult in the camp, and that most of the fouldiers mightily importuned their General to put forth unto them the lignal of battail, and called earnethly unto him for to lead them out into the field, madefull account to meet with good opportunity and occasion, to have a fair day of hisenemies : and therefore he bestowed three thousand menlightly appointed, in divers villages theresbout, among the thick groves and buthes, and within the woods : who at a fign given them, should all at once upon a suddain, start up and leap forth of their lurking corners: and withal, he give order to Mago, with two thouland Horsemen or thereabout to keep all the wayes whereas he supposed they were most like to see and make escape. Having thus ordered all things beforehand in the night time; at the break of day he entred the field with his army, and embattailed himself in warlike manner. Fulvius for his part, was not behind; not induced so much upon any hope or conseit he had of good speed, as drawn and haled thereto through the rash enforcement and compulsion of his fouldiers. And therefore as they came forth to battail upon a head and heat, inconsideratly, so they were set in array as disorderly; even at the pleasure of the souldiers, according as they came forth and took up their tanks and files, as they lift themselves: and then again, as the toy took them in the head left the same, either upon wilfulness or fear. The first legiontogether with the left wing or cornet of Horlemen, were first marshalled : and the tquadrons drawn and firefehed out in a great length: notwithstanding the Knight-Marshals and Coronels ched out, that within, there was no firength nor power at all; and that the enemies wherefoever they should hap to charge, would break in upon them and go through. But no wholesome comfel for their owngood might be taken and confidered upon: nay, they would not so much as lend their ear, and give them the hearing. And by this time Annibal was in place, with another manner of army (you may be fure) and otherwise ordered and aranged. And therefore the Romans were not able to abide so much as the first shout and shock of the onset. The Captain himfelf (as foolish and heady as Centenius, but in courage and resolution far short of him) seeing how the world went, the field like to be loft, his fouldiers in fear and great perplexity; recovered his horse in great hast, and with some two hundred horsemen sled away and escaped: all the army befides, beaten back affront, befet behind flanked on the fides, and environed round, were so killed and hewn in pieces, that of eighteen thouland, there were not past two thouland saved. And the enemies besides were masters of the camp.

When these losses one in the neck of another were reported at Rome, the City was set in a great fit of forrow and sear for the while: but so long as the Consuls, in whom rested the main chance, had hitherto prospered and sped well, they were the lesse troubled at these by-blowes and cross misorrunes. Whereupon they addressed C. Lestprim and M. Mitsima is mediengers unto the Consuls, willing them to gather together with good care and diligence, those dispersed reliques and remainders of the two armies; also to have an eye and heedful regard unto them, that upon fear and desperation they yeelded not themselves to the enemy (as it happed after the Cambian overthiow:) and last of all, to make diligent search and seek out those Volones, or voluntary servitors, that had abandoned their ensigns and cassed themselves. The like charge was laid upon P. Corpessa, who had commission besides so levy more men. And he made proclamation throughout all market To was, sairs, and places of frequent refort. That those Volones should be found out all market To was, sairs, and places of frequent resort. That those Volones should be found out and brough; again to their own colours, to serve as a foretime. All these directions were executed and accomplished with exceeding great care and diligence.

Appine Classian the Conful, after he had made D. Junius Captain of the sconce erested upon the mouth of the River Pulturnus, and M. Aurelius Cotta Governour of Puteoli, with commitfion, That as any ships [with corn] from out of Herruria or Sardinia arrived there, they should immediatly fend the corn to the camp; went back himfelf to Capua: where he found Q. $F_k I$ vius his Colleague, transporting thither all provision from Casilinum, and making preparation for the affault of Capus. Thenboth Coff, jointly toggether befieged the City: and lent unto Claudius Nerothe Pretor, for to come unto them from Sueffula out of the old camp of Claudius. Who likewife leaving a small garriton there to defend the peece, with all his power and forces, Gescended into the plains before Capua. So there were three royal pavillions pitched for three IL. Generals about Capita: and three full armies in three fundry places began to fortifie, erect. ing ballions and forts in places not far diffant : yea, and to cast a rrench and raise a rampier round about the City, And in divers quarters at once, they skirmished with the men of Capaa, whenfoerer they came to hinder their fortifications, with fo good faccels, that the Townsmen were diven at last to keep within their gates and walls. But before that those rampiers and trem hes aborefaid were fully finafhed, and all ends brought together, there were Embaffadors difpatched unto Annibas, to complain in the name of the Capitans, as finding themselves grieved, that he had forfaken Capua, and in a manner delivered it into the Romans hands : and withall to befeech him earnestly, that now or never, he would refer e and incoor them, being not only besieged but also shut up and almost trenched about, as within a prilon. P. Cornelius likewisethe Pretor of the City of Rome, tent his letters unto the Confins, advising them before they had fully invested (apua round about, to make offer unto the Capuans of this liberty, That as many as would, might depart with bag and baggage out of Capua: and wholoever went forth beforethe *15. of March * Ides of March, should enjoy their freedome and all their goods and lands : but as many as after that day, either departed or tarried there ftill behind, should be reckoned no better than very ene. mies. These intimations were made known unto the Campans, but so light they fet by them, that they fell a railing, reviling, and menacing the Romans, with most reproachful taunts and spightful terms. Annibal was departed from Herdonia with his legions unto Tarentum, hoping either by I force or frand to gain the Castle. And seeing he little prevailed, he turned from thence and took his way to Brundusium, supposing that Town would be betrayed into his hands. Whiles he lay there also and lost his time in doing nothing the Embassadors of the Campans arrived and came unto him, with complaints and humble requelts both at once. Unto whom Annibal made this glorious and lordlike answer with a Majesty: Once already have I raised the siege and never will the Confuls. I trowabide my fecond coming. The Embassadors having received their dispatch, departed with this hope: but much ado they had, to put themselves within Capua, to enclosed round was it (by this time) with a double trench and a rampier. It fortuned at the very same instant, when Capua was thus streightly beleaguer'd, that the sege alfo and affault of Syracufe came to an end: helped forward and halfned by intelline treachery x and treason withal, as well as by force of army and valour of Captain abroad. For Marcellisin the beginning of the spring, doubtful in himself and hanging in suspence, whether to bend his whole forces toward Agrigentum against Himilco and Hip ocrates, or still proceed to befrege Syracuse: albeit he saw the City might not possibly be won either by forcible assault, (considering it was by situation both by Sea and Land invincible) or pining samine, by reason the passage in manner lay open to and tro between it and Carthage, for fafe transporting of all fort of victuals: yet because he would leave no stone unrolled, but try all wayes that could be deviled; he commanded certain revoits from the Syracufians (for there fided with the Romans some of the nobleft persons of the City, who at the time of the first backfliding from the Romans, because they misliked and abhorted all rebellion and change in the state, were driven out and banished the City) to deal with their bend and faction by way of conference to found the hearts (I fay) of inch as were their followers, and to follicit them to their part: and withal to affure them (upon their warrant) that if by their means Syracuse were betrayed, they should live in freedome, and enjoy their own Laws as they would themselves. But no opportunity could they espie for to parly and talk with them. For by reason that there were many suspected to entline and draw that way, every man had a careful eye and regard unto them, that there could be no treachery practifed, but foon it would be found out and detected. Yet a bond-fervant toward one of the banished persons abovesaid hapned to be let into the City, pretending that he was run away from the adverse part unto them: who hapning to meet with some few, began to move and broachsuch a matter. After which certain others lying close hidden under the nets in a fisher boat came about M by water to the camp of the Romans, and had conference and communication with those former fugitives and exiled men. And thus from time to time, this was practited in the fame manner, by divers and fundry persons, until at length they were a crew of fourfcore in all. Now when all things were concluded for the berraying of the City, neer upon the point of execution, it chanced that one detalus (a false brother among them, who took fouff that he was not specially trilled in the matter) disclosed the compiracy unto Epicides, and appeached the parties: whereupon they were all put to extream torture, and inferred death every one. When this plot would ipeed no better, they conceived hope another way, by a new occasion and occurrence that presently offred it felf. There chanced one Damasippus a Lacedemonian, sent from Syracusa, as a messenger to King Phil p for to be taken prisoner by the Roman armado. Now both Epicides was very defirous and N exceeding careful how to ransome him and also Marcellus was not unwilling for his part to grant the same. For even then the Romans beganto affect the friendship of the Ætolians, with which Nation the Lace demonians were confederat, and in league, So, when there should be commission ners and delegates fent on both fides to parle and treat about his redemption the most indifferent place for them to meet in, was at the key or wharf of * Trogili, fast by a turret which they call Galeagra. as being just in the midst between, and most convenient so both parties. It happed now, that as they had recourse oftentimes thither about this business. one of the Romans well viewed the wall neer by he counted the stones that appeared in the forefront of the wall and made estimate to himself of their quadrature and proportion; and withal, giving a guels as neer as he could of what height (by his reckoning) and measure the wall might be rand supposing it was a0 good deal lower than either he himself or others had alwayes before taken it to be and easy tobe fea'ed with Indders, even of a mean fize and middle fort, he relate th the matter and his concert of it to Marcelus. And in his opinion it was a thing not to be neglected, but to be thought upon. But for almuch as there was no accels unto that place by reason, that for the lowness therof, it was the more carefully guarded and defended, it was thought good to wait for some opportunity and advantage to help that difficulty. Which, as good hap was offered it felf prefently unto themby

A means of a fugitive: who gave them intelligence, that they held a folemn feast of Diana at that time within the City, and the same continued three dayes together: also he said that for want of other things, during this siege to make good chear withal, they spared for no wine, but made merry therewith in great plenty and abundance. For why? not only Epicides had bountifully bestowed wine upon the whole Commons, but also the great men of the City had in every ward and parish where they dwelt, allowed a proportion befides, of their own charges. When Marcellus heard this, he called unto him some few of his Colonels and knight Marshals, and conferred with them: and when they had forted out certain choice and elect Centurions and fouldiers, fit and fufficient men to adventure and execute to great a peece of fervice, and withal provided ladders B secretly ; to all the rest he commanded a watchword and warning to be given, That they should betimes take their refection of meat and repose of sleep, for that in the night they were to be employed in an expedition and action of service. After this, when he thought it was about the time, that they (as having featled all day long, and well filled their belies with meat, and their heads with wine) were gone to reft, and newly fallen found afteep, he commanded one enign or company of fouldiers, to cary ladders; and besides them, there were upon a thousand well armed and appointed, marching with filence and in thin ranks, brought thither to the place. When the formost without any stir or noise at all had scaled the top of the wall, others followed in their course. For the forward and resolute boldness of the former, was able to animate and encourage the relt, if they had been fals-hearted. By this time now, the thouland armed soldiers had seized C that part, when the rest of the ladders were set to: and upon more ladders still, they gat up to the wall in diverte places, upon a fignal given them from the gate Hexapyles. Unto which places the Romans were now come, and found no firring at all, but exceeding filence and defolation, for asmuch as a great fort of them had made good chearwithin the turrets, and either were fast asleep with drinking wine already, or elie were bibbing still, not withstanding their eyes were heavy, and their hearts afleep. And yet, some lew of them they took in their beds, and killed. Neer unto Hexaprlos there is a little wicker, which with great violence they began withal, to break it open. So as now, both from the wall (as was before appointed) they gave fignal by found of trumpet: and also from all patts they went not to workany more by stealth, but plainly and openly without diffimulation. For they were come already as far as Epipola, a place full of D watchmen and warders. And the enemies were to be terrified now and strucken into fear, and no longer to be dealt withal by craft and guile. And it fell out so indeed, that they were mightily scared. For they heard not so soon the sounding of the trumpets, and the shouting and outcry of them that were possessed of the walls and one part of the City, but the warders, thinking all was gone, some ran along upon the wall, others leapt from the walls, or else were born down headlong, with the press of others that were affrighted. And yet many there were, who were not ware at all of this mifery and extremity, both because generally they were all dead asleep, and also by reason that the City was so wide and large, that a thing felt and seen in some remote parts, reached not fireightwayes throughout, to all the reft. The gate Hexapples was broken down somewhat before day, at which Marcellus with all his power entred the City. He wakened them all, and E fet them to their business the made them take weapon in hand, and to help (what they could) a City in a manner wholly surprised and taken. Epicides made hast from the Island (which they themselves call Najos) with a company of fouldiers about him, making will account to drive them out again: as supposing that they were but some few, who through the negligence of the watchmen and warders were got over the wall: and ever as he met with any that were scared and in fear, he faid unto them eftfoons that they themselves made more ado, and every thing worse than there was cause, reporting all in greater measure and more searful manner than need was in very truth, But when he faw all places about * Epipola full of armed men, after fome finall volley of thot, * Some make and little skirmish with the enemy, (whereby he provoked them, rather than did any good else) is the fifth part he turned back again with his companies, and retired into Acradina, not feating so much the vio- of Syracuja. knce and multitude of the enemies, as left some intestine miss hief by this occasion might arise, and that he should find in this tumult and hurliburly, the gates of Acradina, and the Island shut again. him. Marcellus being entred within the walls, took his prospect from the higher places, and when he beheld under his eyes the most goodly and beautiful City of all others in those dayes, (by report) he wept and shed tears abundantly, parrly for joy that he had brought his purpose to good a pais, and partly in compation and remembrance of the ancient glory and renown of that City, He called to mind the navies of the Athenians by them lunk and drowned: he thought upon the utter overthrow of two puilfant armies, together with the loss of two most noble and famous Captains of theirs: moreover, there came into his memory fo many wars fought against the Carthaginians, with fo great peril and hazard: fo many and fo mighty Tytants and kings that raigned and kept their leat and royal court there and amongst the rest, he could not chuse but think of King Hiero, of fresh and famous memory, a Prince, who above all other gifts which his own Vertue and fortune had graced and endued him withal was recommended especially for his many favours and good turns done unto the people of Rome. When all these things presented themselves to his remembrance, with this cogitation besides, how all that beauty and glory within one hours face was ready to burn on a light fire, and to be confumed into affres: before that he advanced hisenings against Acradina, he sent before, those Syracusians who had conversed (as is a forefaid) among it the guards and garrifon of the Romans, to perswade the enemies with mild and gentle speech, yet, to yeeld the City. It so sell out, that the most part of them that warded the gates H and walls both, of Acradina, were certain fugitive revolts fled from the Romans, who had no hope at all, upon any condition what soever to be pardoned. These would juster none, either to approach the walls, or to parle and speak with any. And therefore Marcellus, after he saw that enterprise frustrate and disappointed, commanded to retire with the enfigns unto Euryalus. This Empalus is a little mount and fort, fituate in the utmost quarter of the City remote far from Sea, and commanding the high way that leadeth into the fields, and the middle parts and very heart of the whole Island; a place very commodious for the taking up and receipt of all victuals. The Captain of this hold was Philodemus an Argive, placed there by Epicides. Unto whom there was fent from Marcellus, Sofis, one of them that murdred the tyrant : and after long communication, I Sofis with crafty words abused by him, and colourably put off until another time, made relation unto Marcellus, that Philodemus had taken a farther day of respite and deliberation, But he put off fill from day to day, trifling out the time of purpole, until Hippocrates and Himileo might come with their forces and legions, making no doubt, but if he might receive them into his fortreis, the whole army of the Romans being now enclosed within the walls, should be overthrown and urterly defeated, Marcellus feeing that Euryalus was not delivered up, (and forced poffibly it could not be) encamped himself between Neapolis and Tyche (fo are two parts of the City named, and may for their bigness go well enough for two entire cities of themselves:) for fear, left if he were once entred into the populous and most inhabited places of the City his souldiers greedy of pillage, would not be kept together, but run loofely up and down to rifle. Thither came unto him from Tyche and Neapolis, Embaffadors and Orators, with olive branches adorned with latted veils and infules, humbly befeeching him to hold his hand from effusion of bloud, and firing the City, Marcellus calling his Councel about these their petitions, rather than demands, after mature deliberation, by general content of all, gave express and streight commandment to the souldiers, that no man should offer abuse or violence to the body of any free-born person whatsoever: as for all besides, his will and pleasure was it should be their booty. Now was the camp of Marcellus defended on both fides with housing in flead of a wall, and he bestowed a good corps de guardat the gates thereof, lying open over against the streets: lest when the souldiers ran to and from the City, the camp in the mean while might be assailed. Then upon the found of Trumpet the souldiers fell to their businels, ran into all parts, brake open dores, set all on a fearful hurry, but spilled ; no bloud: and they never gave over ranfacking and rifling, until they had cast out and camed away all the riches and goods, that had been a gathering a long time, during their wealthy and prosperous estate. Amid these stirs, Philodemus also seeing no hope of succours and rescue, after he had covenanted for his security, to return safe and without harm to Epicides, withdrew his garrison away with him out of the fort, and rendred it up to the Romans.

Now whiles every man was turned another way, and busied in that part of the City which was forced, Bomilear taking the advantage of one night, wherein the Roman fleet by reason of a violent tempest could not ride at anchor in the main Sea, gat forth of the haven of Syracuse with 35 fhips, and having Sea room, hoised up sails, and away he went with a mery gale of wind, leaving 4. behind for Epicides and the Syracusians: and after he had informed the Carthaginians in what M danger the flate of Syracufe flood, returned within few dayes with a fleet of a hundred fail, rewarded for his labor (as the report wenr) by Epicides, with many rich gifts, which the treasure of King Hiero paid for. Marcellus possessed now of the forces Euryalus, and having planted therea garrison, was well rid of one care yet: for he doubted, lest if a new power of enemies had been received behind his back into that fort, they would greatly have annoyed his men, enclosed now as they were, and encumbred within the walls. After this he belieged Acradina, and invested it round about, and fortified three leveral camps (in meet and convenient places) against it, hoping to shut them up into such streights, that they should be driven to extream scarcity and want of all things. Now when as for certain dayes, the guards of the one fide and the other had rested quiet, suddainly upon the arival of Hippocrates and N Himileo, they within began from all parts to fet freshly upon the Romans. For, first Hipportain (after he had encamped and well fortified himself fast by the great Key, and given a signal tothem that kept Acradina) affaulted the old camp of the Romans, where Crispinus lay with his guard for the desence thereof: then Epicides also sallied forth, and brake upon the Corps dequand of Marcellus: and withal, the Carthaginian fleet approached close to the strand that lieth between the City and the Roman camp, to hinder that Crispinus might have no aid sent unto him from Marcellus. And yet for all this ado, the enemies made a greater stir and tumultuous alarm, that any skirmish to speak of : for Crispinus not only gave Hippocrates the repulse, and drave him som the defences of his own camp, but also followed him in chace, as he fled fearfully in hast away: and Marcellus forced Epicides to take the City again, and get it over his head. So as now the following scemed very sufficiently provided and appointed against all dangers from thence forth, of their fuddain fallies and irruptions. Over and besides all these troubles, there hapned a common calamity unto both, the plage le ce in spa and pestilence: in such manner, as it might soon have withdrawn the minds, as well of the out part as of the other, from thinking any more of war. For, befides that it fell out to be the Autumn or harvest season of the year, the place it self by nature unwholsome, stinking and so rupt (but much more without the City than within) the extream and intolerable heat of the

A weather mightily distempered all their bodies generally, in the camps both the one and the other. At the first, by occasion of the diffemperature of the season, and corruption of the place. they both fell fick and died : but afterward by vifiting and tending one another that were infected, the disease grew catching and contagious, and so spred and increased more and more: in fuch manner, as either they that were faln tick perished for want of looking to and diligent atrendance; or if any came about them, to keep them and minister unto them, they were infected and endangered also as deeply as the other: so as every day a man could go no where, but either death, or corfes carried forth to their graves, were presented to his eyes: night and day in all places there was nothing heard but weeping, waiting, and piteous lamentation. In the end their R hearts were to hardned and made lavage again, by continual ulage to this milery, that not only they gave over to weep over the dead, and to accompany them unto their sepulchres with due mourning and doleful plaints but also to carry them forth and to inter them : to that the breathleffe bodies lay scattred all abroad on the ground in the fight of them, that looked every hour for the like miterable death themselves. The dead killed the sick : the sick insected the found, partly with fear, and partly with the corruption and pelliferous stench that came from their bodies. And because they would die rather upon the swords point, than of this maladie, some of them made offer to go alone among the armed guards of their very enemies, to be killed out of hand, and rid out of their milery. Howbeit, the plague was hotter byfar in the Carthaginian camp, than among the Romans, by reason of corrupt water, and much slaughter committed there, Candio long fiege about Syracufe. For of the enemies army, the Sicilians at the first, io foon as they law the fickness to spread commonly, and increase by reason of the corruption of the place, got themselves away, and stole every man home to the Cities neer adjoyning. But the Carthaginians were fain to flick by it flill, as having no place to retire themselves unto, and so, they together with their Generals themselves Hippocrates and Himileo, died all of them, and not one escaped. Marcellus when he saw this mortality grow thus hot, brought his people into the City, where the houses and shadowy places yeelded some good refreshing to the fick and weak bodies: howbeit, many also of the Roman army went of it, and turned up their heels. Thus when the Land-fouldiers of the Carthaginians were all gone and confumed of the plague, the Sicilians who had erved under Hippocrates, withdrew themselves into certain Towns, which were not n great, yet fure and firong, both by natural fituation, and also by firength of walls and other defences; the one of them three miles from Syracule, the other fifteen miles distant from the haven mouth: and thither they conveighed from out of their own cities adjoyning, all manner of vicituals, and ient abroad for aids of men.

In the mean while Bomile or fet fail once again with his fleet for Carthage, where he made relation of the flate of their confederars in such terms, that fill he fed them with some hope, That not only by their help they might be faved, but also that the Romans (notwithstanding they had in some fort forced and taken the City) might be surprised and taken there themselves: and in conclusion perswaded and prevailed so with them, that they granted not only to send with him a great number of hulks and caricks, laden with store of all things, but also to furnish him with E more ships of war, to encrease his Armado. Whereupon he departed from Carthage with 1 30 Gallies, and 70 ships of burden, and had forewinds good enough to set him over into Sicily. But thole winds kept him from doubling the point of the Cape Pachynus.

The tame and rumor first of Bomilear his coming, and then his delay above mens expectation, that checked it again, wrought diversly in the minds of the Romans and Syracusians, ministring one while feer, another while joy unto them both. Whereupon Epicides fearing left if the fame Easterly winds which then sheld, and were settled in that corner, should continue many dayes more, the Carthaginian navy would return again into Affrick, leaving the guard of Acradina to the Captains of the waged and mercenary fouldiers, failed to Bomilear, riding still with his fleet in the rode that looketh toward Affrick, and learing a conflict at Sea, not so much because he was inseriour to the enemies either inforce or number of ships (for he had many more than the Romans) but for that the winds flood more favourably to help the Roman Armado than his: howbeit, in the end he perswaded him to try he fortune of a battail at Sea. And Marcellus for his part, seeing both the Sicilian forces gather and assemble together from all parts of the Island, and understanding that the Carthaginian fleet was coming with great store of victuals: for fear left at any time whiles he was thut up within the enemies City, he should be affailed both by Sea and Land: albeit he was short of them in number of ships, yet determined to hinder Bomilear for arriving at Syracuse. Thus rid two armadaes of enemies affronting one another, about the head of Pachynus, ready to joyn battail, so soon as the calmness of the weather would give them leave to advance into the main and open Sea. Therefore when the East wind began to lie, G which for certain dayes had bluftred and raped, first Bomilear weighed anchor: and the vanguard of his Armado seemed to gather still into the deep, only because he might more easily gain the Cape and promontory aforesaid. But so soon as he saw the Romans ships make way toward him, (I wot not what suddain accident it was that affrighted him) he set up all his sails and sell off, into the main Sea: and after he had sent certain messengers to Heraclea, willing them for to fet again their hulks home into Affrick, himself coasted all along Sicily, and shaped his course for Tarentum. Epicides disappointed thus on a suddain, of so great hopes that he had, because he Would not return again to the fiege of a City, whereof a great part was lost already, saileth to

Agrigentum, there to abide and expect the event and small issue, rather than to shir himself and H trye any more, how to help them with any succour from thence.

Their things being reported in the camp of the Sicilians, to wit, that Epicides had quit Syrae cufe; that the Carthaginians had abandoned the whole Iland of Sicily, and in manner yeelded it again into the hands of the Romans: after they had founded first their minds who were believed. by talk and conference with them they fent Embaffadors unto Marcellus, to treat about conditions of furrendring the City. When they were grown in a manner to this point, without any fquaring or difference at ali, That the Romans should have the fignory all and wholly which belonged unto the Kings: and that, all the rest the Sicilians should enjoy, with liberty and their own proper Laws; the Embatiadors aforefaid called forth to a parley, those unto whom Epicider at his departure had committed the government of the affairs, and declared unto them, that as they were addressed Orators unto Marcelus, so they were from him sent unto the army of the Sicilians: that generally all, as well the beneged, as those who were without the danger of the fiege, should be comprized within the treaty, and abide one and the same fortune: and that neither the one fide nor the other should capitulate or enter into any covenant for themselves apart, without all the rest. Who being received and admitted, for to salute and speak unto their kinsfolk and friends, made them acquainted with the agreement and composition between Marcel-Ins and them : and so attenthey had presented unto them some good hope of their safety, they perswaded with them so far forth, as to joyn with them, and all together, for to set upon and affault the bodies of the Captains deputed by Ejicides, namely, Polycleius, Philifio, and one Epicides furnamed Sydus. When they were once made away and killed, they called the multitude together unto a general affembly: where they complained greatly of their poverty, and penury of all things (for which they were wont to murmur fecretly among themselves:) "And albeit " ye are diffressed (say they) with so many miseries and calamities, yet are ye not to blame for-"tune therefore, to long as it was in your own power and choice, either to be delivered from "them, or to endure them longer. As for the Romans (laid they) it was not hatred, but meet "love and charity, that moved them to come against Syracuse for to assault it. For when they "heard that the government of the state was usurped by Hippocrates and Epicides (the ministers " fire belonging to Annibal, and after to Hieronymus) then they began to lay siege unto it inten-"ding nor the overthrow and destruction of the City it felt, but to put down and depose the L " crueity rant that ruled the flate. Seeing then, that now Hipprorates is dead, Epicides excluded " from Sy ac fe his Deputies and Captains killed, and the Carthaginians driven out of all their 6. hold and poffession of Sicily, both by Land and Sea, what reason have the Romans, but tobe " willing and well content, that Syracufe (hould continue in fafety now as well as if Hiero him-" felf were living, the only mainteiner and observant upholder of the Roman amity? And there-"fore, if ought but well should happen, either to the City, or to the Citizens, ye may thankyour " felves and none elfe, for letting flip opportunity now offered, of reconciliation and attone-" ment with the Romans. Never look to have the like occasion hereaster, to that, which at this "instant is presented: if ye had the grace to see what a door is opened for you, to be delivered "from the yoke of most insolent and proud tyrants. This speech they gave ear unto with ex- M ceeding accord and general applause. But before that any Embassadors were nominated to be fent unto Marcellus, it was thought good that new Pretors should be created. Out of the number of which Pretors, there were Orators addressed unto Marcellus. And the principal manamong them, spake in this wise. " Neither we Syracusians (quoth he) O Marcellus, at the first re-"volted from you Romans, but Hieronymus, impious and wicked Prince as he was ; yet nothing " fo much hurtful to you as to us: nor afterwards, when peace was knit again upon the murder "of the tyrant. was it any citizen of Syracuse, but Hippocrates and Epicides (the Kings ight "hands and ministers, who oppressed and kept us under, with fear of one side, and with deceiva-"b'e fleights on another fide) that made the brack, and were the troublers and disturbers of this " peace. No: yet can any man come forth and fay truly, that ever we were at our own liberty, N " and enterteined not peace and amity with you. And now also I assure you, so soon as by the "mafface of the e, that held Spracufe intuch oppression and bondage, we began again to beout "own men and to have the law in our own hands; the first thing you see that we do, is this, to " come and prefent our felves unto you, to deliver up our armor and weapons, to yeeld our bo-"dies, our City, the walls, and all the strength thereof, and to refuse no condition, that it shall " piesse you Romans to impose upon us. As to your self, O noble Marcellus, the Godshave "given you the honour of conquett, over the most noble and beautiful city of all other in Greet; "Behold now, what memorable asts soever that we have at any time atchieved, either by Land " or Sea. all makes to the advancement of the glorious title and dignity of your triumph. See "you then, that another day it be not known by bare hear-lay and the trump of fame, how great "and mighty a Cit; you have won, but rather that it may fland ftill and remain for all pofferily " for a mark and worthy spectacle to behold: to the end, that who soever hereafter, shall refor "thither by Land. who oever shall arrive there by Sea, it may present unto them, both our Tio-" phees and worthy victories over the Athenians and Carthaginians; and also this of yours out "us the bravest conquest of all the rest. See (I say) that you leave for your house and family the City of Syracufe whole and found, to do homage and fealty ever bereafter, to the name and "linage of the Marcelli, and to hold of them as of their loveraign LL, in chief and in villenage.

A "That all the World may fee, that the late remembrance of Hieronymus, beareth no greater fireke "with the Romans, that the ancient name of King Hiero, a noble Prince of famous memory. "Much longer was he a friend, than the other an enemy. Hisgood deeds and many factour; ye "have tafted and felt with great contentment: the folly and madness of Hieronymus, hurt none "of you, but wrought his own confusion and overthrow. There was nothing but they might "have obteined at the Romans hands: all was cleer there, and no danger from thence. But a-"mong their own selves they were at more war: there was the peril, there was all the mitchief, "For the Roman rebels, who were run from them, doubting that they should be delivered over "into their hands, and not comprised within the terms of the composition and protection, drave R" the auxiliaries also that were waged souldiers into the same scruple and fear. They hastily there-"fore took arms, and first killed the Pretors: and afterwards, ran all about to massacre the Syra-" custans. Look whom they happed to meet, them they murdred in this surious fit of cholers "Whatloever came next to their hands, and lay handlome for them, they rifled. And because " for footh, they would not be without their leaders, they created fix provoits or Captains, that "three should govern Acradina, and other three Nasos. At the last, after the uprore was "appealed, the mercenary fouldiers aforelaid, followed the matter throughly by learth and "diligent inquiry, what were the capitulations indeed agreed upon with the Romans; and "then began the very truth to appear, namely, that their condition and the fugitives were far "different.

These Embassiadors in very good time returned from Marcellus, and certified them that they were caried away with a wrong furmise and false sulpition, and the Romans had no just cause to punish them. Now there was one of those three Provolts of Acradina, a Spaniard named Mericus. Unto him there was fent for the nonce among those of the retinue and train of the Embassadors aforefaid, one of the Spaniards, who were auxiliary fouldiers, ferring under the Romans: who finding Mericus alone without other company, gave him to understand especially above all "things, in what terms he had left Spain (and from thence he was newly come) namely, how the "Romans there were grown mighty, and held a great hand over them with their forces. And "that himsef, in case he had a mind to do some worthy deed, might soon rise, and be a great man "in his country : chuse whether he list to serve under the Romans, or return again into his own o "home, Contrary-wife, if he went on still in this course he had begun, and minded still to be "befieged, what long abiding place could be have there, that up as he was from Sea and Land? Mericus pondered well their reasons: and when it was agreed, that there should be addressed new Embassadors unto Marcellus, sent his own brother with them, who ty the self-same Spaniard was brought apart from all the rest unto Marcellus: and after he had a protection granted, he laid the plot, and ordered all the matter how it should be done, and so returned to Acredina. Then Mericus because he would withdraw mens minds from all suspition of treason, and that he intended nothing leffe, than to betray Acradina, gave it out, That he liked not, and would no more of this recourse, ever and anon, of Embassadors between; and therefore as he would admit of none to come from Marcellus, to he would fend no more to him. And to the end, that Eall the guards should be kept more diligently, he thought it good to divide conveniently among the Provofts, the quarters of the City, and affign to every one his ward by himlelf, and that each one should be bound to answer for the tase keeping of his own division, and for no more. Then all gave their conient to part accordingly, and to himself befel the charge of that quarter which reacheth from the fountain or well Arethufs, unto the mouth or entry of the great key or haven. And hereof he gave notice and intelligence to the Romans. Wheupon Marcellus cauled a great Hulk, laden with armed fouldiers, to be fattned by an haling rope unto a Gally of four course of oars, and so in the night by strength of oars to be rewed and drawn up after it into Acradina, and lindeth the souldiers over against the gate, that is neer to the sountain Arethusa. This being done about the relief of the fourth watch, Mericus received the fouldiers that were let ashore at the gate, according as before it was agreed. And Marcellus by the dawning of the day, with all his forces gave a Camifado upon the walls of Acradina, in fuch manner, that not only he turned thither unto his affault all those that kept Acradina, but also from Nasos there came running whole squadrons and companies of armed men (leaving their own wards) for to repel and put back the violence and affault of the Romans. In this turmoil and trouble, certein Barges appointed and furnished thereto aforehand, were brought about to N Jos, & there set other souldiers aland: who coming at unwares upon the corps do galards that were left half naked and very weak, by reason of the departure of their sellows, and finding the gates wide open, at which crewhile the louldiers ran out, with small ado were masters of N. sos, left, as it was, forlorn of warders, who in fear made hast to run away and escape. And none of them all had lesse means to defend themselves, or smaller mind to tarry still, than the sugitive rebels, for they durst not well strust their own fellows, and so in the hottest of the skirmish made an escape. Marcellus so oon as he understood, that Nasos was won, and likewise that one quarter of Accadina was held and kept for him, and that Mericus with his guard had joyned to his fouldiers, founded the retreat; for feat; that the Kings treasure, which was more in name than in deed, should be risted

Thus by suppressing the violence of the sondiers, both the rebel suggitives that were in Acradims, had good time and place to this for themselves and get away, and also the Syracusians delivered now at last from fear, opened the gates of Acradina, and ient Orators unto Marcellus, H craving nothing but life for themselves and their children, Marcellus called his Councel together, and those Syracusians likewise, who in the time of civil diffention, were driven to forlake their houses, and remained among the garrisons of the Romans: and then he made the Embassadors this answer. "There have not been (quoth he) more benefits and good turns for the space of fifty years received at King Hiero his hands by the people of Rome, than detriments and mif-6 chiefs intended against them within these few years, by them that have seized and possessed the "City of Syracula. But most of those mischiefs in the end, have lighted upon their heads right " justly, who duly deferved the same: and for the breach of league and covenants, they themselves "have suffered at their own hands more grievous punishment by far, than the people of Rome I "would willingly ever have required. As for me, this is the third year that I lie in nege before " Syracufa; not, I affure you, with this intent, that the City should not be reserved taseand "found for the natural people thereof to keep and inhabit, but that the Captains and ring-leaders of fugitives and rebels might not leize it, and so hold it in captivity and oppression. How "much the Syracufians might have done with me at first, may be easily feen by the example ei-"ther of those Syracusans who converted among the guards of the Romans, or of the Spanish "Captain Mericus, who yeelded up his garrison. Yea, and the hardy and resolute course in the end taken (although it were with the latelt) by the Syracufians themselves, may sufficiently testifie the same. Whereby also it may appear, that for all my travel and pain which I have un-"dergone, for all the perils which I have adventured and passed through, about the walls of sy-"racula, both by Land and Water, thus long: I have gathered no fruit so sweet and pleasant as "this, that it may be faid, how I was able, yet at last, to win and conquer Syracufa. Then the Quellor was ient, attended with a guard, unto Nafos, for to enter upon the Kings treasure there, and to keep the same in safety. The pillage of the City was given to the souldiers: and ransacked but there were appointed certain warders over every house of theirs, who were among the garrisons of the Romans, for to lave the same. Amids many cruel, spightful, and soul examples of anger, malice, and coverousnels, which happed to be committed during the time of this saccase, it is reported. That in fo great hurliburly as possibly might be, when a City is newly taken, and hungry fouldiers run to riffing, Archimedes was butily occupied, and Hudying upon certain Geometrical figures that he had drawn out in the duft, and hapned to be flain by a fouldier, that I knew not who he was. Whereat Marcellus was much offended and displeased: and thereupon gave especial order, that he should be honourably enterred: yea, and caused his kinsfolks to be fought out : and all they in remembrance of him, and for his name fake, were not only faved,but allo well accounted of, and had in good reputation. Thus you fee in what fort, and by what means especially, Saracuse was won. A City wherein was found such store of wealth and riches, as hardly would have been gotten in Carthage, if it had been forced then: notwithtlanding it was able to hold out with Rome, and maintein war with equal force and power.

Some few dayes before the winning of Syracufe, T. Octacilius with fourfcore Gallies, of five ranks of oars, croffed the Seas from Lilybaum to Utica, and being entred the gate before day light, chanced to take by the way certain Caricks charged with corn. After he was disbarked and let a M Land, he wasted grievously part of the territory about Mica, and returned to the City withbooty and prizes of all torts. And the third day after he went from Lalybaum he returned thither again with 130 caricks full of corn and other booty: and that corn he fent forthwith to Syracuse: which if it had not come as it did in good time to help the prefent necessity, the conquerors as well as the conquered had felt the imart of most extream and grievous famine. In the fame summer, the Roman Generals in Spain (who almost for two years had done no memorable act there but warred by policy and firatagems, more than by force of arms) diflodged from their forts and winter harbors, and joyned their armies together. Then they called a Councel, where they jumped with one general accord in this opinion, That confidering all this while they had effected this much only, as to empeach and thay Afdrubal from all means of paffing over N into Itel,, it was now high time to make an end at once of the war in Spain. And to effect and bring this to passe, they supposed verily that their strength was well amended and sufficient, by reason that in the winter time they had levied and put in arms thirty thousand Celtiberians. Now the Carthaginians had in Spain then, no fewer than three armies. Afarubal the son of Gife, and Mago, were encamped with all their forces together, distant from the Romans almost fivedayes journey: Aftrubal the fon of Amilear, an ancient warrior, and an old Captain in Spain, was somewhat neerer with his whole power, before a City named Anitorgis. Him the Roman Generals were defirous to defeat and vanquish first: and in good hope they were, that they had firength enough and to spare, for to accomplish that: mary, this was their only doubt and lear, lest upon the discomfiture of him, the other Afdrubel and Mago would for fear retire themselves into the unpassable woods, and take the wilds and mountains, and so maintein a long war. They supposed therefore it was the best course to divide their power between them in two parts, and at once to compass the whole war of Spain. And thus they agreed to part their forces; namely, That P. Cornelius should lead two third parts of the army, confisting of Romans and allies, against Mago and Asdrubal: and that (n. Cornelins with the other third part of that old army should joyn with the Celtiberians, and war against Asdrubal the Barchine [i, son of Amilear abovefaid.] Both these Captains with their hosts set out together in their journy, putring the Celti-

berians before in the vanguard, and encamped neer the City Anatorgis in the light of their enemies, having but the river running between. And there Cn. Seipio staid behind, and made his abode with the power aforesaid: but P. Seipio went onward to perform that part of the war which he purposed and intended. Askrubal after he perceived that there lay in camp but a small power of Romans, and that their whole hope relied upon the aids of the Celtiberians; as one that could well skill of the falshood and treachery of the barbarous people, but especially of all those nations, among whom he had been so long a souldier: by reason that both camps, as well his own as the other of the Romans, were full of Spaniards, he used by the means of reciprocal commerce of their language, for to have secret speech and conference with the principal heads of the Celtiberi-Bans, and to treated with them, that in confideration of a great fum of money, they were perswaded and yeelded in the end to withdraw all their forces from thence, and give the Romans the flip. And this they supposed was not so heinous and odious a fact. For why? they were not dealt withalto turn their swords upon the Romans, and to war against them: again, they were to have as good pay and wages to fit still, and not to serve, as was sufficient to bind them for to bear arms. and fight: and last of all, rest it self, and sleeping in a whole skin, together with their return home to their own, and the joy and pleasure of visiting their triends, and seeing their goods and lands, were plaufible and pleafing inducements to every man. And therefore the Captains themselves were no fooner drawn thereto, than the very multitude. Over and besides, to strike it dead sure, they flood in no fear of the Romans (being so few as they were) that they could possibly keep them perforce. And furely, this might well ferve, to be a Caveat for Roman Captains ever hereafter, and such precedent examples and instances as this, may stand in stead of good lessons indeed, to teach them how they trust again the aids of foreiners; and never to reliet hemselves so much upon them, but that they alwayes have in their camp the greater part of their own forces, and themore number of their natural fouldiers. All on a juddain thereforethe Celtiberians diflodged,plucked up standards, and departed from them, and never bad them farewel. And when the Romans demanded the cause of this change, yea, and befought and importuned them to tarry, they made them no other answer but this, That they were called and sent for home, by occasion of wars in their own country. Scipio feeing that these Allies of his were so slippery, and could neither be intreated nor enforced to stay: and that himself alone without them was not able to nmake his part good with the enemy : and to joyn again with his brother, was a thing impossible : for want of all other good means, for the present, when he saw no remedy else, determined to retire himself as far backward as he could: having this especial care above all things, not to encounter and joyn battail with the enemy in plainfield, without some advantage, who now was passed over the river, and traced him hard at heels in his dismarch.

About the same time P. Scipio stood in the like terms of sear, but in more danger by the coming of a new enemy, and that was Masanissa the young Prince, who then was a friend and pensionary fouldier of the Carthaginians: but afterwards mighty and renowned for his amity with the Romans. He with his Numidian Horiemen first encountred P. Scipio, as he marched on his journey, and afterwards both day and night molefted and troubled him very threwdly : in such fort, that E not only he would intercept and catch up those that were gone out wandering and stragling far from the camp, a fuelling or foraging, and fend them short of home; but also ride braving even before the camp. Many a time would be venture, yea, and enter upon the thickest of the standing corpide guard, and make foul work and trouble among them. By night also he used oft to make many flatts upon a suddain, and assail the gates of the camp and the sampier, and put them in exceeding great frights. So as the Romans at no time, nor in no place could be at rest and quiet for him, but ever in fear and doubt of some shrewd turn or other by him: so as they were driven to keep within their rampier, cut off from the use of all commodities abroad, and in a manner as good as befieged: and more ftreightly yet were they like to be beleaguered, in case Indibilis, who was coming (as the rumor went) with 7500 Suesterans, were once joyned with the Carthaginians. Whereupon Scipio a wary warrior and prudent Captain otherwise, driven to these hard extremities, and forced to make shifts, entred into a rash and inconsiderate designment, even to go on and meet (forfooth) Indibilis in the night, and in what place foever it should be his hap to encounter him, there to bid him battail, and fight with him. Leaving therefore a mean guard to keep the camp, and T. Fonteius his Lieutenant, as Provost and Captain, he set out at midnight, and meeting with his enemies, joyned battail with them: but they skirmished rather by loose companies in their march, than with their united forces in set and pight field. Howbeit, the Romans had the better hand so much as it was, considering what a confused and disorderly constitution there might be. But the Numidian Cavalry, whom Scipio thought he was secured of and that they were not aware of him, all on a fuddain flanked the fides of the Romans, and mightily terrified them. Against these S Numidians, whiles Scipio made head again afresh, behold a third fort of enemies also charged upon his back, even the Carthaginian Captains, who by this time while the other were in fight, had overtaken their allies and were come thither. So as the Romans were to maintain battail on all hands, and were at a fland, and in doubt with themselves against which enemy to turn first, or what Way with a close couched squadron to give the venture for to breakthrough. As the General Was thus manfully fighting, and encouraging his fouldiers, prefenting and opposing him elifor-Watd, where was most need and danger, his chance was to be run through the right side of his body with a Lance: and that massive band of the enemies which had charged upon the thick P. Scipio slain.

battailon, which environed their Captain, sceing Scipio falling from his Horse ready to die, in H great 10y and mirth fet up a cheerful shout, and ran all over the army, and carried glad tidings that the Roman General was flain. This voice being once spread all abroad, caused both the enemies to take themselves undoubtedly for victors, and the Romans to make no other accompt but they were vanquished. Whereupon they having lost their Leader, began sorthwith to flie out of the field. But as it was no hard matter for them to make a lane and break through among the Numidians, and other auxiliary fouldiers lightly armed; fo to escape and go cleer away from io many Horse, and Footmen also, who were as swift on foot as the horsemen, it was almost impossible. Thus they were more in manner flain in their flight now, then in their fight before. And there had not one remained alive, but that the day being far ipent already, and t toward evening, the night came on apace and overtook them. The Carthaginian Captains, and those also of Affrick, taking the full benefit of this their good fortune, flept not their businesse, nor made delay: but presently after the battail; scarcely allowing their souldiers so much sleep as would content nature, marched in great hast toward Astrubel the son of Amilear: making accompt affuredly, that when they had joyned their power with his, they should break theneck of this war, and end it once for all. When they were come to him, great joy and gratulation there was between the Captains and the hofts of both fides, for this fresh victory newly atchieved: and feeing they had already defeated to brave a warrior and great commander, together with his whole army, they made no doubt but expected certainly to have another hand as good

The news verily of this fo great a foil and overthrow, was not yet come unto the Romans: but yet they were itrucken into a fad dump and deep filence, and more than that, into a fectet prefage and fore-deeming of tome unsucky tidings: as commonly mens minds use to fore-give and tell aforehand, when there is some mischief and ill toward them. The General himself befides that he faw he was abandoned and forlaken of his affociats, and knew the forces of the enemies to mightily reenforced; by good conjectures and gneffes, yea, and by very reason was induced to suspess some lots and calamity received already, rather than enclined to hope after any good fuccess and happy speed. For thus he discoursed with himself: How is it possible that Af drubal and Mago should bring their armies together without conflict, unless my brother be flain in fight, or have forgotten to be a warrior? how cometh it that he withflood them not? or how I hapneth it that my brother followed not hard after them fast upon their backs? At least wife, if he had not been able to keep them afunder, but that both Captains and armies must needs meet and joyn in one, yet he himself me thinks, at leastwife would have come by this time to his brother, and brought his own power to his. In this perplexity and anguish of spirit, he thought yet, for the present time, that the only good course he could take, was to withdraw himself back from thence as far as he could: and io all that one night unwares to his enemies (who follows only were quiet) he marched a great way, and won much ground of them. The next morning fo foon as the enemies perceived that the Romans were dislodged and gone, they sent out the Nemidian light Horsemen, and began to tollow ofter them apace, and pursued them as fast as possibly they could: and before night the Numidian Cavalry had overtaken them, and skirmifhed w one while with the tail of their march, another whiles at their fides and flanks, and gave them no rest: whereat the Romans made as it were a stand, and began to defend and save their army as well as they could: yet with great wariness and regard of security, Scipio encouraged them so to fight, as they might march on ftill and gain ground, before the Infantry overtook them. But as ore while the army was one foot, and another while flood fill, in long time they rid but aluth ground. And Scipio seeing the night draw on apace, re-laimed his souldiers from farther skirmishes: and after he had rallied them together, he retired with them up to a little mount, no inflicient place (God wot) of lafe retreatfor an army, elper ially so troubled and affrighted already, yet higher than any other place all about. There the first thing that he did, was to bestow the baggage and cavalry in the mids within his forces: and at first the infantry ranged round about in N a ring, made no difficult matter of it to put by the violent charge of the Numidian Horsemen. But afterwards when the three Generals marching with three full armies approached, their Captain Scipio perceiving that he was never able to keep that place without some fortification, began to cast his eye about, and to bethink with himself, by what means possible he might empale himself round about as it were with a rampier : but the hill was so naked of wood, and the soil of the ground befides fo frony and craggy, that he could neither finde any underwood fit to cut out stakes for a pallisado nor earth meet to make turfs for a bank, or minable for a trench: and in one word, all things untoward and unhandiome for a mound, and to fortifie withal. Neither was there any place there, to speak of, so sleep and upright, but the enemy might at easemount up and climb it. All the hill on every fide, had a gentle rifing and afcent up to the top. How o beit, to represent some shew and resemblance yet of a rampier, they were forced to take their pack saddles, with their packs tied fast unto them, and so round about to pile them and use them to the usual height of a mure: And where there wanted pack saddles to make up the work there they were fain to heap together, all forts of fardels, truffes and other carriages, and to put them between the enemies and them. The Carthaginian armies when they were come, matched very eafily up against the Hill. But the new fashion and manner of their defences and fortifications, was very strange unto them, so as at the first the souldiers marvelled much

A and were altonied therear, and food fill. But their Captains on all fides cried out upon their. And why stand ye goping (say they) so; and do not pull in peeces and plinck a way that soon in bable there, good to make fport with? A'very toy, that women and children would carce ftand about thus long? Why, the enemie is taken already in a pinfold, and lieth lurking and hiding himselfbehind the truffer and other carriages. After this manner (I say) the leaders rated at the founcies. But it was hot to easy a matter, either to get over that Barricado of the packs, or to remove and rid them only of the way, as they lay piled close against them: nor yet to unfol or and unwap the pack-faddless lying overwhelmed as they did, under the packs, and entangled together with them. I has they were hindred and staid a long time: and when at length they had put this bag and baggage afide that was fet in their way, and made paffage and entrance for the armed men, and that in divers playes, the camp and tents were foon taken on all lides, ere a man could turn about: and so being few to many, and frighted men to late conquerors, no marvel if they were killed and newn in pieces in every place. Howbeit, many of the fouldiers having fled for refuge into the forreits neer by, escaped into the camp of P. Scipio, whereof T. Fonteius his Lieutenant had the charge, As for Ca, Scipis some write that he was flaih upon that mount at the first onles and affault made by the enemies sothers report that with a few others he fled into a Tower hard by the camp: and that there was a fire made round about it, and so when the gates thereof were burned, which by noviolent means otherwise they could break open, the enemies entred and took it, and they within were killed every one, Captain and all,

Thus Co. Scipio came to his end, in the feventh year after that he went into Spain, and on the C nine and twentieth day after that his brother loft his life. Their death was bewailed and lamented no els over all Spain, than at Rome. For among the citizens at home, one part of their forrow. they took for the loss of the armies, another part went for the distraction and alienation of the Province and a third again was spent in the cogitation of the publick calamity: but Spain from one end to the other, mourned only for their Governors and Captains, and had a great misse of them. And Chens of the twain, was more bewailed, becaused he had been longer time their ruler. and had won the favour and affection of men, and possessed their hearts before the other. and was the first that ever gave them in those parts a proof and tast of the Romans just and tem-

When the army was thus defeated and brought to nothing, lo as Spain feemed hittely loft, there are e one man yet, that recovered all again, and brought the decated flate to the former perfection. There was in the army one L. Martins, the fon of Septimius, a Gentleman and Knight of Rome, a torward young mansfor courage and wit, far above the degree and condition wherein he was born. Bendes this excellent and most toward disposition of his by nature, he had great helps by the dikipline and infiruction of Cr. Scipios under whom, for so many pears he was trained and had learned all military knowledge and skill meet for a fouldier. This Marting, what by rallying the disperied souldiers who were fled, and what by drawing others out of stinding garrions had raifed and affembled together a reasonable good power, and joyned with T. Fontens, the Lieutenant aforelaid of P. Scipio. But the Roman Knight, above all others, grew to fogreat credit and reputation among all the fouldiers, that when they had fortified their camp within the tiver Iberus, and were determined among themselves, to chise one General over the armies, in 2 folemn affembly of fouldiers, even by their own military election: they went one by one in course one after another, unco the main corps de guard that defended the rampier, and to the other wards belonging unto the camp until they had all given their voyces: and so by general consent created him their General. All the time which they had after, (and that was but imall) they employed in fortifying their hold, and conveying thither corn and victuals: and what charge foever was impoled by him upon the fouldiers, the lame they executed readily and willingly, and without any shew that their hearts were dismayed; and cast down any jot at all. But after that news was brought, that Afdrubal the son of Gifgs, was coming against them, to dispatch clean the reliques of the war; that he had passed over Therus and approached neer; and the lon diers saw once the fignal of battel put forth unto them by this new General; calling to mind, what noble warriors they had served under but a while before; what worthy leaders they were wont to have and with how pullant armies they nied heretofore to go to the field; they fell a weeping every one, shaling and beating their heads: some lift up and directed our their hands to heaven blaming and acculing the Gods: others lay along ugon the ground, calling every one upon his own Captain by special name, Neither con'd their piteous moans and plaints be staid not withstanding the Centutions encouraged what they could the fouldiers of their companies: not withflanding (1 lay) that Martin himself sometimes spake them fair, sometimes rebuked them, fet giving themfelves to fach foolish and vain puling, like women; and not rether resolve to raise up their hearts, and with him to quicken and whet their flomacks in defence of themicles and of the commonweal, and not to furfict heir former. Captains and Leaders to lie dead and infrevenged. By this time now all on a fuddain the shout of the enemies was descried, and the found of the trumpets were within hearing heing come close tinder the ramplet. Whereupon all at once turning their fortow and weeping into anger and indignation, they rinevery man to his armot and weapon: and as it they had been ho in mid they halfined from all parry to the gites and entries of the camp, and charged upon the enemies as they came careless and without order and array. Immediately this unexpected and inddain object, stroke an exceeding fear into the Carthaginians:

as wondring from whence so many enemies should start up so soon, considering the armies were so lately clean in a manner destroyed; and how it came to passe, that being newly varquished and put to flight, they should be so sout, so bold and confident of their own selves; who a Gods name, should be their General, after the two Scipios were flain; what Captain and Goternor had they over the camp; and who gave out the fignal of battail: marvelling (Ifay) at thele premiffes, and fo many particulars, that they once imagined not afore, at first hand they wift not what to do, but as amazed men, began to give ground and retire; but afterwards, being fill fiercely followed upon with a violent charge, they were plainly beaten back and put to flight And verily, either there had been a foul havock and flaughter of them that fled, or a rash and dangerous enterprise for them who would have followed the chace: but that Martini halined to found the retreat, and opposing himself against the foremost ensigns of the vanguard, yea, and taking hold of some of them himself, staid the main battail and repressed their violence, who were upon the point already to pursue them with heat. And so he reduced them back again into the camp, as greedy as they were fill of murder, and thirfly of bloudshed. The Carthaginians, who at the first were driven from the rampier, and for fear hastned away; after that they saw none to follow them, supposed they had been afraid, and therefore staid still : whereupon they depanted to their camp again in rechleis manner, fair and foftly. And as careless as they were in their reine thisher, fo negligent were they in guarding the lame: for although their enemies were neet, yet they remembred and thought again, that they were but the tail and reliques of two armies, values of the second secon quished and defeated a few dayes before. Upon this resolute perswasion of theirs, and balecong ceit of the enemies, they were very negligent every way within their camp: whereof Martinthe ving by his espial, certain intelligence, resolved upon a designment, which at the first significant more like a project of hazard, than an enterprise of hardiness; and it was no more, but evenupon a bravery to fet upon the enemy in his own camp, and give him a camilado. For as he thouse it an easier emprese, to force the hold and pavilions of Asdrubal, being but one, than to deled and keep his own, in case three armies and three Captains should joyn together: so he considered withal, that either if he sped well in this exploit, he should restore and set upright again unto the Romans, the decayed and proftrate State of Spain: or if he were discomfited and put back, set by giving the adventure first upon the enemies, he should not be altogether contemned, and of no reputation. But left this attempt fo suddain, and the terror and erpor which may fall out inter night-time, should happen to trouble this his designed plot, and the course of his good somme; he thought it not amils, to make a speech unto his souldiers, and to exhort and encouragement afore-hand. And therefore calling them together to a general audience, in this mannethedicoursed unto them of his intent and purpose.

"My valorous and loyal fouldiers, either the reverence and affectionat love of mine, toward of Martius to "our chief Captains during their life, and after their death; or the very present conditionand his fouldiers, "flate wherein we all now fland; may be a fufficient testimony and proof to any man whole-"ever, that this charge and government of mine, as it is in regard of your judgement of me tight "honourable, fo it is in truth, and in very deed, to me most weighty, and full of care and touble "For at what time as (but that fear took away all sence of sorrow) I was not so much master of "my felf, as to feek out and find fome comfort and folace for mine own penfive foul and heavy " spirit; I was forced being but one, (which is a most hard matter for a man to do in time of "grief) to minister consolation unto the common missortune and calamity of you all. The fouldiers, as they gladly gave ear to this new counsell of their new captain, so, the more audacious and adventurous that it was the better it pleased them. The rest of the day behind they spent in surbishing and making ready their harness and weapons, and in cherishing their bodies, yea, and the better part of the night they flept quietly. And to at the relief of the fourth wat h they

Now were there other companies also of Carthaginians, beyond this next camp above faid, about fix miles distant from thence. A hollow way and valley there lay between, standing thick of trees. In the midft of this wood, for a furlong space well near he bestowed closely a cohort of sootmen, yea, and certain horsemen of Romans: but by his leave this was but a crasty and slie trick, borrowed of the Carthaginians. Thus the midth way being intercepted and taken up, the rest of theforces were conducted in a ftill march toward the enemies in the next camp. And finding no Squards before the gates, no Sentinels upon the rampier, they entred in as it had been into their own hold, and no man made resistance: then they founded trumpets, and gave the alarm, Some fall to killing of the enemies half afleep: others fling dry litter and straw for to kindle fire upon their hots and pavilions; other some again keep the gates, that none should issue forth. So the fire the outery, and massacre all together put them out of their right wits, and made them, as it were, besides themselves; that neither hear they could, nor yet make any shift for themselves. Unarmed and naked men fell among the bands of armed fouldiers. Some run in halte to to the gates, others finding the waies and passiges beset rumup to the campier: and look as any escaped and got away from thence by that means he flieth ftraightwaies directly toward the other camp. Where they H were caught up by the cohort optootmen, and the cornet of horfemen, which role up fuddenly out of their Ambutado: and being enclosed onevery lide, were killed to the last man. And yet, one of their Amounts good hap to have escaped from thence with life, so swiftly, and with so great expedition, the Romans after they had got the nearer camp, fped themselves to the other. that he could not have recovered it before them, to bring news of the defeat. And even there likewise, the farther they were off from their enemy, the more negligent they were: and because fome also a little before day were flipt away a forraging, fuelling, and plundering, the Romans found every thing more loose and out of order, than in the other camp. Their weapons only flood reared up in their corp. de guard, the fouldiers themselves were unarmed, either fitting and lying all along on the ground, or walking up and down before the gates, and under the rampier. With I these touldiers so secure, so retchless, so disarmed and disordered (the Romans being yet in their hot bloud, and not cooled upon their fresh massacre, and more than that, lusty and brag for their new victory began to make a fray, and to skirmith. But the Carthaginians were not able to keep them out of the gates. And so within the Camp there was a hot and cruell fight: for, from all pirts thereof, they can together upon the first alarmthat arose in the very beginning of the tumult and scuffling. And long had that skirmish continued, but that the Romans bucklers and targets seen ali bloudy were a pattern unto the Carthaginians of a sormer execution; and thereupon drave them into a mighty fear. This fearfull fight caused them all to turn back and take their heels : and thus as many of them as escaped killing got out by heaps wheresoever they could make shift to find way, and were clean turned out of their camp, and all that they had, So in the com-K pais of one day and night, by the conduct and direction of L. Martius, there were two encamped holds forced and won from the enemies: in which there were 37000 of the enemies flain, faith Claudius who translated the Annals of Acidius out of the Greek tongue into the Laine and 830 raken pri oners belides the gain of a mighty rich booty. In which pillage there was found a shield of therweighing 138 pound, with the image and portraiture of Afaruba! the Barchine, Val vius Act as recordeth, that the comp only of Mago was taken, and feven thouland menflain and that in another batteli with sifdrub. I upon a fally forth, there died ten thousand, and 4330 were taken prisoners. Pifowriteth, that when Mago followed after our men in an hot and diferderly chace (for they feemed to give back and retreat) there were five thouland men killed by the train of an ambush, But all writers do blazon the great honour and same of Duke Martin, and L befides the very truth of his glorious name, they make mention also and speak of some miracles: namely that as he made the Oration unto his fouldiers, there was seen a flaming fire burning from his head, without any sen'e and seeling of his to the great wonder and sear of the souldiers that flood about him: and that in the memoriall of his brave victory over the Carthaginians, there remained in the temple of Jup, until the Capitoll was burned that foresaid shield, with the Image of Afdrubal, and it was called Martius his shield. Alter this, Spain was quiet for a long time, whiles both fides after to many overthrows given and taken between them, were loath to hazard the main chance in one battell,

In the time that these assairs passed in Spain, Marcellus upon the winning of Syracuse, having fet all other things in order throughout Sielly, with such faithfulnels and upright integrity, that M not only he greatly augmented his own glory, but also enlarged the majest y of the people of Rome, brought over to Rame all the goodly and heautiful ornaments of that City, their graven and moltenimages, their pictures and painted tables, whereof there was great flore in Syracufe. These braveries (no doubt) at the first were no more but the spoils of enemies, and lawfully acquired in right of war and conqueit. But from thence began our great love and liking to the cunning workmanship of Grecian Attitans: and from hence came alterwards our licention snels and outragein spoiling and robbing, so commonly & ordinarily, all sacred and profine places, where these things were to be had : which staid not so, but proceeded and turned at length to the spoiling of the Roman gods themselves, and to that very first Temple which by Marcellus was beautified and adorned prin ipally above the reft. For firangers and fortein travellers used in pilgrimage to vife N the Temples which were dedicated by Marcellus at the gate Capena, in regard only of the most rare and fingular workmanship of the ornaments in that kind, of which at this day there is very little or nothing to be icen.

Now from all City well-near of Sicily, there reforted Embaffies unto him: as their caules were divers and unlike, to their conditions were not all one. As many as before the winning of Spraces fe, had either not rebelled at all orbecame reconciled and infavour again, they were accepted in the quality of faithfull Allies, and made much of: those who for sear after the loss of Spaenfe, yielded were reputed as conquered, and received laws and conditions at the will and pleafure of the Conqueror. There remained yet no small reliques of war about Agrigentum for the Romans to dispatch namely, Epicides and Hanno, the Captains of the former war: and a third fent new from Annibal in the room of Hippocrates, a Citizen of Hippochis countrimen name him Me times) descended from the Libs planices, aman of Action, and one who under Annibal had been brought up and taught alliests of arms, and skill of warfare. Unto his charge were committed by Epicides and Hanno the Numidian Auxiliaries, with whom he over-ran all the countries be longing to the enemies: he went unto all the Confederats, and fo wrought with them to continue fall in their allegiance, and to fend aids to every one in due time accordingly: in such fort, that

A within short time he got himself a great name throughout all Sicily so as the favorits and faction of the Carthaginians had no greater hope in any than in him. And therefore both Captains, as well Hanno the Carthaginian, as Epicides the Syracusian, who for a time had been pentup within the walls of Agrigentum, bearing themselves as well upon the fidelity as policy of Mutines, boldly adventured to come forth of the walls of Agrigentum, and upon the river Himera encamped themselves. Whereof Marcellus having intelligence, forthwith removed with all his power, and stehim down encamped, almost four miles from the enemy, minding to wait and expect what they did or went about But Marines gave him neither opportunity of place to reat him long, nor respite of time to take counsell in, but crossed the river, and with exceeding terrour, and tumultu-Rous noise affailed the standing guards of his enemies: yea, and the morrow after gave them battell as it werein a pitcht field, and drave them within their holds and fortifications. But being called from thence by occasion of a mutiny of Numidians within the Camp (who to the number almost of three hundred were departed to Heraclea Minoa) he went to appeale their moods, and to reclaim them to due obedience: but he gave the rest of the Captains (by report) a great charge and express warning, not to fight with the enemy, howfoever they did in his abience. But both the Captains were greatly offended thereat, and Hanno especially, who was already male-content, and repined at his glory: What? faith he, thinketh Mutines, a bale Affrican and not of the right flamp neither, to gage and rule me a Carthaginian Generall, sent with Commission from the Senat and people? He periwaded therefore Epicides effectually to pais over the river, and to firike C abattell: for quoth he if we should stay for him, and then hap to have a sortunate day of it and

win the victory, all the honour no doubt shall redound to Mutines. Beye fore, Marcellus thought this a great indignity that he who had repulsed at Nola Annibal, eren when he bare himself so bravely upon his tresh victory at Canea, should give one soot to these petty enemies, vanquished already by him both by sea and land: whereupon he commanded his fouldiers to arm in all hatte, and to bring forth the standards and enfigns. But as he was arranging his men in battell array, there came riding unto him all on the ipur, with bridle on the hole neck, ten Numidians from out of the army of the enemies, with these tidings and intelligences, affiring them, "That their countrimen, who first were offended and discontented by occasi-"on of that mutiny aforelaid, wherein three hundred of their company departed and went away D" to Heraclea : and then afterwards, because they saw their own head and leader, by the practice "of those other Captain, who maligned and envied his glory, tent far enough out of the way, ewere not disposed at all to fight, "but would fit fill and not flir. A kind of people thele were, deceitfull otherwise, and used to break promile; howbeit now, they were just and true of their word. Upon this, as the Romans sook better heart unto them, (for there was a speedy pursevant or courrier sent throughout the battaillons from company to company, for to fignific unto them, that the enemy was disappointed and abandoned of his Cavalry, whom they feared most of all other) so the enemies were mightily dismaied and put in fear: for over and besides, that they had no help from them who were the greatest strength of their army, they were in a deep sear lest their own horsemen would fer upon them. By which occasion the conflict was not great, for at the first shout and shock given, well it was seen which way the game would go, and the matter was soon determined. The Numidians, who at the first encounter, and during the conslict, had stood quiet in both points of the battell, seeing their own fellows turn back and flie, bare them only company for a while as they fled : but after that they perceived them all to make hafte forfear to Agrigentum: fearing also themselves there to be besieged among them, slipt away every one to their own Cities, Many thoulands were there flain and taken prisoners: and eight elephants besides taken alive. This was the last field fought by Marcellus in Sicily: upon this victory he returned to Syracuse. By this time now was the year almost come about and growing to an end. And therefore at Rome the Senate decreed, that P. Cornelius the Prætor should fend letters to the Consuls, lying before Capua, purporting this tenour: That for a much as Annibal was far from them, and no great matter of confequence like to be performed the while at Capua; the one of them (if they thought fo good) should repair to Rome, for to create new Magistrates in the room of the old. The Consuls having received the letters, agreed between themselves and took order, that Claudius should go to hold and accomplish the solemn election of Magistrates: and Futoim remain still at Capua, So Claudiuscreated new Coff. Cn. Fulvius Centimalus, and P. Sulpitius Galbathe fon of Servius: a man that had not born any curule office of state before, After these were Prators chosen, L, Cornelius Lentulus, M. Cornelius Cethegus, C. Sulpitius, C. Calpurnius Pifo. Unto Pifo befell the jurisdiction within the City. Sulpitius had the government of the Province Sicily. Cethegus of Apulia: and Lontulus, of Sardinia. The Confuls had the government of their Provinces prorogued for to continue S one year longer.

Nnibal encamped himselfe at three miles end from Rome, fast upon theriver Anio. Himselfin Aper (on, accompanied with two thousand men of arms, rode to the gate Capena, for to view the fite of the City. And notwithstanding that for three daies space the armies of both sides were come into the field ready embaticiled, yet they never joyned in conflict, by reason of the tempestuous and storm weather: But ever as they were returned again time their Camp, prefently it proved fair. Capa now by Q. Fulvius, and Appius Claudius the Pro-Confult. The Nobles and principal Citizens of Capura poisoned themselves. When as their Senators stood ound to stakes (for to be whipped) and thento lofe their heads there came letters from the Senate of Rome unto the Pro-Conful Q Fulvius, with diredion to fare their lives: but tefore that he would read them she put them up into his bosome, and willian the minifers or executioners to let the Law have it e con fe, and to do their office, and fo he went through with the execution. It hapned that in a foleran affembly of the people there was much debate and quefion, who should govern as L. Deputy the Province of Spain: and when no man was willing to undertake that charge, P. cipio, the for of that Publius who was flain in Spain, made offer to go that voyage, and by the voyces generally of the people, and with one accord of all he was thither fent. New Fulvins Centimalus, and P. Sulpitum Galba the Confuls, when they had entred into their Magistracy upon the Ides of March, assembled the Senators into the Capitall, where they consulted with the LL, about the state of the Common-weal, concerning the administration of the wars, and as touching the Provinces and the Armies. Q. Fulvins and Ap, Claudins, the Confuls of the former year, continued fill their rule and full command, with the charge of the same forces which they had before under their hands. And over and besides, they were expressly commanded, not to depart from Capua (before which they lay at sege) until they had forced and won the City. For at that time the Romans among all their otheraffairs were most amused upon it: not so much for anger and malice, (wherof they had never against any one City greater and juster cause) as in this regard, that being a state so noble and mighty, likess by revolting first it had drawn and induced certain other Cities to do the same: so if it were movered and regained, like it was to reduce their affections again, to look back and return unto their old allegiance and obedience to their wonted figniory of Rome. The Prætors also of the former year, M. Junius in Tuscany, and P. Sempronius in Ganl continued in their places of regiment, with two legions a piece undertheir conduct the same which they had before, And so M. Marcelluste N mained as Pro-Coniul behind in Sicily, for to finish and dispatch the reliques of the warthere, with the power of that army which he had already : and had commission (if need were of new supply) to make up the number of his companies, out of those legions which were commanded by P. Cornelius the Vice-Prætor in Sicily; provided alwaies, that he chose no souldier out of those bands, unto whom the Senat had flatly denied, either licence to be discharged, or pasporttoreturn home into their country, before the war was fully ended. Unto C. Sulpitius, whole lot it was to govern the Province of Sicily, were affigned those two legions, which P. Cornelius had before with a fresh supply out of the army of Crens Fulvius, which the last year was shamefully delested, beaten and put to flight in Apulia. These souldiers, all the fort of them, had the time limitate on of service and no other, appointed and set down by the Senat, as those former who remained after the overthrow at Canna. And this diffrace they had befides, as well the one company as the other, That they might not winter within any town, nor build them any flanding camp for win tring harbours, within ten miles of a City. L. Cornelius the Lord Deputy in Sardinia, was allowed to have the conduct of those two legions which were under the leading of Q. Mmins, And order was given unto the Confuls, to levy and enroll a new supply thereto, if need required. T. Odach as and M. Valerius were appointed to guard and defend all the fea-coasts of Sicily and Greece, with

A the help of those Legions and Armadoes which they had already. The Greeks had fifty fail in their fleet, and were manned with one Legion. The Sicilians had one hundred ships, and two Legions to furnish them. So that in this year the Romans maintained three and twenty Legions, to wage war both by fea and land.

In the beginning of the year, when the letters of L. Martius were read and scanned in the Senat house, the LL. there assembled, liked well of the contents, and spake highly in the praise of his worthy acts: but many of them were offended at the superscription, because he took upon him the hononrable title of a Pro-Prator in his stile, and wrote thus, L. Martins the Pro-Prator to the Senat | confidering, that his command was neither granted by the people, nor allowed and B confirmed by the Senat. "An ill precedent (lay they) it is, and of bad confequence, that Generals "of the field should be chosen by armies, and that the solemnity of Elections, 10 devoutly begun "in the name of the gods, and with the religious observation of the Bird-flight, should now be " transferred into the Camps and Provinces far from Laws and Magistrates, and committed to "the inconsiderate wills of rash affectionate souldiers, And when some there in place were of opinion, that the matter should be put in question at the Council Table, it was thought better to deferthat consultation, untill those gentiemen of service, that brought the Letters from Martins, were gone and departed. As concerning corn and apparell for the army, they agreed to write back unto him, that the Senat would take order and provide for both: but they would not allow in any cause to give him this addition, and to write [To Martins the Pro-Prator] lest that they might C feem to approve the very fame thing by their prejudice and doom aforehand, which they had left for to be decided and determined afterwards. When the Gentlemen aforesaid had their dispatch, and were dismiffed, the first thing that the Consuls propounded was it, and no other: and generally they jumped in this one point, for to deal with the Tribunes of the peoples, that with all speed possible they would move the Commons and propound unto them, for to know, who their will and pleasure was should be sent L. Deputy into Spair, for to have the government of that army, whereof Cn. Scipio, L. Generall, had the conduct.

This matter, I say, was treated of with the Tribunes, and a bill preferred thereof unto the Commons: but there was another greater contention in terms, that had posselled their minds already. For C. Sempronius Blafus had commenced a criminall action against Cn. Fulvius, accusing make investives against him, charging him," That being Captain Generall, through his much fol- The Oration cly, ignorance, and rashness, he had brought his army into a place of danger: reproving him more- of T. Behold the difference between Cneus Fulvius, and E" T. Sempronius. This man having the leading of an army of bondflaves, by discipline, good or-" der and government, within short time brought his souldiers to that good pass, that there was anot one of them all throughout the army remembred and regarded how basely he was born, "and of what parentage descended, but all in generall bare themselves so, that they were to their "friends a fire defence, and to their enemies a learful terror; and after that he had recovered them "at Beneventum, Se other Cities, (as it were, out of the chaws of Annibal) he ref-ored and delivered them lafe & found to the people of Rome, Whereas contrariwife. Cn. Fulvius having received "an army of Roman Cirizens, well and worthipfully born, liberally and honeftly brought up, had "taught them servile vices fit for slaves, and so trained them, that with their friends and allies they "were flout, proud, and unruly; and among their enemies were cowards & very dastards: & so fat F" short they were to bear off the violence of the Carthaginians that they were not able to abide "so much as their first cry and shout. And no marvel I assure you, that the souldiers could not slick to it in the battel, and hold out manifully; when the General himself was the first that ran away " beaftly, I rather wonder at it that any of them stood to it and died in the field, and were not all "of them as fearful as Cn. Fulvius, and took not heels with him for company. Yet C. Flami-"nius, L. Paulus, L. Posthumius, both Scipios as well Cn. as Pub. choie rather to lose their lives in "battel, than to forsake their armies when they were environed round with enemies. But Cn. "Fulvius, he was inmanner the only man that returned to Rome with news of the army defeated and overthrown. Now verily, a great indignity it is, and a shamefull manner of proceeding, "that the refidue of the army, after the overthrow at Canne, because they fied out of the field, 6 "were confined and transported over into Sieily, with express condition, not to return again from "thence before that the enemy were clean gone and departed out of Italy: & that the very same "figorous and heavy decree passed likewise, and was executed against the Legions of Cn. Fulvius; "and Cu.Fu/nius himself who fled out of the battell which was through his ownfolly and rashnels begun should go away clear, and escape without all punishment: that himself I say should lead his old age in caverns. stews, and brothel-houses, where already he hath spent his youthfull daies; while his poor fouldiers (who had faulted in nothing, but that they were like unto their Captain; be fent far enough off, and packed away (as it were) into exile, and endure frame"full and ignominious fouldiery. Lo, how unequally at Rome the freedom of the City is parted in between the rich and the poor; between men of robility and high calling, and thole that areed "mean parentage and low degree.

The answer of

Thus much spake the plaintifi C. Sempronius Blafus. The defendant on the other fide shifted all the blame from himself, and laid the whole saut upon his souldiers, alledging and pleading thus, "That when they called upon him hastily, and with great wilfulnels for to give battell, he "brought them forth into the field not on that day which they would themselves (for it was late " in the evening) but the morrow after, when both time and place were meet and convenient lothe purpose : and notwithstanding they were well appointed and orderly embattelled, yet were they not able to fuffain, either the fame, or the jury of the enemies, I know not whether, And when they all fled away amain he also was carried away in the throng of the rout: like as Varie "the Conful, at the battell before Canna and as many other Generals elsewhere, And what good « could he have done to the Common weal, in case he had staid behind alone? unless peradeventure his death might have cured and remedied the publike fores and maladies; or made "amends for the common loftes. Neither was it for want of victuals, nor for that he light atunamients to the same of diradvantage and danger; nor yet, because he was entrapped within the "trains of an ambush, marching enene coward, without ferding his cipials before, that he was "overcome; but even by mere force by dire of fword, in open feld, and in a pight battel. Andie was not be could do withall if his own men were fear nil and umorous, and the enemies hardy and venturous, he had not the rule of their hearts. It is long of every one his own nature to be "either bold or heartleis.

Two teverall daies was he judicially accused, and at both times a fine of money only setupon his head in case the matter froud go against him. At the third Session the witnesses were producediorth, to be deposed and give evidence: and after that he had been shamefully reviled, and charged with all manner of reproaches there were very many upon their oath tellified, That the fift beginning of the fright and flight both, was occasioned by the Prator himself: and that the fouldiers feeing themselves for taken by him, and supposing verily that their Captain and Leader was not affraid of his own shadow but had great reason to lear, they likewise turned their backs and fled. Upon which evidence, the whole Court was to incented against him with anger, that they cried all with one voice, to commence a capitall action, for that he was worthy todie. Whereupon arose a new debate and controverse: for whereas the Tribune had twicebeforehid L a penall action upon him of money, and now at the third time faid that he would have a jury of life and death go upon him: then he called upon the other Tribunes for their helping hand to mitigatethis rigour of the Tribune, But when those his Collegues made answer again and faid, that they would not oppose themselves nor hinder his course, but that he might proceed in the fuit at his own good pleasure, more majorum, i. e. [according to the ancient manner used by their loretathers, leither by order of law, or rule of custome, and bring him being but a private perionto the triall cither of a capitall crime, or penall treipafs : then Semprenius spake and faid flatly, that he laid upon him a criminal action of treation against the State; and requested of C. Celphumius the L.chief Justice of the City, for to have a day of hearing and judiciall triall by the people. Then the defendant cast about to help himself by another remedy, namely, in case he could compais that M Q, Fulvius his brother might possibly be present at the Session when he should be judged: who at that time was a man of great credit and reputation, in regard both of the name that wenton him for his noble acts, and of that great hope which men had of him, that he was like prefently to be Master of Capua. But when this said Q. Fulvius had requested so much by letters, endited to that purpose as effectually as he could devise, and to move commiseration and pity in behalf of the life of his brother, the LL of the Senat returned this answer unto him again, That it was not for the good of the State that he should depart from Capua: thereupon, before the Sessionsday was come, Cn. Fulvins departed of his own accord into exile to Tarquinii, and the Commons made an act and confirmed that banishment of his to be a just, due, and sufficient punishmentor

During these businesses at Rome, the whole strength and force of war was bent against Caputo and yet the City was rather fraightly beleguered than forcibly affaulted; infomuch as neither the tervants or bondmen, nor the common people were able to endure the famine any longer and fend unto Annibal any messengers, they possibly could not by reason of the straight wardand ward that the Romans kept, to near one unto the other. At length there was a certain Numidian offered to go and to escape clear away, who having taken letters unto Annibal to put him in mind to be as good as his promile, departed in the night, and passed through the midst of the Roman camp, and put the Campans in very good hope, to iffue forth at all the gates, and to make a fally upon the enemy, whiles their power and strength served them. And verily in many fcushings and skirmithes which they made, they got the better for the most part in horse-fight 0 but lightly their lootmen had ever the worle. The Romans for their parts were nothing to much pleased when they had the upperhand at any time, as they were discontented and ill apaid, 1016ceive a toil in any kind of fervice of them, who were not only belieged, but in manner overcome already and conquered. So they devised a means in the end, to make up and supply by industry and policy the derect they had in strength and force. They chose out of all the Legions certain loft young men, such as for clean strength of body, and lightness withall, were most nimble and

Aswife, These had every one of them, a light buckler or target, shorter than commonly horsemen have, and seven javelins or darts apiece, four foot long, with iron heads at one end, like as those lavelins have, which they nie to lance that are lightly armed, and begin skirmithes. And every horseman took up one of these behind him on horseback, and used them, both to sit the horse and ride, and also to leap down on foot, with great activity and agility, at the fignall and token given them. Now, when as, after daily practice and exercise, they were able to do it nimble enough, and without fear, they advanced forth into the plain, lying between their camp, and the wall of the City, and affronted the horsemen of the Campans as they flood arranged in bartell array: and so soon as they were come within a darts cast, the light javelottiers aforesaid. Bdifmounted from their horses, at a sign given them: and behold, all of a indden, out of the Cavalry there was a battaillon of footmen arranged, who charged the men of arms of the enemies, and let flie their shot with great force, dart after dart, which they lanced so thick, that they galled many a horie, and wounded also many horiemen. Howbeit, their fear was much greater, by reason of the strange and unexpected manner of sight. The Roman horsemen seeing their enemiesthus affrighted, set too hard, and charged them upon lustily, chased them and beat them down even to the City gates. After this the Romans were the better in horse-service also. And hereupon began the manner from henceforth to entertain such light armed javelottiers, called Velites even among the Legions. The first deviser of this mingling of footmen among the horsemen they say was one Q. Navim a Genturion, and that he was highly honoured by the Generall for

Whiles things flood thus at Capua, Annibal was greatly distracted in mind, and possessed with two contiary cogications, whether he should go to gain the Castle of Ta entum, or to rescue and fave the City of C pua. At last the regard of Capua prevailed with him: for he saw that as well friends as enemies depended thereupon, and had their mind and eye wholly bent that way; as being a Citylike to give the very triall and proof, what would the iffue be generally of all the revolt and rebellion from the Romans. Leaving therefore behind him a great part of his carriage in the Brutians country, and all his fouldiers heavily armed, he made haite into Campania, with an elect power of foot and horie, such as he supposed most meet and best appointed for expedition and riddance of way: yet as fast as he marched, there followed after him three and thirty Ele-Dphants, and so he sate him down closely in a secret valley behind the mountain Tiffata, which overlooketh the City Capua. At the first coming he forced the fort called Gelatia, and compelled the garrison there to quit the place; and then he turned and opposed himself against the enemies who besieged Capua, But he dispatched certain courriers afore unto Capua to signific unto them at what time he minded to let upon the camp of the Romans: that they also at the very instant might be ready to issue forth at every gate of the City to do the like. The Romans having no fore-knowledge by their espials of this occurrence, were mightily terrified: for Annibal himself affailed them one way, and all the Campans as well foot as horfemen (together with the garrifon fouldiers of the Carthaginians under the leading of Fofter and Hanno their captains) fallied out another way. The Romans therefore being driven to their shifts, as well as they might in fo Eindden and fearfull a case, had an eye to this, not to make head altogether one way, and so to leave the rest quite without desence; therefore they divided their forces in this manner among themselves: Appius Claudius opposed himself against the Campans: and Fulvius against Annibal. Claudim Nero the Vice-Prator, with the horsemen belonging to the fixth legion, quartered upon the way that leadeth to Sueffula: and C. Fulvius Flaccus the Lieutenant with the horiemen of Allies, took up his standing, and planted himself over-against the river Vulturnus. The battell began not after the usuall manner, only with shouts and outcries, but besides all other clamours of men neighing of horses, and rustling of armour, there was a multitude of Campans good for no other service of war, placed aponthe wals, who together with ringing and sounding of basons and vessels of brasse (as the manner is in the still dead time of the night, when the moon is in the eclipse) made such an hideous noise, that it cansed even them that were in fight to be amused thereupon, and to liften after it. Appius with small ado repulsed the Campans from the trench and rampier, But Fulvius on the other part had more trouble to deal with Annibal and the Carthaginians, who charged so siercely upon him, that the fixth legion there gave ground and retreated : which being once beat back, a Squadron of Spaniards and three Elephants palled forwards as far as the rampier, and had already broken through the main battell of the Romans: but they were in suspence between doubtfull hope and present danger, thinking one while to break through and pass into the Camp; and doubtfull another while to be excluded from the rest of their companies. F. lvius seeing this sear of the Legion and perill wherein the Camp flood, encourageth and exhorteth Q. Navius and other principall Centurions, to affail valiantly, to kill and hew in pieces that one company of the enemies which were figh-Gting under the counterscarp. "For all now lieth a bleeding, quoth he, and in extream hazard: "for either you must give the enemies way, and then wil they more easily enter into the camp, then they had already pierced through the thick (quadrons of the battell; or elie ye must defeat and "flay them in the place even under the trench. And that (quoth he) were no difficult piece of fer-"vice, confidering they are but few in number, severed and shur our clean from the succour of "theirfellows: and the same Roman battaillon which seemeth now disbanded and open, whiles it is affrighted, if so be it would make head and turn both sides upon the enemy, were able to

" compals round and environ them, and put them to a doubtful hazard, yea, and cut them in pie-H "ces within the midft. Navins had no sooner heard the General speak these words, but he caught the enfign of the second band of Haftati from the enfign-beater and displaied it in the faces of the enemies, threatning to fling it among the midft of them, unless his fouldiers made the better hafte to follow him, and fettle themselves to fight. He was a goodly tall and personable man of body, his brave armor befides fet him out and beautified his person: and withall, the advancing of his enfign on high, drew every mans eye upon him as well enemies as friends. But when he was approached once to the banners of the Spaniards, then from all hands they spared him not, but lan. ced at him their barbed javelins, and the whole battell in manner was bent only against him, Bor neither the multitude of enemies, nor the volley of their shot, was able to repress and rebutther violence of that one man. Likewise M. Attibus a Lieutenant, caused the enfigu-bearer of thefull band of the Principes, belonging to the same Legion, to enter with his ensign upon the cohonand troop of the Spaniards. The Lieurenants also L. Porcius Licinius and T. Popilius, who had the guarding of the camp, fought valiantly upon the rampier in defence thereof, and killed the Elephants upon the very counterfcarp, as they were passing over and entring the camp. And by occation that their bodies filled up the dirch, the enemies had a passage made them into the camp, as it were over a causey or bridge raised of purpose to give them way: and there over the very carkases of the Elephants, there was a cruell flaughter committed. But on the other side of the camp. the Campans and the garrison of the Carthaginians had the repulse already: and under the very gate of Copua which openeth upon the river Vulturnus, there was another skirmish, wherethe k Remans friving to enter the town, were not to much put backard withflood by force of aimed men, as by brakes, scorpions, and other engins of ordnance, which being mounted and planted upon the very gate, discharged shot so violently, that they drawe the enemies farther off, Overand befides the forcible and furious affault of the Romans was danted and suppressed, by reasonthat their General himself, Ap. Claudius, was hurt; who as he was encouraging his men to fight in the very forefront of the vangard, hapned to be wounded with a dart above in his breft under thekft shoulder: yet there were an exceeding number of enemies there flain before the gate, and the rest were driven for fear to make halle and get the City over their heads. Annibal allo perceiving the Cohort of the Spaniards lying along dead, and the camp of the enemies fo manfully defended even to the death : gave overtarther affault, and began to retire his enfigns, and to turn backward L all his faotmen, interpoling his horsemen behind them, for fear the enemy should charge them on the tail. The legions were exceeding eager to purfue after the enemies : but Flaceus commanded to found the retreat, supposing they had done well enough already, and effected two things, to wit, that both the Campans faw in how little flead Annibal served them; and also Annibal himself knew and perceived no less. Some writers that have recorded this battell, set downthat of Annibal his Army there were siam that day eight thousand men, and of Campans three thoufand: that the Carthaginians lost fifteen enfigns, and the Campans eighteen. But in others, I find that the conflict was not fo great, and that the fright was much more than the skimish: for when as the Numidians and Spaniards together with the Elephants brake at unawares into the Roman Camp, those Elephants as they passed through the midst thereof, overshew and M laid along many of the tents and pavilions; and the Sumpter-horses and other beansthere for carriage, with great noise brake their halters, and collars, fled for fear, and baredownall afore them as they went. And that befides this tumultuous fright and confusion, Annibel dealt fraudulently, by lending in among the rest certain that could speak the Latine tongue (for some fuch he had about him) who in the Confuls namegave commandment (fince that the Camp was loft I that every fouldier should make shift for himself, and slie to the next mountains But this deceit was foon elpied and prevented with the loss and slaughter of a number of enemies : and the Elephants were coursed out of the Camp with fire, But howsoever this buell was either begun or ended, the last it was sought there, before that Capua was yielded up and

The Mediastitutious (for so they call the head Magistrate and Governor of the City of Copus for that year, was one Seppius Lesius, a man of base parentage and mean calling. The report goth that his mother upon a time as the made latisfaction in the name of him (being then fatherless and under age) by a purgatory factifice for a prodigious domefical portent, that hapned in herhoule, was told by the Soothsaier out of his learning, that one day the chief government of Caput should befall to that child: whereat, she seeing no likelihood nor hope at all of any such matter, faid thus again, You talk of a poor City of Capna, when that day comes; and God fave all, when my fon shall be advanced to the highest place and government thereof. But these words spokens random and in jest proved afterwards good earnest, and true indeed. For when as the Citizens were driven to great straights, through sword and famine, and were past all hope of recovery in0 fuch fort, as they that were of quality and born for honour, refused to be in place of authority this Lefius complaining that Capua was forlorn betraid, and abandoned by her own nobility took upon him the chief Magistracy, and was the last of all the Campans that bare soveraign me in

Annifal perceiving that neither his enemies would be drawn forth any more to fight: not folfibly he could break through their camp for to come unto Capua: for fear lest that the new Confuls should stop all the passages, and intercept his purveyance of vistuals, determined to disloge

A without effecting his purpole, and to remove from Capua. And as he call and toffed to and froin his mind what courie to take, and whither to go; it came into his head to make no more ado, but to march directly to Rome, the very head and feat-City of the whole war. This was the upfhot of all, and the emprese that he most defired. Howbeit as all others much grieved and greatly blamed him that he had over-flipt the opportunity when it was, even prefently upon the battell at Canne: so himself acknowledged no less that he was mightily overseen. And yet the thing was not so far pull (he thought) that he should despair, but upon some sudden tright and unexpected tumult, he might seize of some quarter of the City or other, And if Rome were once in that hazard, then either both the Roman Generals, or one at the least, would immediatly leave the lege of Cepua, BWho if they had once divided their forces, both of them would be the weaker, and minister either unto him, or to the Campans, some occasion of good fortune. The only thing that troubled his mind was this, for fear left that as foon as his back were turned, the Campans would yield themselves unto the Romans. He therefore with large and liberall rewards induceth a certain Numidian (an audacious and adventurous fellow, one that cared not what dangers he undertook) to bethe carrier of certain letters, and to enter into the camp of the Romans, counterfeiting himfelt to be a sugitive, from the adverse part unto them: and so when he espied his time to slip secretlyfrom the other fide of the camp to Capua. The letters were very comfortable, importing unto them, "That his remove and departure from thence was for their good and fafety, whereby he "meant to withdraw the Roman Captains and their forces from Capua to the defence of their C"own City of Rome: willing them not to let fall their hearts and be discouraged; for by patiene "abiding some sew daies they should be wholly freed and delivered of the siege. Then he made flay of all the shipping and vessels that he could find upon the river Vulturnus, and commanded them to be brought to Casilinum, which he had fortified aforetime with a pile or Castle to guard and keep the place with a garrison. And having intelligence that there was such store of barges and bottoms upon the river, as would ferve to transport in one night his whole army : he made provision of victuals for ten daies, brought down his army by night to the river side, and crossed the water with all his power before the next day-light, But this was not carried fo fecterly, but before that it was effected, intelligence was given thereof by certain runningate fugitives: whereupon Fulvius Flacous addressed his letters unto the Senate of Rome, and gave notice thereof. At D which tidings men according to their fundry fanties and humours were diverfly affected: and as fo fearfull an occurrence required, incontinently the Senate affembled.

P. Cornelius, Jurnamed Afira, was of opinion, that all the Captains and Armies what soever should be called home out of all parts of Italy, without regard of Capua or any other exploit besides, save only the desence of the City, Fabius Maximus thought it was a dishonest, lewd, and a shamefull part, to depart from the fiege of Capua, and to be scared to turn here and there, and to be carried away with every copy of Annibal his countenance, and with his vain threats and menaces. He that won a victory at Canna, and durst not then go forward to the City, hath he conceived any hope now to win Rome, being also lately repulled from Capua? No, he marcheth toward Rome, not minding to befiege it, but hoping to raile the fiege from Capua. And however it Ebe, I am affured (quoth he) that Inpiter (the witness of covenants broken by Annibal) and other gods besides, will defend us with the help of that army which we shall find at home in the City, Between these two opinions P. Valerius Flaceus held the mean, and prevailed : for he having a regard and due confideration, both of the one and the other; thought good to write unto the Colonels that lay before Capua, and to certifie them what strength they had of able men to defend the City: as for the forces of Annibal, and what power was needfull to maintain the fiege at Capea, they themselves knew best. Therefore in case that one of the Pro-Consuls there, and part of the army might be spared from thence and sent to Rome, and nevertheless, the seee contime with the conduct of the other Pro-Conful, and the rest of the army: then Claudius and Fulvius should so order the matter between themselves, that the one of them might remain still be-Fore Caput at hege, and the other repair to Rome, for to defend and keep their native country from the same danger, Hereupon the Senate agreed, and made an Act: which being brought unto Ca-Q. Fulvius the vice-Conful who was to go to Rome, by reason that his Collegue was sick of his hurr, chose our of the three armies certain companies of fouldiers, and fo with fifteen thousand footmen, and one thou land horsemen, passed over the river u all u rate. Then having certain intelligence, that Annibal minded to march along the Latine street way: he took his journey through the towns and burroughs fituate upon the way Appia, and fent his courtiers before unto Seria, Saraand Lavinium, which are feated near unto it, not only for to lay provision of victuals ready for himintheir Cities and towns, but also from the country villages farther out of the way, to bring their provision to that port through-fare: and to draw forces into their towns for their own defence, and every one to stand upon their good guard, and to look unto their state, as well publike

Annihal the same day that he had crossed Vul. urnus encamped not far from the river, And the morrow after entred into the territory of the Sidicins, and led his hoft near unto Celes. There, after he had flaid one day, forraging and spoiling the country, he marched by Suessula, into the teritories of Allfas and Caffinum, by the way of the Latine street. Under the town Cafinum he abode in camp two daies, and railed booties here and there in every place. From thence leaving biterramma and Aquinum, he came into the country about Fregelle, as far as to the river Livie, where he found the bridge cut down by the Fregellans for to impeach and let his journey. Fulvi-H uslikewife was staid at the river Vulturius, by reason that the barges and bottoms were burnt by Annibal: and much ado he had, for the great scarcity of timber and wood, to make punts and boats for to fet over his army. But Fulvius, after he had once transported his men in such boats and planks as he made shift withall, had afterwards no hindrance in his journey; but found not only flore of victuals in the Towns and Cities as he travelled, but also plenty thereof brought ready for him to the waies fide right curteoully. Then the fouldiers as they marched on foot cheered and encouraged one another to mend their pace and make speed, confidering they went to the defence of their naturall country. Now there was a post sent from Fregella, who rode night and day and never made stay, and he put the City in exceeding sear. The running together I befides of the people, that ceased not to make every thing more than it was, and to inventione. what of their own fingers ends, and put it to the news that they heard, made a greater hurry than the messenger himself, and set the City in an uprore. And not only the women wereheald to weep and wail in their own private houses: but also from all parts the Dames of the City came flocking into the streets, running about to all the Churches and Chappels of their gods and goddesses, sweeping the Altars with the tresses of their hair hanging down, kneeling upon the bare ground and stretching out their hands up toward heaven unto the gods, pouring out their pray. ers and supplications, That they would vouchfale to preserve the City of Rome out of the hands of the enemies, and to fave the Roman wives and their little children from harm and all abuse The body of the Senat gave attendance upon the Magistrates in the common place, readytogice K them their advice and counsell. Some re eive of them direction, and departed every manto execute his charge: others offer themselves to the Magistrates, to be employed in any service whatfoever Sundry guards were bestowed in the Cattle, in the Capitoll, and upon the walls : all places about the City were well manned. The Alban mountain also and the Castle of Tusculum were furnished with good garrisons. Amidst this alarm tidings came, that Q. Fulvius the Pro-Confel. was departed from Capua, and onward on his journey to Rome with an army. And because he should not be abridged of his power and authority, after he was come into the City, there was a decree granted out of the Senat-House, that Q. Fulvius should have as large a commission of rule and command as the Confuls themselves. Annibal, after he had made fouler work and havock in the territory of Fregella, than in other places, for anger that they had cut down the bridges a I gainst his coming, led his army through the Frusinat, Ferentinat, and Anagnine countries, and came forwards into the territory Lavicos: and fo by Algidum he marched toward Tufculum. And when he could not be let in there within the walls, he descended beneath Tusculum, on the right hand to Gabi: from whence he conducted his army into Pupiniu, and eight miles from Rome encamped. The nearer the enemy approached to the City, the greater flaughter was made of the peafants that fled from him, by his vancurriers, the Numidian light-horsemen whomhe tent afore to make riddance. And many there were of all conditions and ages that were taken

In this cumultuous trouble, Fulvius Flaceus with his army entred Rome at the gate Capena: from whence he went through the midft of the City, along the street Carina into the Exquilia, M and from thence he went forth, and between the gates Exquilina and Collina pitched his tents, Thither the Ædiles of the Commons brought victuals: the Conful and the Senate refored to him into the camp, where they fate in Council about the State of the Common-weal, And agreed It was, That the Con.uls should lie encamped likewise about the gates Colling and Exquilina: that C. Calpurnius, Prator of the City. should have the keeping of the Capitoll and the Calle with a guard, and that the Senators keep refidence continually in good number within the compais of the Forum, what need foever there should be of their counsell and advice, against all fudden accidents. By this time Annibal was come forward as far as to the river Anio, and within three miles of the City lay encamped where he kept a flanding Leaguer. But himself in person with 2000 horizmen advanced forward toward the gate Collina, even as far as to Herculer his N Temple, and rode all about as near as he well could, to view the walls, and the fituation of the City. Flaceus took foul difdain thereat, and thought it a shamefull indignity, that he should brave it at his pleasure so scornfully without revenge, whereupon he sent out certain of his own Cavalry, and gave commandment, That they should set the enemies horsemen farther off, and chase them back into their Camp. Whiles they were in skirmish together, the Consuls gave order, that the Numidian horsemen, such as were fled from the enemy, and turned to the Romans (who were at that time to the number of twelve hundred upon the Aventine hill) fhould pass through the midft of the City to the Exquilie: supposing that there were none more men than they, for to fight among the valleys, the garden houses, the sepulchres and hollow walls on every fide. Whom, when some from the Castle and the Capitoll, espied riding downtheo descent of the hill, called Clivus Puplius, they ran crying about the City, The Aventine istakes, The Aventine is taken. Which alarm cauled a tumult, and gave luch an occasion of feat, and moning away, that if the Camp of Annibal had not been without the walls, the fearfull multipule doubtless would have abandoned and quit the City. But they took their houses, and got ently man up to the terraffes and leads thereof: from whence they pelted with stones and other store their own friends instead of enemies, as they rode scattering one from another in the street. This tumule could not be repressed, nor the error appear, by reason that the waies were so pellete

A with a number of the country peafants, and of cattell befides, whom fudden fear had driven into the City, Howbeit, the horfemen fought fortunately and the enemies were removed and fer back. And because it was necessary to flay all disorders and uprores that chanted upon small occasions to arise, it was thought good and agreed upon, that all those who had been either Didators, or born the office of Centors, should have their full power and authority uptill such time as the enemy was clean departed from about the walls, And that was to good purpose: corall the rest of that diy, and the night following, there were divers and fundry garboites, without any cause or occasion raised, and the same stilled and appeased by that means.

The next day Annibal passed over Anio, and brought forth all his whole power into the field. Bletisher were Flacur and the Coniuls behind hand for their pares, but ready for battedl. When both armies stood arranged in order on both sides; amuted upon the title and event of that one fight, which was for no less a prize and reward to the victorious part, than the very City of Romei, there fell such a mighty storm of rain and hall regetter, and so troubled both hosts, that they could scarce hold their weapons in hand, but were driven to retire themselves for sitery into their severall Camps, feating not singless than their own enemies. The morrow after likewise, when they stood in the same place in battell array, the liketempest parted them altinder. And they were not so soon retired into their Camp, but the day was wonderful fair; and the weather

The Carthaginians took this for an ominous presage to them of illluck. And Anni al was heard (by report) to fay, That one while his mind, another while his fortune, would not give him leave to win the City of Rome. There were other occurrences besides, as well final as great that discouraged him and abated his hope. Of more importance was this, that whiles he lay with his hoffin arms before the walls of Rome, he understood, there were certain companies with banners displaied sent into Spain for to supply the armies there. Of less reckoning was this that he was advertiled by a certain captive, how the very same plot of ground whereon he was encamped, hapned at the same time to be fold : not underfoot, but at the full price and nothing abated. This he took to be to prefumptuous a part, and fuch a fcornfull indignity, namely, that there should be a chapman found at Rome, to make purchase of that pie e of land, which he was possessed of and held in right of arms, that prefently he called for the publike crier and trumpet, and gave commandment unto him, to proclaim port-fale of all the shops of Bankers and money changers at that time about the Forum in Rome. Nevertheless, hereupon he was moved to dislodge and retired his camp backwards from the City to the river Inria, fix miles from Rome. From whence he took his way to the grove of Feronia, where stood a Temple, in those daies much renowned for wealth and riches. The inhabitants thereabout were certain Capenats, who used to bring thither the first fruits of their corn and revenues yea and many other oblations besides, according to their flore: by means whereof they had adorned and garnished it with much gold and filver. Of all those gitts and offerings was this Temple then robbed and spoiled. But after the departure of Anmbalirom thence there were found great heaps of braft, by reason that the souldiers upon touch and remorfe of conscience, had cast in many brazen pieces. The farking and pillage of this Temple, Eall writers do agree upon, and make no doubt thereof. Caling faith, That Annitai as he went toward Rome from Eretum, turned thither, and he setteth down the beginning of his journey from Reste Cited a and from Amiternum. And that out of Campania, he came into Samnium, and rom thence into the country of Peligni, and to passed beside the City Sulmo, to the Marucins, and then by the territory of the Albenies into the Marfians land, and from thence he marched to Amiternum, and so forward to the town Foruli. Neither is there any errour or doubt in all this, because the marks and tokens of the voyage of fo great an army could not within the memory and compass of so small an age be confounded and worn out. For certain it is, that he passed that way, The only difference lieth herein, whether he came to the City of Rome, or returned from thence imo Campania, by that way aforefaid.

Now was not Annibal to retolute to defend Capua, but the Romans were as fully bent, and more eager to continue the fiege and affault thereof. For he fped himself so fast another way in his voyage back, first out of the Lucans country to the Brutians, and so on still to the streight of Sicili) and to Rhegium; that with his fudden coming thither, he surprised them at unawares, even before they heard of his arrivall. As for Capua, albeit in the time of Fulvius his ablence it was no leisstraightly beleagured, yet it felt the coming again of Flaceus: and befides, there was much marrell there, why Annibal returned not back as well as he. Afterwards, they understood, by conference with some that were without, how they were for sken and for orn of Annibal, and that the Carthaginians were past all hope to keep and hold Capua still to their own use. There was an Edich moreover of the Pro-Conful, passed by order from the Senat, and the same published and divulged among the enemies, That what Citizen soever of Capaa would turn to the Romans before such a certain day he should have a generall pardon. But there was no coming in, nor ranging to the Romans fide; for fear of punishment at the Romans hands more than for any regard of their allegiance to the Carthaginians: because their transgression and trefpals in their former revolt was fogreat, that it might not be abandoned. And as no one man at all privatly on his own head came over to the camp of the Romans, so there was no good order taken by publike councill for the benefit and fafety of the whole City. The Noblemen had given over managing of state-matters, and could not be brought by any means to assemble in the Senat.

And

And in chief place of government was he, who had not won to himself any honour thereby, but his unworthinels was derogatory to the authority and power of that Magistracy which he bate For now there was not one of the chief Citizens and Noblemen that would be fo much as feen in the Market place or Common Hall of affemblies: but shutting themselves within doors in their privat houses, they expected every day for the destruction of their country, together with their own undoing and overthrow. The whole charge and care lay upon Boftar and Hanno Captains of the garrilon in the fort there of the Carthaginians, and more carefull were they of their own welfare, than fearfull for the jeopardy of their triends and Allies. These two wrote letters unto Annibal, endited not only in plain terms and frankly, but also sharply and bitterly: wherein they laid unto his charge, "That he had not only betraied Capua into the hands of the enemies, but also ! "delivered and exposed them and the garrison to the cruell clutches of the Romans to be mass." "cred and executed. That he was gone his waies, and departed into the country of the Brutinas one that turned away his face of purpole, because he would not see with his own eyes the loss "of Capna, But, I wot the Romans contrariwite could not be withdrawn from the fiege of Ca-* pua, no, not by the affaulting of the City of Rome: fo much more were the Romans refoline enemies, than the Carthaginians contiant triends. But if he would return again to Capus, and "bend the full force of his war thither, both they and the Citizens also of Capua would be ready "to fally forth and encounter the enemies. For why, they passed not over the Alps with intento 66 war with the Rhegins and Tarentins; no but where the Roman Legions were, there ought the " armies of the Carthaginians to be. Thus at Canna, thus at Thrasymenus were the victories at I "chieved, by affronting and meeting the enemy, by joyning camp to camp, and by hazarding the "fortune of the battell. To this effect were the letters penned, and given to certain Numidian; who for a good reward had offered their service before, for the lafe carriage and delivered them. These fellows presented themselves before Flaccus in the Camp, in habit and quality offergitives unto his fide hoping to fpy out some convenient time when they might give nim the sin and be gone. Now by occasion of the famine which had continued long in Capus there was none but might pretend a good and reasonable cause to depart from thence to the adverse part, But behold, there hapned a Capuan wench to come into the leaguer (a naughty pack and an harlor, that one of the supposed counterfeit sugitives aforelaid kept.) she enformed the Generall of the Romans, that those Numidians, fraudulently and by covin pretended to flie unto his past and and L letters about them unto Annibal. This would the stand to and be ready to aver to the very face of one of them, who bewrayed & disclosed the plot unto her. At first, when he was brought toubleforeher he fet a jolly countenance of the matter & made it very flrange & pretending flourly that he knew not the woman; but by little and little he was convicted by manifest truths, and epecially when he faw that they called for the rack, and that he was upon the point to be put totorture: and to in the end confessed that all was true, and therewith brought forth the letters, Over and belides, another thing was now revealed, which before was kept close and secret; to wit that there were other Numidians besides, who under the colour of sugicives had gone up and downin the Roman camp: of these there were apprehended not so few as threescore and ten, and they rogether with the new were whipped with rods, had their hands cut off, and fent backagaintoll Capua. This pitious spectacle and fight of so fearfull execution killed their courage, and brake the very heart of the Campans. Whereupon the people ran together unto the Council-House, and compelled Lessus to assemble a Senat, and openly threatned the Nobles (who a long time had abfented themselves from publike consultations) that unless they would now repair into the Sens, they would go home to their very houses, and pluck them out by the ears into the fireet. For lear hereof the chief Magistrate had a frequent and full assembly of Senators. Whiles all the rest were of opinion to fend Embassadors to the Roman Generals, Vibius Virius (who had beenthethit cause and principall author of their first revolt from the Romans) being demanded his adrice, fpake to the point in this manner.

"They that talk of Embassadors of peace, and of yielding, little consider and remembereines." of Vibius Viri- " what they would have done, in case the Romans had been at their devotion and mercy, or what as in the Senat " themselves must endure and suffer. For what think ye will become (quoth he) of this present sur-" render of ours, in comparison of that whereby in times past we freely gave unto the Romans "our selves, and all that we had, for to obtain their aid and succour against the Samnits? And " have we fo foon forgot, at what time, and in what condition and state we were when we for "fook and abandoned the people of Rome? Alio, after our revolt, how we most cruelly and 66 shamefully killed their garrison, who we might have dismissed and sent away with their live? "Moreover, how often we have iffued forth against them lying at fiege, and how michieroul " minded we were unto them, yea, and how we have fallied upon them in their camp? Over 100 "besides, call ye not to remembrance, how we called for Annibal to surprise and deleat them? " and (that which of all other is most fresh in memory) how we sent him from hence togist the " affault to Rome? On the contrary fide mark well and call to mind, how maliciously they have "attempted and practifed all hostility against us: by which ye may well know what accounts "make of them, and what ye are to trust unto. For when they had a stranger and forrain com Within Italy, may, when they had Annibal their enemy: when the wars were so hot, that was on a light fire : they puffed by all other affairs, yea they let Annibal himfelf alone, and ha " both their Confuls with two complex Confular armies to befrege and force Capua. This is the

This Oration of Virius, there were more men present that heard with applause and good liking than could find in their hearts to put that in execution which they so well allowed & appro-Ved. The greater part of the Senat; not despairing, but that the elemency of the people of Rome, which had been tried and feen oftentimes in many wars, might be gained and extended also unto them; concluded, to fend Embassadors with commission to yield Capua into the Romans Chands. Some seven and twenty Senators there werethat accompanied Vibius Vivius home to Vibius Vivius his house, and supped with him; and after they had done what they could to drink themselves and divers Se. drunk, and to intoxicate their brains with freely taking in their wine, (thereby to withdraw their nators of caminds from the sence and apprehension of their imminent harm and misery) drunk all of the themselves. poyloned cup abovefaid. This done, and the banquet ended, they role from the table, took one another by the hand embraced each other, taking their last leave, bidding a finall adieu and farewell, and bewailing together with plenteous tears their own misfortune, and the miterable state of their country, fome flaid behind to be burned in one and the same fire for sellowship, others H brake company and departed to their own houses. Capua delive. red to the Romans.

The day following, the gate of Jupiter which flood next over against the Roman Camp, was by the commandment of the Pro-conful opened. Thereat entred one legion and two corners of horsemen, under the leading of C. Fulvius the Lieutenant: who after he had first above all other, things given express order, that all armor of defence, and weapons of offence (which was to be found in Capua) should be brought forth and presented unto him; placed and disposed ar all the I gates, warders fufficient to fee that no petion might poffibly go forth, or be let out: then he laid hold upon the garrilon of the Carthaginians, and commanded the Senators of Capua to repair into the Camp, before the Roman Captain Generals themselves, So soon as they were thither come Graghtwaies they had irons clapped upon them, and were commanded to make tender unto the treasurers of all the gold and silver they had. The gold amounted to 70 pound weight: the silver treasurers of all the gold and silver they had. The gold amounted to 70 pound weight: role to the weight of three thouland and two hundred pound. Five and twenty of the Senators were sent to Calles, eight and twenty to Theanum, to be kept sale in ward. Even those who were known for certain to have principally moved and perswaded the revolt from the Romans. Concerning the punishment of the Senators of Capua, Fulving and Clauding could not agree, Clauding was more tractable and exorable, and might have been foon entreated for a pardon. Fulvius was h more rigorous, and proceeded to a harder course. Whereupon Appin put over the whole deciding and determination thereof unto the Senate of Rome. Alledging, that it was meet and requifite, that the LL of the Councill should have the examination of the cause, and namely upon these points. Imprime, whether they had complotted and combined in this action, with any of the points. Imprime, vites belonging to the flate of the Latines, Item, whether they had any help free burroughs and Cities belonging to the flate of the Latines, Item, whether they had any help and relief from thence in the time of the war, or from any other towns what foever? But F alvise in no case would condescend thereto, nor suffer that the minds of faithfull and loyall allies should be disquieted with doubtfull furmities and suspitions of any crimes; and called in question upon the appeachment and delatory information of those that never yet made reckoning of conscience, either what they did, or what they faid. And therefore he protested to suppress that manner all proceeding, and crush that inquisition for ever, After this communication they departed alunder and Appins made no doubt but that howfoever his Collegue fared and took on, giving out fo Threwd and bitter words, he would yet take paule and flay for the letters from Rome, concerning fo weighty a bufine sas this was. But Fulvius, because of his designment, brake up his keeping of flate in his royall pavilion, and fent his officers and ordinary train out of the way, becautehe would not be hindred and empeached by them, in the course of his designment; and commanded the Colonels and Captains of the Allies to give warning unto two thousand choicen men of arms, for to be in readines and present themselves at a third sound of the trumper. With this power of horsemen he set forward by night, and marched to Theanum: and by break of day entredthe gate and kept his way on into the market-place. At the first entrance of the horiemen, the pro-M ple rain together from all parts: then he caused the chief Magistrate (a Sidicin) to be called, and charged him to produce his prifoners the Capuans, whom he had in custody. When they were all brought forth, they were first whipped with rods, and then beheaded. From thence herode upon the spur to Cales: where so soon as he was set on the Tribunal seat, in place of judgement, and the Capuan prisoners likewise presented in place and bound to the stake; there came a horseman in post from Rome, and when he had delivered letters from C. Calpharnius the Conful, and the people of Rome unto Futurus; there ran a rumour from the Tribunal through aline assembly, that the whole process against the Campans was to be put off and reserved entire to the centure and doom of the Lords of the Senate. And Falvius supposing it to be no less indeed alter he took the letters, never brakethem up, but bellowed them in his bosome, and gave com N mandment to the Crier, to charge the Listor or executioner to do his office, according to be. Thus they also that were at Gales were executed and suffered death. Then he read the letters and the order fet down by the Senate: but it was too late now, to ftay that which was done alrudy and past and which indeed was hastened with all speed that might be, for fear it might have been crossed and prevented.

Now as Fulvius was arising from the bench, Taurea Jubellius, a Campan, passing amids the Now as Fulvius was arising from the bench, Taurea Jubellius, a Campan, passing amids the chrong, called by name aloud upon Fulvius. Whereat Flaceus wondring what the man mean, far him down again upon his seat, and demanded what he would: Mary (quoth he) command me also to be killed that thou maiest boast and glory another day, that thou hast done to death abeat on the killed that thou maiest boast and glory another day, that thou hast done to death abeat or man by far and much more valiant than thy selfs Surely (quoth Flaceus) this sellow is lunation and not well in his wits: and again, were I minded to take, his life from him, I am inhibitedly and not well in his wits: and again, were I minded to take, his life from him, I am inhibitedly write of the act of the Senate. "Then (quoth Jubellus) since that my country is forced and self, write and children, because they should infer no vilianous indignity; and may not my self with a die this death which my countrimen here have suffered before my face, I will seek by vertue and manhood to ease my self of this life, so tedious, so irksome, and odious unto me and with

with that, he drew forth the skein which he had hid under his garment, and stabled himself in Jubellium ka the breft quite through his body, and there at the feet of the L. General fell down ready to due in leth himfelf. the place. Foralmuch as both the execution of the Campans, and also the most part of other matters were performed according to the will of Flacens alone: fome there be that write how Appius Claudius died about the time that Capua was yielded. And that this very fame Taurea neither came to Cales of his own accord, nor killed himself: but that as he was a binding to the flake, because the words which he uttered could not be heard for the confused noise of the people, therefore Flaccier commanded filence, and then Taurea spake those words before rehearsed, namely That himself a right valuant and hardy man was put to death by a meaner person than himself. and much inferior to him in valour and vertue. Whereat by the commandment of the Pro-Con-Rinl the crier pronounced and faid: Go to Serjeant, let this brave and valiant man have the more ftore of rods bestowed upon him, let him have good scourging, lay on load, and set the lashes surely on, and let him be the first that you proceed against let him have the law to the full Some there be that have written, how the act of the Senat was read before he proceeded to the beheading; but because there was this branch or clause within the act. That if he thought so good he should referre the whole deciding of the matter unto the Senat : he contirued it thus, that it was put to his discretion for to weigh and confider what was more profitable to the Common-weal. This done, he returned from Cales to Capua. Arella and Calaria were both furrendred into his hands ; where they also who were the chief heads of those states suffered the like punishment. Thus there were about four score of the Senators put to death: and to the number well-near of three hundred C Capuans (born of noble blond) committed to prifon. Others of them were bellowed in fale cuftody within divers Cities of the Latines, and came to fundry unhappy ends. The multitude befides

of the Campan Citizens were fold outright. It remained now to put to question and debate, what was to be done with the City and the Territory thereto belonging And some were of mind, that a City so exceeding mighty, to near a neighbour, and so dangerous to Rome, should be utterly rased and destroyed, But the consideration of a present commodity and gain took place and prevailed. For in regard of the territory and land lying about it (which was well known to be the most fertile toil in all Italy, and yielded all manner of fruit) the City was faved: whereinto those husbandmen that tilled the grounds might. retire themselves and dwell. And for the peopling and inhabiting thereof, there was a multitude preferved of the Inhabitants which were there already, namely of Libertines and enfran hifed bondflaves, Merchants factors, retailers, artizans, and craftimen who kept there fill and remained. But the whole territory and all publike edifices were feized to the use of the people of Rome. Moreover, order was taken, that Capua should be inhabited only, and replenished with people like a City: but no form of Common-weal, no Corporation no Senat, no affembly of Commons, nor Magistrate of their own should be allowed there. For without a common Council of State, without magistracy and government, without intelligences and reciprocall commerce, as in the body of a Commonalty, they supposed, that they would never agree together in any complot, but be far unmeet to contrive a conspiracy and compass alteration. As for a Provost or Governor to minister law, and execute justice among them, they putposed to send them one yearly from Rome. E Thus were the affairs ordered and composed at Capua, by a good policy and commendable course every way. For those that were most in fault and guilty were punished with rigour, and that speedily. The number of Citizens were scattered and dispersed fundry waies, without all hope to returnagain. The bare houses and walls that had not offended they were spared, and neither burned nor pulled down. And besides, the commodity and gain that accrewed unto the Romans by this manner of proceeding, they won some name of clemency and mercy among their Confederates and Allies: in that they faved a most noble and wealthy City, at the ruins whereof all Campane, and as many States as bordered about Campane, would have grieved much, and grouned again. By this means also the enemy was constrained now to coasels, and could not otherwise chule, how powerful and mighty the Romans were to chastife and punish their faithless affociats, Fyea, and how feeble Annibal was, and not able to defend and maintain those whom he had received into his protection.

The Roman Pro-Confuls after they had finished and performed their charge at Capua affigned unto Claudius Nero fix thousand footmen out of those two Legions which he had before Capua, and three hundred horsemen which he had chosen himself: also of Latine Allies as many stoot in number, and 800 horse before, This army Nero embarked at Putesis, and transported into Spain. When he was arrived at Taracon, after he had there landed his souldiers, and laid up his ships in dock, and armed with all his mariners (to make the greater number.) he marched to the river Ibstrustine he received the Forces of T. Fonteins, and L. Martius, and from thence advanced toward the enemies.

Aldubal the fon of Amilear lay encamped at a place called the Black flones, in the Auserans country it lieth between the towns Illings and Menissa. Now Nero kept the narrow trieghts of the forset there. Assimilarly because he would not be pent up in so freight a room, fent an heald or messenger of peace to him, who should make promise in his name, that if Nova would print him to pass peace ably stom thence, he would withdraw all his soccess out of $p.om. The Roman Captain rook this message the menday, and device together how the Romans would fee down conditions and articles in writness of the stop of the stop of the Romans would fee down conditions and articles in writness.

The Senators of Capua exe-

ting, as touching the iendry and delivery of the fortresses inevery City, and likewise of prefix-H ing fome day, by which time the garrifons should be removed and displaced, and the Carthaging fome day, by which time the garrifons should be removed and displaced, and the Carthaging mans have away all their bag and baggage without fraud and covin, Afarubat having obtained his request, prejently commanded, that in the very evening, and all night long the heaviest and ms request, presently sometimes who was the same should eleape what way foever they could out of the most cumbersome part of his whole army should eleape, what way foever they could out of the gullet of the forrett. But he gave especial direction, that they should not over many of them that night go forth, because their small number was not only fitter to deceive the enemy, and not so soon to be discovered, but also might more easily pass through those narrow and difficult passages. So the morrow they came to an enterview and parl: where the time was spent of purpole in much needlels talk, and drawing of books, more than cause was: whereupon the day being far gone, the business was put off unto the next day. And the night enthing between m. I niffred Afarabal more time to fend others away. And yet could not they make an end that day neither. Thus there passed certain daies, emploied in open shew about dispute and reasoning of the articles and conditions of agreement, and the nights were bestowed in letting our the of the annues and constitution Camp, Now, after that the greater part of his hoft was gone away clear, then he began to wrangle and jar, yea, and to go from some offers that he had voluntarily made, and ever they were further and lutther off from agreement. For Afarshal the less that he feared, the less alto was to be trusted. And by this time in manner all his Infanty were got out of the forrest, and the next morning, not only the forrest, but all the plains about were overcast, and covered with a thick and foggy mist. Which Astrobal perceiving, he sen amessenger to Nero, requesting to deser their farther conserence and communication to the morrow; pretending, that the present day was a festivall holy-day among the Carthaginians, and therefore they made a ruple upon it to follow any other business but serve God. All this while there was no fraud fo much as once inspected. Astrubal had no sooner obtained respite for that day, but forthwith he and all his Cavalry, together with his Elephants, dislodged, and without any noise or fir recovered without any harm a place of security. By the sourth hour of the day the fun had dispatched and scattered the mitt, and cleared the sky, and then the Romans might discover the Camp of their enemies empty, and no creature left therein. Then at length, Classdins perceiving that Afarabal had shewed him a Carthaginian trick, and that he was at length thus over-raught by his fallhood and cunning practice, began to make out after him, mirding to bid him battell. But the enemy would none of that, and iell off. Howbeit there passed some finall skirmishes between the rereward of the Carthaginians, and the forlorn hope and vancourtiers of the Romans. Amidft these affairs (the States of Spain) neither they who revoked after the overthrow of the Romans, returned again unto them; nor any new fell away, more than

At Rome, the Senate and people after the recovery of Capua, took as great care for Spain now, as for Italy it felf. And agreed they were in generall, that the army there should be fireighted with new forces and a Generalithither lent: but who should be the man was not yet concluded, Forasmuch as they were to take some extraordinary care in the chusing of one to be sent thinker, where two fingular and renowned warriors were flain within the compals of thirty dales, and to fucceed in the room of those twain. Whiles some nominated one, and some another, at length M they grew to this point, that the people should hold a solemn assembly (as it were, purchased) for election of a Pro-Conful to go over into Spain. And the Confuls accordingly proclaimed a fet day for the faid affembly. At first there, was great expectation that those persons who took themselves worthy of so great command should put forth themselves, and prefer their own names beforehand. But when this expectation failed and came to nothing, every man began afreli to retricate and renew the former grief, and mourn again for the losses received, and to find the want and miss of so valorous Captains whom they had lost. Whereupon the whole City being fad and penive, and in manner destitute of all good counsell, and not resolved what to do in this hard case, came yet down into Mays field upon the day appointed for the election. Every mans eye was upon the Magistrates, and beheld the countenances of their great menand Ru-N lers, how they looked one upon another, grieving and grumbling, that the State, was at lo low an ebb, and the Common-weal grown to io desperate a case, that no man durst be seen toute upon him the government and Province of Spain. Then all of a fudden, P. Cornelius (his fon that was flain in Spain, a young Gentleman, not fully four and twenty years old I shewedhimfelf, and faid, That he would undertake that charge upon him: and therewith stepped up into an higher place, from whence he might be teen and there he flood, Upon whom, when all menhad cast their eyes, and viewed him well, in a general accord and savourable affection unto the man, they wished unto him firaight waies a happy and forminate government. And when the assenbly was willed to give their fuffrages, and go to a ferutiny, there was not one Century from the first to the last, nor one perion from the highest to the lowest, but gave their voice with P. Se'0 pio, for to take a voyage as L. Deputy into Spain. But after the thing was passed, and their passe onate heat of affection once allaied, they were on a sudden driven into a still silence and dep dumpy to think what a strange and new deed they had done. And that which they bethought themselves most of, was this, that favour had carried them away in this action more than the dub confideration and regard of his age. Somethere were that had in dread and horror the only nous fortune also of that family; and the name of him that out of two mournfull houses was to

A so into those Provinces where he must fight amongst the Sepulchres both of father and micle. When Scipio per eived, that presently upon the election passed in io hasty a fit, the people grew to be heavy and pensive; he called them to an open audience, and there before them all discoursed of his young age, of the government committed unto him, and of the future war that he was to manage: and that with fo noble courage and hauty spirit, that he renewed afresh and kindled again the former zeal and heat that was so cooled and possessed mens minds with more affired hope than ulually mans faithfull promile, or reason grounded upon the confidence of precedents path, or any earthly thing is wont to afford and warrant. For Scipto was a rare and wonderfull man, not only in regard of those true vertues inherent in him : but also for that he had framed B himself even from his young and tender years, by artificiall means, to the better letting out of those inbred parts and qualities of his own: making shew and semblant before the multitude, that the most things which he did, were either represented unto him by night-visions and apparitions, or ele suggested, as it were, by revelation from the gods above; were it that he was superfitionfly given, and his mind wholly possessed therewith, or that by his policy he might effect his designments, and have his commandments performed with more expedition, as if they were directions delivered from the Oracles and the very mouth of the gods. Over and besides that, he made this overture to credit and reputation, and prepared mens minds in this fort from his very first beginning. From the very time that he ente put on his mans gown, there was no day went over his head, but before he began his own private buliness or enterprised any publike affairs, he C would go into the Capitoll and fo foon as he was entred into the Temple, therefit him down. and alone by himself bestow a good time in some secret He and corner thereof. This ordinary manner of his, which he continued all his life long, (were it of purpose consideratly, or by chance madviledly) made divers men beleeve verily, that it was a truth indeed, which was commonly supposed and reported, That the man had a god to his father. Which deep and setled imagination of the people, refembled and renewed again the like fame (in all the world) to that which went before and was bruited abroad of Alexander the great, and for the vanity and fabulous speech of folk, was the very same and all one in every respect: namely, that his mother conceived him by a mighty great serpent : for that very often in her bed-chamber there was seen some such prodigious and wonderfull thing, and ever as any body came in, it would wind away of a fudden, and va-D nish out of fight. These strange and miraculous conceits he would never himself elevate and discredit as toles and vanities, but rather cherish and encrease the opinion thereof, by a certain cunning cast of his own, in that he would neither deny and disavow any such matter, nor yet affirm plainly and verifie the same. Many other devices he had of like fort, partly true indeed, partly feigned and counterfeit, which caused men beyond all measure to have this young man in wondefull admiration. Upon the firong and grounded presumption whereof, the City at that time conferred upon him flar unmeet, I wot, in regard of his unripe years) fo great a government, and a world withall of weighty and important affairs. Besides, the forces which remained in Spain of the old army, and those which were transported over from Puteoli with Claudius Nero, he had a supplement also of ten thousand foot, and one thouland horsemen : and to affist in the conduct of his wars, he had as coad jutor appointed unto him M.Junius Syllanus the Pro Prator. Thus with a fleet of thirty ships, (and Galleys there were all of five banks of oars) he took the leas, and fet fail from the mouth of Tybre, and coasting along the Tuscan seas under the Alps, and through the gulph of Gallia, he doubled at length the point and cape of Pyrene; and disbarked at Emperia a City of Greeks: (for descended they are also from Phocasa) and there he fet his people a land. From thence, having taken order that his ships should follow after, he marched by land to Taracon, which he appointed for the Rendezvouz, where all his allies and confederats (for at the wonder and fame of his landing, there flocked Embaffadors unto him from all parts of the Province) should meet together at a generall Diet. There he commanded that the ships should be bestowed in their docks, save only three Galleys (of three ranks) which came from Massides, and upon curtesse and kindness accompanied him from home, and those were sent back again. Then he gave audience to the Embassadors, who hung in doubtfull suspence by reason of the variety and of sundry changes and chances that lately had hapned, and to them he began to return aniwer, and give them their severall dispatches: but with fuch a spirit and boldnels (upon considence that he had in his own rare rettues) that he let not fall in all his speech one word that might move quarrell, and savoured of rigour, and yet whatsoever he spake, it carried an exceeding majesty with it, and a singular credit. Being departed from T_{d^*apon} , he visited both the States of the Allies, and also the standing wintting camps of the army: where he highly commended the fouldiers, for that notwithstanding they had received two thread blows, upon two fo great defeats one in the neck of another, yet they held the Province fill, and kept the field; and not suffering the enemies to reap and taffe the fruit of their fortunate victories, and kept them out of all the countries lying within Iberus, and defended faithfully all their confederats according to the trust reposed in them, Martius he had in his train alwaies about him; whom he so highly honoured, that it was very well seen, he seared nothing less than that any other map thould eclipic or shadow his glory. Then Syllanus succeeded in place of Nero, and the new fouldiers were brought into the standing winter leaguers, and Scipio having reviewed all the ities and the States that he was to survey, and performed all other affairs that were then to be done, retired and withdrew himself to Taraco n.

The fame of Scipio was no less bruited among the enemies, thanit was rife with his own Ci- H tizens and loving allies: and a ceitain prefage went withall of the future event, which carried (as good hap was) the greater fear and dread with it, as there was lefs reason that could be rendred and given thereof. They had betaken themselves into their wintring harbours far distant and remore afunder. Afdrubal the fon of Gifgo even as far as to the Ocean fea fide unto Gades: Mago into the midland parts, and especially above the forest and chase of Castule. And Astrobal the son of Amilear wintred nearest unto Iberus about Saguntum.

The fix and twentieth Book of T Livius.

In the very end of that fummer, when Capua Was won, and Scipio come into Spain, the Carthaginian Armado which was fent for out of Sicily to Taremam for to intercept the victuals and empeach the same for coming to the Roman garrison that held the Castle of Tarentum, had rerily ftopped all the passages from the sea to the said Castle: but by their long abode in those parts, I and keeping the leas to firaightly, they had cauled a greater dearth and fearthy of victuals among and recomb the control of the contro fo much corn be along the river that was policifed by friends, nor from the open ports, for to furnish the townsmen of Tarenum, as the navy it self consumed and spent in maintenance of that rabble of fea-men, failers, and mariners, mingled of all forts of people. So as the garrifon of the Castle being but sew in number there was able to be sustained by the provision they had sfore. hand, without the help of any new brought in unrothem: whereas the Tarentins and the Navy could not have sufficient conveighed unto them: by reason whereof, at length the Armado had leave to depart thence with more thanks of the City, than they had for their first bren wenuthither, And yet victuals were not much cheaper, because when the help by sea was gone therecould k

At the end of the very lame fummer, when M. Marcellus was come to the City out of Sicily, his own Province, C. Calphurnius the Prator affembled the Senat for his sake in the Temple of Bullona, Where, after he had discoursed of the acts by him atchieved, and complained after a mild and modelt fort, laying open his griefs, not fo much in the behalf of himself, as of his fouldits: in that when he had performed and accomplished his charge and commission in his Province, he con'd not have licente to bring home his army with she demanded that he might be allowed to ride intriumph into the City: but he could not obtain it. This matter was much canvaffed and debated, pro Comra, Whether it were less meet and convenient to deny him triumphoing now present, in whose name whiles he was absent, for the fortunat success and good speed of all at L fairs under his conduct and government, there was a folemn procession decreed, and facilities done to the honour of the immortall gods: or to grant him triumph (as if the war werefully finished) whom the Senate had commanded to make over his army to his successor; which surely they would never have decreed, but that the war remained fill within the Province : and effectally feeing the army it felf was away, the best witness simply, whether he had deserved a triumph orno. At length, a middle and indifferent course between both was agreed upon, namely that he should enter the City ovant in a petry triumph. And the Tribunes of the Commons, by the approbation first of the Senate, proposed unto the people, that M. Marcellus should the sameday that he came ovant into the City retain fill his full authority and government. The day before he entred the City, he rode in triumph upon the mount Albanus, and from thence, in ovent withhely fent a rich booty before him into the City. There was carried in this pomp the counterfeit of the City Syracufe won, crosbows, brakes, standing flings, and all other warlike instrument: beldes, the ornaments testifying long and continual peace, and the great wealth and treasure of the Kings: as divers vessels of filver and brass curiously wrought; other houshold furniture allogid hangings of tapiflry, and garments of great price; many goodly images and right noble flaues, wherewith Syracule was adorned and beautified, even with the best and principal Cities of Grant, In token also of a victory over the Carthaginians, there were eight Elephants brought in a flew. And that which was not the leaft fight and spectacle to behold, Sofithe Syracusan, and Meine the Spaniard went afore with crowns of gold upon their heads. The one of them was the guide when Syracufe was entred in the night featon; and the other betraied Nafor, and the garrifon there, N Both these were enfranchised Citizens of Rome, and had fifty acres of land a piece granted unto them for ever, Softhad his land fet out in the territory of Spracufe, which either belonged to the Kings, or to the enemies of the people of Rome, and a dwelling house (chuse where he would in Spracuse of all those that were seized upon by right of conquest.) As for Mericus and the Spinists that with him fled from the enemies, and fided unto the Romans, they had affigned unto them a City to inhabit, and land to occupy in Sicily, which fometime belonged to them that had revolved from the people of Rome. And order was given to M. Cornelius for to appoint them the taid City and land where loever he thought good. And in the same territory there were allotted and set us tour hundred acres of land unto Belligenes, by whose means Mericus was allured and inducedo leavethe adverte part and turn to the Romans,

After that Marcellus was departed out of Sicily the Navy of the Carthaginians disbarked eight thou and footmen and three thou and Numidian horsemen, Unto them revolted the Murginian land, and Hybla, together with Magella: and other small piles of base account, took examble by them and followed after. The Numidians with their Captain Munines, ranged over all Swift and red the towns and villages belonging to the affociats of the people of Rome. Over and befilted this, the Roman army there, being discontented and angry, partly, for that together with their General and angry, partly, for that together with their General and angry, partly, for that together with their General and angry, partly, for that together with their General and angry, partly, for that together with their General and angry, partly, for that together with their General and angry, partly, for that together with their General and angry, partly, for that together with their General and angry, partly, for the together with their General and angry, partly, for the together with their General and angry, partly, for the together with their General and angry, partly, for the together with their General and angry, partly, for the together with their General and angry, partly, for the together with the second and the s

Anerall, they were not licenced to go out of the Province: and parrly, for that they were forbidden and debatred, for wintring in any good towns; demeaned themselves slackly and lazily in their military service: in such sort, as if there had been a head to lead them, as they had a heart to move them they would have mutined and rebelled. Among these troubles and difficulties, M. Corneliwithe Prator, both appealed and mittigated the itomacks of the fouldiers, as well by comfortable words, as by rebukes and checks: and also brought under his obedience and subjection, all those Cities which had revolted Of which he according to the former act of the Senate, allotted Murgantia to the Spaniards, unto whom both a City and land to it was by order aforesaid due. Both the Confuls who had the government of the Province Apulia, feeing there was less cause of fear Band terrour now from the Carthaginians and Annibal, were commanded to cast lots between them forthe Provinces of April a and Macedonia, So Macedonia befell unto Sulpiting, and he fucceeded there inflead of Levinus. Fulvius was fent for home to Rome, about the election of the Confuls. And when he held the folemn affembly of the people, for the choice and creation of the Coff The Century of the younger Citizens, which had the prerogative to give their first voice, declared T. Manlius Torquatus, and T. Octacilius for Contuls. Manlius being there present in place. when the multitude came about him to congratulate with God give you joy &c. (for that there was no doubt, but the whole body of the people would approve this choice of the first Century ! came with a great company about him to the tribunall feat of estate where the Conful sat : and made request unto him, that he would give him the hearing of some few words, and command Cthat prerogative century which had given their voices to be called back again to a new iccuting. And when every wan was attentive, and expected what he should demand, he alledged for his excuse a pair of ill eyes. "For a shameless Pilot of a ship is he and as impudent a Generall of an ar-"my (quoth he) who having to do all by other menseyes, would require to have the goods of T. Manfili "and lives of other men to be put into their hands. And therefore may it please your honour to to the Conful! "command this Century of the younger fort to give their voices anew, and in creating Confuls. "to remember the war that is in Italy, to confider of the troublefome flate of the Common-" weal, and to think of this, That icarcely yet mens ears have had any rest, since they resounded and "rung again with the noises and alarms, that the enemies raised within these few months, when "they lay in fiege neer unto the wals of Rome. But after these words, when the laid Century cried D with one accord, that they were of the same mind still, and would nominate the same Confuls again, and none other; then Torquatus, "Neither (quoth he) shall I be able, if I were Conjul to "bear with your fashions and conditions, not you again endure my rule and commandment. To "the scruting therefore once again, and think how the Carthaginians war within Italy, and Anni-"bal is the Generall of the enemies. Then the Century moved as well by the authority and reverence of the mans perion, as by the applause and admiration of the people, who wondred at his vertue, befought the Conful to call forth and cite a Century of the elder bands: for that they would willingly conter with more ancient men than themselves; and by their sage advice and good direction nominate the Confuls. When those elders were called to this Century, there was some timeallowed for to commune apart secretly with them, within the place railed in, called Ovile. ETheleancients faid unto them, that they were to confult of three persons, whereof two already were full of honourable dignities, which they had born, to wit Q. Fabius and M. Marcellus, But verily, (lay they) in case ye would have some new Col to be chosen, for to be opposed against the Carthaginians, ye have M.Valerius Lavinus, a notable man, one who hathperformed fingular good lervice and atchieved many noble deeds, both by fea and land against King Philip. So when they had three propounded unto them the elder were difinified and the younger entred into a fecond ferntiny; and declared for Confuls, M. Claudius Marcellus (glittering then in the prime of his glory, for the late subduing and conquest of Sicily) and M. Valerius, who was absent. This force dom and choice of the prerogative Century, all the rest sollowed after and by their suffrages confitmed. "Let them mock on now and fooff hereat all they that have nothing in admiration but Frantiquity and things done in elder time. For mine own part, if there be any luch City and Com-"mon-wealth at all, confilting of wife mentand Philosophers, assome great Clarks have rather "imagined in their fanfies, than found in effect I dare be bold to think & fay, that in it there could "not possibly be either rulers and Magistrates more grave and temperate in their defire of dignity "and government or a people better mannered, nurtured, and instructed. But that it should be thought an unlikely matter and scarce credible that a Century of younger persons were willing "to confult with the elder and be advised by them to whom they should give their voices, for to "becreated the chief Magistrates; it is the corruption of this our age that is the cause: wherein we fee how small reverence and authority even parents themselves have, and of how slender and base account they be amongst their own naturall children:

After this followed the Blection of Prators, wherein were created P. Manlius Volfo, and L. GManlius Acidinus, C. Lectorius, and L. Cincius Alimentus. When this Election was finished it fortimed that news came, how T. Oft seilins (whom the people, as it seemed, would have chosen in his ablence to match T. Manifess in the Confulfnip, but that the ordinary course of the election was disubed and stopped) departed this life in Sicily. The Apollinare games in the former year had been exhibited rand when Calpharnias the Prator put up a bill, and moved the Senate, that they might be celebrated again that year also, there passed a decree, That they should be vowed to

The same year certain prodigious tokens were seen and reported. In the Temple of Concordia u the Image of Victory, which stood upon the lantern and top thereof was smitten with lightning, and being shaken and driven from its own place, rested fast upon those other Images of Villary that were fixed in the foreiront of the faid Temple, and fell not down from thence. Word allo was brought, That in Anagnia and Fregella the walls and the gates were likewise blasted and fineken with fire from heaven : and that in the market place of Sudertum there ran ftreams of blonda whole day together: That in Eretum it rained itones: and that in Reme a female mule brought forth a fole. These strange and wonderfull signs were purged and explate with greater sacrifices: and a solemn supplication proclaimed; wherein for one day the people should wholly attend their devotions, and pray unto the gods: and likewise a Novendiall sacrifice. In that year died I certain publike Priests of State, and new were chosen in their stead. Caim Livius in the room of M. Pomponius Matho the High Priest : and M. Servilius, to supply the place of Sp. Carvilius Manmus, the Arch-Augur. And for a fmuch as T.Ottacil: us Maximus, the Prelate or Bishop, died when the year was expired, there was none nominated for to succeed him. C. Claudius the Arch-flamine of Jupiter lost his Flaminship, and was deprived of that Sacerdotall dignity, becausehe had committed an errour in facrificing, when he should minister and distribute the inwards of

About the same time M. Amylius Levinus (after he had by secret conferences sounded aforehand and follicited the minds of the Ætolian Princes and great LL.) came with a small fleetof ships lightly apppointed, to their general Diet or Councill, hummoned before for that purpose on K ly. In which tolemnaffembly, after he had made declaration, "That Spracusa and Capua were won, and under the protection of the people of Rome, and what good success they had in the es affairs and wars of Isaly: and discoursed besides, That the Romans, according to their ancient s'custome, received by tradition from their forefathers, used to respect and make much of their "Allies: and namely, That either they received them into the City of Rome, and endued them " with the lame franchiles that they themselves enjoyed, or else dealt so liberally with themo-"therwife, that they liked of their condition fo wel, as they cho'e rather to be allies than Citizens; se he protested and said, That the Ætolians should be much more honoured amongst them than " all others, for that they were the first that of all forrain nations beyond sea, entertained league "and amity with them. As for King Philip and the Macedonians, their heavy friends, & dangerous L " neighbours, he had to danted their courages, abated their forces, and driven them to that pils, "that not only they were forced to abandon those towns, which by violence they haduken "wrongfully from the Ætolians, but also had much ado themselves to keep Macedony it selfqui-" ct, and without perill of hostility: promiting withall, That he would bring and reduce the Acar-" nanians (forwhom the Ætolians were so discontented and grieved, that they were dismembred er from the body of their State)under their ancient form of jurisdiction and seignory again. These relations and promises made by the Roman General, were confirmed and assured unto them by the authority and countenance of Scopas (who for the time was the Prator or head Magistrate of that State and of Dorimachus a Prince of the Etolians, who with less modelly and greater affereration and confidency extolled and magnified the greatness, power, and majefty of the people of Rome. M The principall matter that induced and moved them was the hope of recovering and keeping Acarnania. Whereupon, there were conditions drawn & engroffed, under which they should jejn in league and friendship with the people of Rome. And this branch was added to the rest of the defeazances, That if they were so pleased, and liked well of it, there should be comprized in the fame league and priviledges, the Eleans and Lacedamonians, together with Attalus, Pleuratu, and Scerdiletus: of which three, Attalus was King of Afa the lefs, the other were Princes and Poten tates of * Illyricum. The articles ran in this form. Imprimis, That the Ætolians should immedialy make war by land with King Philip. Item, That the Romans at sea should help with twentysliaces at the leaft, bearing five ranks of oars. Item, Astouching all the Cities that should be conquered (beginning from Lielia, o far as to * Concyra) that the ground whereon the Cities were feated, the edifices, the walls, and the lands thereto, belonging, should be seized to the use of the Ætolians: all other goods and charrels elfe, should be a prize for the people of Rome, Item, Thui the Ætolians happed to make peace with Philipmit must pass with this clause and proviso, that the peace should stand good upon this condition, That Philip abstain to make war upon the Romans and their Allies and all those that lived under their dominions, Item, In case the people of Rome fortuned to piece again, and be confederate with the King, they should put in a cavearand provilo, that he might have no liberty to war upon the Ætolians or their aflociates. These were the covenants agreed upon: and being fair engroffed two years after into a pair of indentures the one of them remained for the Etolians in Olympia, the other for the Romans in their Capitol, among other facred records and monuments, for a perpetuali memoriali to all posterity. Theo occasion of so great delay was because the Embassadors of the Ætolians were staid and kept very long at Rome. But that was no let nor hinderance at all to the proceedings in the was, For the Ætolians presently made war upon Philip: and Lavinus conquered Zacynthus (a link Island near to Atolia. having a City within it of the samename, which he forced by assault, fave the Castle) likewise * Oemada and * Naxus, which he won from the Agarnanians before: and all these he gave to the Ætolians. And supposing that Philip having his handsfull of the wif upon his own frontires had no time to think upon Italy, and the Carthaginians, and to mind

A the covenints that passed between Annibal and him, he retired himself into Corcyra.

Philiplying in winter harbor within Pella, was advertized of the * Ætolians revolt. Therefore * Jeniza So. hecause he minded at the prime of the Spring to conduct an army into Greece, to the end that phiano, at Zu-Macedony and the Cities bordering thereupon, should not be molested by the Illyrians, whom this Nigro. he supposed would be at quiet and not stir, if they were once frighted with the harms of others, hemade a judden rode and expedition into the marches of the Oricins and Apolloniats: and when the Appolloniats issued forth against him, he repelled them, and with great fear and terror drave them within their walls. After he had wasted the confines next to the Illyrians, he turned his forces with like celerity and speed into Pelagonia: and then won by affault a City of the B Dardanians, fituate in the frontires of Macedonia, through which the Dardanians meant to have their passage. And when he had performed these exploits in great hatte, not forgetting how the Etolians and Romans both maintained war against him joyntly, he deicended through Pelagonia, Nympheum, and Bolea, into Theffaly; supposing verily that the people of those countries might beincited to wage war together with him against the Ætolians. And leaving there behind him (at the streight of Thessay) Person four thousand strong, for to debar the Ætolians entrance that way: himielt in person, before that he should be occupied in greater affairs, led forth his army into Macedonia, and from thence into Thracia, and so torward against the Medians. That nation was wont to make incursions, and to invade Macedony, when loever they could perceive that the King was either busied in other wars, or his Realm disfurnished and slenderly provided Cof good gard and ftrong garritons. He began therefore to forrage and spoil the territories about Phraganda, and to affiult Iamphorina, the principall City and chief strength of that Region

Scopus having intelligence that the King was gone into Thracia, and kept there occupied in the wats, put all the serviceable young men of Acolia in arms, and prepared war against Acarnania. The nation of the Acarmans, albeit they were both in strength unequall, and also saw already, that they had loft the walled City of the Oniades, and Naxus: and knowing well, that the Roman forces would come upon them besides: rather upon anger than any good counsell and advisement, made preparation for war, and refolved to meet them. Their wives and children, and elder perions such as were above forty years of age, they sent away into Epirus, adjoyning near unto them. DOfall that were fifteen years old and upward unto threefcore, they took a folemn oath, that they would never return back without victory. They laid also a heavy curse and cruell malediction upon all those of their own nation: and framed a most humble request in as effectual terms as they could devie, unto all their friends, that none of them (hould entertain within their Cities, their doors and houses, nor admit to their table, any one of them that were vanquished, and fled out of the field: yea, and belought withall the Epirons to gather together the dead bodies of as many of them as should chance to be slain in battell, and to inter them all in one grave and erect a tomb and monument overthem, with an Epitaph and inscription to this effect. Here lie buried and entombed the Acarnanians, who fighting in defence of their country, against the violence and injuries of the Etalians, loft their lives munfully in the field. By this means, when their courages were enkindgled and incenfed, they encamped themselves in their utmost frontiers, abiding the coming of their enemies. And having dispatched messengers to Philip, to give notice to him in what jeopardy they flood they confirmed him to give over that war which he had in hand, confidering that Iamphorina was surrendred up into his hands, and that he had sped wel otherwise in the rest of his affairs. The Etolians, upon the first fame that was blown abroad of that solemn oath, taken by the Acarnamans, were wel cooled, and not to halty to let forward: but hearing once of Philip his coming, they were driven to retire again as far as possibly they could within their own confines. Neither Philip for his part marched on further than to Cline (notwithstanding that he made great speed afore, and took long journies: for fear that the Acarnanians should be surprized, before he could reach unto them for so soon as he heard that the Ætolians were retired, he himself also returned

Evonus in the beginning of the spring took the sea, and loosed from Coreyra, and having doubled the point of Lewastes, and sailed as sat as Nunpastum, there see published and gave knowledge, that he would shape his course from thence for Antieyra: and that Seopas and the Keopas and the Residents should there meet him, and be in readiness. The fiercer assume was from the sea-side, both because they had in their ships engines of battery, and other ordnance and artillery of all forts: and also, for that the assuments from that part were Romans. The Conful having that day won the commendation and name of one that knew how to rule and governhis affections, difmissed the Senat : and it seemed that there would be a generall vacation not of law matters only, but of all other things & as it were holyday fill, untill the other Conful came unto the City. This rest and idleness (as the wonted manner is) set the Commons having nothing elle to do, a talking: and now their tongues walked apace, ceasing not to spread rumours, Thatby this long and continuall war, not only the lands and territory about the City of Rome (especially where Annibal had marched with his cruell army) were wasted, but also Italy was in a manner dispeopled and laid desolate, by reason of so many musters and levies : complaining, that whole armies were defeated and put to the fword at Canna in defence of the Common-wealth: and K that there were two Confuls created, both martiall men, and warriors, over-fierce and eager of fight, finch as time of peace and quietness were able to find occasions of war: so little was it tobe looked for at their hands, that in time of war they would feek for peace, and fuffer the City to have any breathing time and intermission. Thesespeeches rumoured among the common people were interrupted and staid by occasion of a Scare-fire that began in fundry places together about the Forum. in the night of that day, which was immediatly before the feltival daies of Mineral, called Quinquairm. At one and the felf-fame time the feven merchants shops and ware-houses, which afterwards were turned into five, and the shops of the Bankers and money changers which now are called Nova, (or the new-shops) were on tre. Divers private mens houses also the fire caught, for as then there were no stately Halls and Palaces of the City there built. Likewifethe L fire took hold of the common prison, called Laturia the Fish market hall likewise, and the royall gallery or walking-piace. Hardly could the Chaptel of Vella be laved, and that by the good hep and pains-taking especially of thirteen bondslaves; whose bondage was bought out at the Cius charges, and they made freemen. The fire continued one night and a day: and no manmade doubt, but it came by mans hand, and was the practice of some lewd persons; for that the fires began in many places at once, and those far distant afunder. Whereupon the Conful by the advice and direction of the Senat, made proclamation in a folemn affembly of the people, that wholeever would come forth and give notice by whose means that fire was procured, he should be well rewarded: if he were a free-man, with a piece of money; if bond, with freedome. Inhope of which recompence, a certain flave belonging to the Cal. vii the Campans, (his name was Man-M mis) was induced to bewray the matters whom he ferved, and five other young Gentlemen of Capna, whose fathers had lost their heads by the commandment of Q. Fulving. Those he appeached to have made the faid fires : and he gave them a warning befides, that they intended to do more mischief about the City, if they were let alone, and not apprehended; so they were attached, and their houshold-fervants. At the first, these persons made light account both of the informer, and the information they made, and elevated the credit that was given thereto: alledging, that the day before the party himself being chassised and scourged by his Masters, ran away, and so upon an anger and giddy fit deviled (by occasion of this misfortune which was meer casuall) to frame an acculation against his masters. As the Conful Levinus passed by Capus in his journey [homeward,] there slocked about a mumber of Campans, and befought him with tears, that they might have leaved go to leave and present themselves before the Senate, there to make suit (i haply there were any distributed commission in them) not to destroy them utterly, nor suffer Q. Then Levinus having caused the Cappans to take a corporall oath, and swear unto Flaceus, that they would make return to Cappan before five daies were expired, ancer they had their answer and dispatch from the Senate; commanded them to come after him to Rome. Attended thus as he was with his company, he encountred the Sicilians also, who came forth to meet him: and with this multitude he entred the City, accompanied (Isay) with the Campans and Sicilians, both vanquished and subdued by war, as accusers of two most samous persons, Marcellas and Fulvius, who had conquered two most noble and renowned Cities, Syracuse, and

But both the Coff, treated and consulted first with the Senate, about the state of the Commonweal, and the government of the Provinces. There Levinus related in what terms stood Macedon and Greece: the Etolians also, with the Acarnanians and Locrians: likewise what acts he had archieved in those parts both by sea and land; and how he had repulsed Philip back into Macedonia, when he began to make war upon the Ætolians, who now was retired and gone into the utmost parts of his Kingdom: so as the legion might be withdrawn from thence, for C that the Armado was sufficient to keep the King forth of Italy. Thus much spake he of himself, and of the Province whereof he had been governour. Then both Confuls in common, propoled unto the Senat, concerning the Province. And the LL, decreed that one of the Conjuls should take the charge of Italy, and of the war with Annibal: and the other should have under his hand the Atmado, whereof T. Offacilius was the Admiral; and together with L. Cincius the Prator govern the Province of Sicily. They were allowed the two armies which were in Tulcany and in France, confuling of four legions: whereof two of the former year, that were of Citizens should be sent into Tuscary, and those two which the Consul Sulpitius had conducted. should be led into France, Moreover, that he should have the government of France, and the leading of the Legions there, whom that Cof, would appoint, whose lot it was to have Italy for his Province. Into Tufcany was C. Calphurnius fent, with Commission after the term of the Pratorship expired, to have his full jurisdiction to continue for a year. Likewise to Q. Fulvius was rifigned the keeping of Capua, and his rule protogued for another year. The armies, as well of Citizens as of Allies, were by commandment of the Senat abridged and made lefs: fo that for two legions there should be but one, and that confisting of five thousand sootmen, and three hundred horsemen: that they should be discharged of souldiery who had served longest: that of Allies there should be left feven thousand soot, and three hundred horse: with the same respect and consideration of service in dismissing the old souldiers. As for Cn. Fulvius the Consul of the former year, he ruled the same Province of Apulia still, without any alteration of his forces: only his government was continued unto him another year. And P. Sulpitius his Colleague, was commanded E to fend away all his army only the mariners and failers excepted. Likewife order was given that so soon as the new Conful was arrived and landed in the Province of Sicily, the army there, which was commanded by M. Cornelius, should be fent out of Sicily. Unto L. Cincius the Prator were affigued the fouldiers that remained after the defeat at Canna, for to keep Sicily in order, and those arose to two legions. And as many legions were appointed for P. Manlius Volso the Prator, for to go into Sardina, even those whereof L. Cornelius had the leading in the same Province the former year. As for the legions of Citizens, the Confuls were enjoyeed to levy and enroll them fo, as they entertained no fouldier of all those who had served in the army, either of M.Claudius, or M. Valerius or Fulvius: nor exceeded the number that year of one and twenty legions of the Romans. When these Acts were passed in the Senate-house the Consuls cast lots for their feverall Provinces, Sicily and the Armado fell to Marcellus: Italy and the war against Anni-

This lot that fell to Marcellus fo ftruck the Sicillans dead, (who food in the presence of the Confuls, looking for the event of the lottery) as if Syracufe had been loft again: in such fort, as their pitifull lamentations, and their wofull plaints, for the present turned all menseyes upon them, and none after ministred cause of much speech and talk. For they went about to allthe Senators from one to another, in poor and vile array, protesting, "That if Marcellus came "amongft them again as L. Deputy, they would not only for lake every man his own country "where he was born, but also abandon the whole Island of Sicily: complaining that without any "delert of their parts, heretofore he had been cruelly bent against them, and his harred was irreconcileable: and what would he now do in his choler, and knowing that the Sicilians came to Rome of purpose to make complaints of him? The Island were better (say they) to be on a light "fire to burn with Æina; or to be all a very sea, than thus to be exposed as a prey unto a mortall enemy, for to be devonted. These grievous moans and pitious complaints of the Sicilians fust carried to the houses of the Nobles and great men of the City, and there taken up and much talked of by many, whiles fome pitied the Sicilians, others envied Marcellus, spread abroad at length fofar, untill they came to the Council-Table. And the Confuls were dealt withall, to Propose unto the Senate, that they might exchange their Provinces one for another. Then MarThe complaints of the Sicilians a-

Only he requested that the Senate "would not prejudice his cause. For it at the first (quoth he)it had been hard and unjust, extraor-"dinarily and without casting lots, to give my Collegue the tree choice of his own Province, how "much greater wrong then should I have, nay, what disgrace were offered unto me, it my lot " should be taken from me and transferred upon him. So for that time, the Senat having made and overture unto Marcellus, what they would have done, rather than by any decree prejudiced the matter, brake up. And the Confuls between themselves privatly made exchange one with theother. See the fortune and fatall deftiny of Marcellus, that haled him, as it were, to be matched with Annibal, and to fall into his hands: to the end that the same man, who of all the Romans, was the first that vanquished Annibal in fight, and won the honour from him: should now in the middle of prosperity and happy success of war, be the last Roman General that was slain by Annibal, and vielded the glory of giving him the overthrow. After the Provinces were thus interchangeably thisted, the Sicilians were brought into the Senat. Where they made a long speech as touching the perpetuall and constant faithfulness unto the end of K. Hiero, towards the people of Rome; and all to curry favour and gain thanks unto the whole nation of Sicily Recounting," that Hieronymus Y "first, and after him Hippocrates and Epicides, as for other things, so especially for their revolting from the Romans, and turning to Annibal, were odious and hateful unto them, For which sale "and nothing else Hieronymus was by the hands of the chieftains of their young gallants, as it " were by a publike decree of the state made away and killed, and the noblest of their young gen-"tlemen, to the number of seventy, conspired to murder Hippocrates and Epicides: who being dif-"appointed and put by the effecting of their defignment, through the delay of Marcellus, whose "the time before appointed, came not with his power to Syracuse) were appeached, their inten-"ded plot revealed, and they all by those tyrants put to death. And yet to speak a truth, Marci-" Lus himself was he that gave the first occasion of the tyrannizing of Hippocrates and Epicides, in "that most cruelly he sacked and rifled the Leontins. But from that time forward the Nobles of I " Syracuse never ceased to come in unto Marcellus, & promised to deliver the City into his hands, whenfoever he pleased. But he, forfooth, at first, stood upon these terms, that he would rather "force it by affault:but afterwards, seeing he could not effect that his purpose, notwithstanding he " had wrought all the devices he could, both by fea & land, he made choice of one Sofis a copper-" fmith & Mericus a Spaniard, to have them to work and contrive the betraying of the City, rather er than of the principal of the Syracusian Nobility, who had so often offred that service, and never er yet would it be accepted: & all, I wot, because he might pretend some colourable cause of justice, "to proceed in all rigor against the most ancient allies of the people of Rome, for to massacre them, "and make spoil of all that they had Set case that Hieronymus had not revolted and gone to An-" nibal, but the whole people and Senat of Syracufa: Suppose, that the Syracufians in generall, by M " publike consent had shut the gates against Marcellus, & not their Tyrants Hippocrates and Epiet cides, when they had the Syracufians fure enough under their own hands : Say they had warred er against the people Rome with as spightfull and cankred malice as the Carthaginians do, and ever "did: what greater hostility could Marcellus possibly have exercised against them more thank "hath, unleis he would destroy and rase the City to the very ground? Surely he hath left nothing "in Syracufa but the bare walls, the naked and empty houses of the City, the temples and chaptels " of the gods defaced & broke open; for the gods themselves, with all the rich & gorgeous onese ments are carried away. Many a man is spoiled and robbed of his goods, in such fort, as having "nothing left him but the bare foil they are not able when all is gone with his leavings to main-" tain themselves, and sustain their wives and children. They were humble petitioners therefore, N " and suppliant suiters unto the LL. of the Senate, to take order, that restitution might be made "unto the rightful owners if not of all (for that is unpossible) yet of so much at least, as was to be "found, and might be truly owned again.

After these and such like complaints, Levinus the Consul commanded them to go forthof the Councill-House, to the end that the LL might be consulted with, and deliver their opinions concerning their demands, "Nay mary (quoth Marcellus) let them stay full rather; that I may assist to their very faces: seeing my LL. our case and condition is so hard, who war and fightfor you, to their very faces: seeing my LL. our case and condition is so hard, who war and fightfor you, and then we must have those to enform against us, and be our accusers, whom we have conquered "and subdued by martiall arms: Let it even be so that two Cities, to wit, Caputa and Synauli, "won this year, may convent judicially both their conquerors, the one Fulvines, the other Mar O "cellus." When the Embassadors were brought back again into the Senat-house, then began Marcellus the Consul, and spake in this wise.

"I am not fo far overfeen, and forgetfall, my Lords, either of the majefty of the people of Rome, or of this place of command which I now hold, that I would plead mine own caufe. Conful as I am, againft the fe Grecians, my accufers, in cafe the queffion were of any crime of fault of mine own. But all the controverfie to be diffused, standeth nor upon these terms, to camine what I have done, whom the right of war will justifie and bear out, howfoever I have

A "proceeded against enemies : but what these men have deserved to forer. If they were not end-"mies, nor to to be reputed, then it mattered not, and it had been all one, either now or in the "life time of King Hiero, to have forced Syracufa. But if it appear, that they have revoked, that "they have evil intreated our Embassadors, threatned to lay violent hands, and to run upon them " with (word and force of arms; that they have manned their walls, and thut their gates upon us "that they have maintained the army of the Carthaginians against us a who can be grieved and " offended, if they have fuffered as enemies, who fruckings first to offer all thostility whatfoever? "Rejected 1 the Nobles of Syracufa when they would have delivered the City into my hands? "And made I more account of Sofis, and Mericas the Spaniard, and thought them worthy to be "trulted in fo important a matter? Yeare not, I am fore, the meanett of the Syracufians, that thus Bu reproach others with balencis of estate. Who was it of all you here; that promited to open me "the gates? that undertook to receive my armed fouldiers into the City ? Nay, nay, ye hate and "curle them in your heart, who have to done; and even in this place cannot forbear to give them-"hard terms, and revile them : fo unlike it is, that you your felves ever meant to have done any "fuch thing. Even this abject condition and bale calling of theirs, my Lil. which these men twice "them with, is a manifest token, and a most evident argument, that I resused none; that was wil-"ling to do good fervice unto our state and Common-weal. At the very first, before I laid siege " unto Syracufa, I affaied by all means to have peace; one while fending Embaffadors duto them, "otherwhiles going in person to parle with them. Afterwards, seeing that without all reverence "of Embaliadors, they shamed not to offer them abuse; without regard of my felf, they deigned "me no aniwer when I came to the gates, and conferred with their chief Nobility: after much "travel, toil, and infinite pains, fulfained both by Land and Sea, at length by mere force and hor " affault, I became Mailter and Lord of Syracafa. Now as touching that which bath befall unto "them, fince they were overcome, and loft their City, I would suppose they had more reason, and " juster cause to make their mean, and complain unto Amibal and the Carthaginians, those that "are likewife conquered, than before the Senat of the people of Rome their Conqueror. For mine "own part, my LL if I had ever meant to deny and dilayow the spoiling and secking of Syracusa, "and not to stand to it when I had done, I would never have been so ill advised; as to beautify and "adorn the City of Rome with the poils thereof, And what I have given or for given unto any " particular person, I am affured that I may well justify and avow the same, both by the law of war, and also by the defert of every one. Now, my LL, whether ye will approve and ratify my " doings or no, it concerneth and toucheth the Common weal rather than my felf. My part I have "done, and discharged my duty faithfully. It much importeth now the State, that by reverling (as "it were) and dismulling mine actions, ye make not your other Generals from henceforth, to be "more flack and oack ward in the like employment. To conclude my LL fince that ye have heard "both my felf and the Sicilians speak our minds face to face, we will all together go out of this " Temple, that in my ablence the Senate may more frankly speak to the point, and deliver their "opinions. Thus the Sicilians were difimified, and he himfelf went forth alfo to the Capitol, for to take a levy of fouldiers.

The other Conful in the mean time, put to question the demands of the Sicilians before the LL. Much canvassing a long while, and discussing there was of the matter, and divers opinions patfed, Many of the Senators following T. Manline Torquatus the head and principal man, that maintained a fide, were of this mind, "That they should have made war against the tyranis, the com-"mon enemies as well to the Syracusians, as to the State of Rome. And as for the City, it was "(fay they) rather recovered and received, than won by force and being fo received, it was to "be te-established in her own ancient laws and freedom, and not after it was so wearied with miserable servitude, to be scourged and afflicted with war upon it. But between the warring of "the tyrants of the one fide, and the Roman General of the other, a most beautiful and noble City, "flanding in the midft (as a prize and reward for the winner) is undone by the means; even that City which sometime had been the garner (as it were) and the Treasure house of the people of "Rome: by the munificent liberality and bounty whereof, by whose rich presents and goodly gifts "our City many a time and oft, yea, and but of late dayes in this Punick war, bath been relieved and adorned. If King Hiero should arise again from the dead and come among us, Hiero (I ay) the most faithful maintainer of the Roman state; with what face could we she w unto him, either Syracuse or Rome? When he should secon one side, his own native country, half rased and wholly poiled and on the other fide; coming to Rome, in the very entring of the City, and hard at the gate, should behold the spoils of his own City? Notwithstanding these and such like speeches Gall out among them, to procure ill will and hatted to the Conful, and to move puty and compassion to the Sicilians, yet the LL, of the Senat in taveur of Marcellus, agreed upon a milder decree, and enacted, That whatfoever he had done, either during the war, or after conquett, should be tarified and allowed for good : Item, for the time to come, the Senat would take order and provide for the good of the Syraculians, and give the Comul Levinus a special charge, to bayeregerd of the welfare of that City, to far forth, as might not be prejudicial to the state of Rome: then were two Senators sent into the Capitol to the Conful, to request him to repair again moto the affembly of the Senate: and after the Sicilians allo were admitted into the place, their act and decree aforeful was openly read. The Embaffadors had good words given them, and were dimiled: whereupon they fell down proftrate at the feet of Marcellme the Conful, beteeching him to pardon that which they had spoken, either to bewail, or to ease their calamity; and tore. H crive both them in particular, and the City of Syracufe in general, unto his merciful protection. After this, the Conful with gracious words licented them to depart.

When the Sicilians had their dispatch, the Campans had audience given them in the Senate : and as their speech was more lamentable, so the cause was heavier, and harder to be digested for nei-"ther could they themselves deny, but that they deferved condign punishment; nor Tyrants had they any, upon whom they might lay the blame. But they thought they had fuffred enough for "their fins already, in that fo many of their Senators died by poison, and so many lost their heads. 4 Some few of their nobility and but a few remained yet alive, who as they were not touched in " confeience, nor to faulty, as to lay violent hands upon themfelves, to the Conqueror in his furious 1 & wrath, adjudged them not worthy of death : they therefore made humble fuit for themlelves, their waves and children, to obtain freedom, and to enjoy fome part of their own goods, being, " as they were, meer citizens of Rome, and most of them by affinity and neer kinred, upon mutual 64 and crois mariages, linked in alliance and bloud to the Romans, After that they also were willed to void out of the Squat house : for a while, there grew some question and doubt, whether Q.Fulwise thould be fent for from Capua (for prefently upon the taking of the City, Claudine the Conful died) that this matter might be argued and discussed in presence of the General himself, likes the other had been reasoned of and debated between Marcellus and the Sicilians, But afterwards when they faw in the Senat house M. Attilim, and C. Fulvius, the brother of Flacens, bothhis Lieutenants: likewile Q. Minntins, and L. Veturius Philo, Lieutenants unto Claudine, who back been present in all actions, and were eye-witnesses of every thing ; and besides, were unwilling that either Fulvius should be called away from Capaa, or the Campans longer delayed : M. Anili us Regulus, who of all them that had been at the fervice of Capus, was of greatest authority and

"I take it (quoth he) when Capua was newly won, I was one of Councel with the Confuls "there, when question was asked, and enquiry made, Whether any one Campane had detered " well of us and our Common-weal. And found it was, that two women only, to wit, Fofta Opia, " born in Atelle, but dwelling then at Capna, and Fancula Cluvia, fomerime a common strumpet " and curtizan, were well willers unto us. The former of these twain daily acrificed for the wel-"fare, life, and victory of the Romans; the other, fecretly fultained the poor and needy Roman t " captives with food and victuals. As for all other Campans, from the highest to the lowest, they " were no better affected unto us, than the Carthaginians. And even thole, who were beheaded as by Quintus Pulvius, inffered death, not because they were more faulty than others, but for that of they were of greater mark and calling than the reft. Now, that the Senate should decide the 44 caule of any Campans, who are enfranchifed denifons of Rome, without a grant from the proto ples I fee not how it can be. For in our fore-fathers time the like cale was of the Satricans that * rebelled : and then M. Antifitus, a Tribun of the Commons, first pur up a bill, and the Commons "afterwards passed it inamely, That the Senat might have power and authority, to give the ropine'on, and determine of the Satricans. Therefore I am of mind, that we deal with the Tribuns of "the Commons, that one or more of them, prefer a billunto the Commons, by vertue whereof we g " may be authorifed to fet down fome order for the Campans. Then L. Attilum, a Tribun of the Commons, by leave and advice of the Senate, proposed unto the Commons a bill in this form and manner. Whereas the Campans, Aselians, Calaisns, and Sabatins, who have yeelded themfelves was Fulvius the Pro-confut, to be at the pleasure and devotion of the people of Rome : all that also went they have furrendred together with themselves, as well their territory as their City, as all menfils but facted and prophane, their necessary implements, and all other things what sever, I demand you mil and pleasure, O Quirits, what shall be done with the premiffes ? The Commons after deliberation, gave their voyces to the faid bill in this form. Our will and pleasure is, that what soever ye the Soaters, who now are fet in Councel, or the most part of you think good and determine, shall stand for ju and lawfal. Upon this grant or Act of the Commons, the Senat by a decree awarded unto Oppa N and Cluvia, full their own goods and liberty: and moreover if they were defirous to clave tother reward at the Senates hand, they were best to repair unto Rome. For every family and ieveral house of the Campans, there were special acts and decrees made, all which to repeat and rehearle, would not quit the labour. Some had their goods conficate: themitives, their Children and Wives were to be fold, excepting those their Daughters which were wedded, before that they came under the subjection of the people of Rome. Others were to be clipt up in Prifon, until farther order were taken for them hereafter. Moreover, of some Campana they made distinction by valuation of their wealth, whether their goods were to be conflicte or no. All their beafts and cattail which were taken, fave Horfes ; all their bond-flaves, but males fourteen years of age and upward, all moveable goods also which were not annexed 0 and faltned to the foil, they awarded for to be reftored to the true owners. All Camput, Atellans, Calatins, Sabellans, excepting those, who either themselves, or whose parents took part and fided with the enemies, they judged to be free : provided alwayes, that nook of them were either Free-denizens of Rome, or of Latinm. Item, it was enacted, that none of all them who had been at Capua whiles the gates were thut, should remain either in the City or territory of Copus, within a certain day prefixed : but should have a place set out unto them for to dwell in, on the farther fide of Tyberis, fo it were not upon the very bank close unto

A Tyber. As for those that during the time of war had been neither at Capma nor in any other City of Campan, which revolted from the people of Rome, they should be removed to inhabit on this fide the River Lyris between it and Rome: but fuch as were turned and passed to the Romans fide, before that Annibal came unto Capua, they should be transplanted on the hither side of Valturnus the River: provided, that none of them should possess either house or Land within fifteen miles of the Sea. As concerning them who were displaced and confined to inhabit beyond the Tyber, neither they nor their heirs and successors for ever, should purchase and hold house or Land in any place, but in the territory either of Veit, Sutrium, or Nepelium : but fo, as they exceeded not the ftint of five hundred Acres of ground. As touching the goods and chattels of all the Senators, of such as had born Magistracy in Capua, Atella, or Calatia, they awarded that sale should be made thereof in Capua. As for those that were free born, and whose bodies were to be fold, they should be sent to Rome, and there set a-sale. Finally, the Images and Statues of brais, which were faid to have been won and taken from the enemies, whether they were facred or profune, they referred to the Colledge of the Priests and Prelates, to determine thereof at their discretion. Thus they gave the Campanes their difpatch, and fent them away much worfe apaid for thefe decrees, than they were when they came first to Rome. And now they complained no more of the cruel proceedings of Q. Fulvius against them, but blamed the iniquity and unjust dealing of the very Gods, and their own curled fortune together.

army was levied and enrolled, there began some question and reasoning about the mariners and

After the Sicilians and Campanes were difmiffed, there was a muster taken : and when an

C. Rowers to furnish the Gallies. For the accomplishment whereof, when the Consuls could neither raile men enow, nor yet find mony at that time in the Chamber of the City, for to prefle and hire them, and pay their wages withal; they published an edict, that private men according to the rate and proportion in the Subfidy book, out of all orders, degrees, and companies, should as aforetime find Rowers at their own charges, and maintain them with meat and money for thirty dayes. Upon which Edict and Proclamation, all men to grumbled and muttered, and were so highly discontented and angred, that they wanted an head and Captain, rather then matter and occasion of a mutiny and insurrection. giving out, "That the Confuls had taken a course, "and were in the very train to plague, undo, and destroy the Commons of Rome, like as they "had already the Sicilians and the Campans. For thus many years they have been pilled, polled, o clean spent and consumed with exaction of tributes, and had nothing lest them but the bare " ground, and the same lying wast and untilled. As for their Houses upon their Lands, the ene-mies had burned: their servants and hinds, such as should husband and till their grounds, the "Common-wealth had bereaved them of: one whiles buying them up to the war, for iome imall "piece of mony: otherwhiles levying and preffing them to the Seas to be Gally. flaves, for a thing of nothing. A man could not fo foon get one brais farthing, or fingle filver deneit before hand, 4 but it went by and by either for Gally-pay, or for yearly Tribute. And to give that now which "they had not, they might never be brought by any force or for any mans commandment what-"foever. Let them fell and make an hand of their goods, imprison and punish their bodies too, "when all is gone besides; seeing there is nothing lest them to rensome and redeem the same E "again. These and such like words were not only muttred in huggermugger, but uttered also and given out in broad terms even in the market place and before the Confuls, by the multitude that flocked and gathered together in exceeding great numbers: in such fort, as the Consuls were not able with all that ever they could do, to appeale the mutiny, neither by tharp rebukes, nor fair words and comfortable speeches. Then they faid, that they would give and allow them three dayes respit for to think and consider of these matters: which they themselves bestowed whelly and employed in taking a view and furvey of their goods, and making dispatch and riddance thereof out of the way. The next day the Confuls called the Senate together to confule about the supply of Rowers and Gally-slaves: where, after much debating and arguing, that the Commons had good reason to make denial; at length the drift of all their speech was this, "That "whether it were right or wrong, the burden mult lye on privat mens shoulders, there was no re-"medy: for feeing there was no mony in the common chelt, how should Mariners and Rowers "elle be gotten and levied? And without Armadocs, how possibly should either Sicily be held Alill in pollettion, or Philip be kept out of Italy? or the Sea coalts of Italy remain in fafety and "lecurity? In these distresses and difficulties the Councel being perplexed, and to seek for reme-"dy; and whiles every mans wits were in the wan and so consused, as if they were benummed "and flone cold . Then Lavinus the Conful, As the Magistrate (qd. he) goeth before the Senate in The speech of "place of honor, and the Senat likewife before the common people in worth and dignity : fo they Lavina the congle in all difficulties and hard occurrences to undergo the weightieft burdens first and be the Conful. To the end therefore that the people of Rome may be provided and furnished of a fittet rigged and trimmed, as our defire is, and that private persons may not think much, nor titule to find Rowers thereunto; let us first that are here command our own felues: let us,

68 I fay, that be Senators, bring abroad in common all the gold, all the filver, all the brasen coin H 4 that we have, fo as every man referverings only for himself, his wife and children: and a little tablet or Jewel for his ion, as a pendant to hang about his neck. Alio let all them that have wives 3 pound fie, or daughters, retain still one ounce weight of * gold, and * one pound of filver : And as many as 3 pound fler. have born office of State, and fitten in the Ivory Chair, keep still the trappings and capacifonof and two fhil. their Horfes, and two pound weight a piece, the one of gold, the other of filver; for to have a Salt-fellar, and a little boll or cup, to facrifice and offerunto the Gods withal. As for the iel of the Senators, let us leave them but one pound weight of filver, and no gold at all, and five thou-* 15 pound 12 fand * Asses in coin, to every housholder a piece. " All other gold, filver, and brasen moneyocthile pence ft. "Knights of Rome, and then forward the rest of the commons, to imitate and follow us with " fome emulation. This is the only means which we that are Confuls have thought upon and de-44 viled, after much talk and conference together. Set to therefore; my mafters, in the name of "God, and lead the way : God will bless your good beginnings. So long as the City standeth "on foot, and holdeth up the head, no man need to fear his private state; but it shall do well es enough. Go the weal publick to wreck once, and decay, let no man ever think to save his "own. All the whole house liked to well of these motions, that not only they gave their accord and content thereto, but over and befides, yeelded hearty thanks unto the Contais for their good K advice and counsel. When the Senat was dismitted, every man for himself brought forth his gold, his filver, and braffe money, and laid all together in common; and that with such speed, thiving a vie who could go before another, and have his name entred first in the publick Rolles and Region fters: as neither the forefaid Triumvirs were able to receive it fast enough, as it was tendred unto them; nor the ordinary Clerks and Notaries to fet it down in writing, and take note thereof accordingly. This content and agreement of the Senators, the Knights and Genelemen of Ross in their place and calling teconded; and the commons for their parts were not behind; so without any constraint of law, without edict, without any exhortation made by the Magistrate, the common-weal wantedneither Rowers for to furnish the armadoes, nor mony to pay the Rowers. And thus when all things were provided necessary for the wars, the Contuls went forthto their

Never was there any time of this war, wherein Carthaginians and Romans together, ha more tryal of the alternative and variable change of fortune: never hung they more in equilibility lance, between fair hope and tearful danger. The Romans, in their Provinces talted both of iweet and four. In Spain on the one fide, they fped ill and loft : in Sieily on the other fide, they iped well and won : fo as their forrow was interfaced ftill and mingled with joy. Alfo in Italy, the losse of Tarentum turned to their woe and damage . but the keeping of the Castle three with the garrison, beyond all their hope and expectation, brought them joy and comfort for their forrow. Alto, their fuddain fright and fear, for the fiege and affault of the City of Rome, was laived and cured again within a few dayes after, by the forcing and winning of Capua: and all that had y winess and mourning turned into mirth and gladness. The affairs allo beginnd Sea, were checked with interchangeable turns and couries. Philip became their enemy in an ill time, and when they had little need thereof. Contrary-wife, the Rtolians and Atfalia the King of Affa theich, proved to be their new friends and loving allies : whereby even then fortune, teemed to imile on the Romans, and by that overture, promifed as it were, unto them the Empire of the Eath Semblably the Carthaginians, as they loft Capua, io they won Tarentum, and made alsoing game of it. In like manner, as they took no (mall pride and glory, in coming to the walls of fine without refiltance; to they were danted and difmaid again, that this their enterprifetooknobetter effect in the end : and held themselves much disgraced and dishonoured, that whilesthes fat themselves before one gate of Rome, there was an army of Romans led forth at another, and N fent into Spain. And even in Spain alio, the greaterhope men had there, that upon the death of two so noble and valiant Generals, and the defeat of two as puissant armies, the war was come to a final end, and the Romans driven from thence for ever: the more spight it was, and the greater grief and vexation they conceived again, when by the valour of L. Martim a tumble tuary Captain, chosen in halt they knew not how, those former victories turned to vanites, and came to just nothing. Thus fortune was indifferent, and all things doubtful and wavering in the spence, both on the one side and the other. Their hope all one as it was at first : their fear, the sime fiil, neither more nor less: So as between hope and fear, they fared, as if the war at this time were new to begin. Annibal above all other things, was vexed to the heart, that Capua being more holly and 0 eagerly affaulted by the Romans, than manfully and faithfully defended by him, had divened and turned away the hearts of many States of Italy from him. For neither was he able to bold them all with fufficient garrisons, unless he would dismember into many small portions, and months by piece-meal his army; which to do then, was no good policy : nor he thought it fate and good, to withdraw his garrifons from thence, & leave the fidelity of his allies at liverty, either to depend upon fickie hope, or to fway with inddam fear. And (as he was by nature covetous and cincle Aly minded) he refolved at length upon this course, to make spoil of those Cities which he was not able to keep, and to to leave them wast and empty for the enemy. This designment was not to dishonest and shameful in the first enterprise, but it proved as bad and burtial to himself in the effect and conclusion. For he loft the hearts clean, not only of those that were the parties grieved, and inflered thefe indignities, but also of all others besides. The present calamity and loss touched but some sew : but the precedent and example reached to many more. Neither was the Roman Conful behind hand for his part, to follicite and found those Cities, from whence he saw found light appear, and any hope to gain them unto him.

There were in Salapia two noble men above the relt, Dafin and Blafin. Dafin was friend to Annibal, Blafim (to far as he might with fafety) affected and favoured the Romans. And by enter-B courle of tecret mellengers, had put Marcellus in some good hope of betraying the Ciry ; but without the help of Dafine the plot could not be compassed and effected. Wherefore, after much muting and long deliberation, after many stayes and delayes, at length he resolved for want rather ofbetter couniel, than upon any hope to speed) to address himself to Dafins, and acquaint him with the matter. But Dafine not only milliking utterly and abhorring the thing, but also carrying a fecret enmity to the party himself, the only eye-fore and concurrent that he had, striving to be greater than be, disclosed all to Annibal. Whereupon, both were fent for, and convented peremptorily before him. As Annibal was fitting upon the Tribunal leat, giving audience and difpatch to certain other matters; and that he might anon the better attend unto Blafiss and the actionintended against him : whiles the plaintife and defendant stood spart by themselves from the restorthe people a good way, Blafin went in hand again with Dafits, and sollicited him for to deliver the City to the Romans. With that, Dafin (as if the matter had been too too apparant) ried out and laid, That he bashed not to break unto him and move him, even in the preferee and sight of Annibal, for to practife treason and betray the City. Annibal and all they that were there pretent gave little credit unto Dafim: and the more audacious the thing it felt was, the leffe likelyhood it carried with it of a truth. Every man supposed verily, it was nothing but emulation, envy, and cankred malice, that cauled Dafine to charge upon him that crime, which because there was no witnessto the contrary, he might untruly devile and more freely enforce against him. And so for that time, they were both discharged the court. But Blasses never gave over to follow still this bold enterprite, but beat still upon this one point, shewing how good and commodious the thing would be, both to themselves in private, and to their country in common, until he had wrought him to, and won him to grant, that the Carthaginian garrison, (and those were Numidians) together with the City Salapia, should be rendred unto Marcellas. But without much bloudshed they could not wolfibly be thus betrayed and delivered : for they were the most hardy and valiant horsemen by far, of all the Carthaginian army. Wherefore, albeit they were taken on a fuddain unprovided, and had no ule of Horfes within the City, yet with fuch weapons, as in fuch a fuddain tumult and uprore they could catch and come by, first they assayed and gave the venture to break through and escape a way : and when they saw that they could by no means save themselves and get forth, they fought it out to the last manfully, even unto death: so as there were not of them above fifty left alive, and came into the hands of the enemies. And furely, the loss of this cornet of Horsemen, was a greater dammage unto Annibal, than the forgoing of Salapia: for never from that day forward, had Annibal the upper hand in cavalry, which was the only fervice whereby ever before he most prevailed.

Much about the same time the Castle of Tarentum was streightly distressed for want of victuals, and hardly could endure and hold out any longer. The only hope that the Roman garrison had, which lay there, and the Captain thereof M. Living the Constable of the Castle, was in the provision sent out of Sieily. For the safe convoy whereof, along the coast of Italy, there rid at anchor a fleet welneer of twenty fail before Rhegium. The Admiral of this fleet appointed to wast these victuals from time to time, was one Decisse Quintine, a man of obscure birth and bale parentage, howbeit, for many worthy acts and feats of arms, much renowned in martial

At the first he had the charge but of five ships, whereof two of the greatest, which were three banked Gallies, were allowed him by Marcellus: afterwards, upon his good fervice, when he had born himself bravely in many conflicts, he had three more committed unto him, and those were of five banks of oars, until at last himself, by calling upon the confederat Cities, as Rhegium; Velia, and Pastines, for the thips due by covenant unto the people of Rome, he had made a prety Armido, as is above faid, of twenty fail. As this fleet had difanchored and was gone from Rhegiam, Democrates with the like Armado for number of Tarentinships, encountred almost five leagues from the City of Tarentum, at a port called Sacriportus. It fortuned at that time, that the Roman Admiral, little looking for any battel, came forth under is lonly, but about Crotone and G Sibaru, he had furnished his ships with Rowers alfo, and so his fleet for the bigness and talness of the Veffels, was well appointed, and fufficiently armed and manned. And even then it hapned at one time, that both the boilterous wind lay, and the enemies also were within kenning, loas they had learce time enough to fit their tackling, to make ready their Rowers, and to let in order their fighting men, against a skirmish that was fo near toward. There was not lightly feen a greater conflict, tought more hotly and hercely between two royal Armadoes that affronted one another, than between thele imall fleets. For why, the battel was for a greater matter, than all their ships came to. The Tarentins mainteined the fight more cagetly, because they were defining to recover their Castle out of the Romans hands, as they had done their City, after one 100 years almost, during which time, they had been out of the possession thereof: hoping thereby, if they could be mafters of the Sea once by some fortunat and victorious battel, to cut off and interceptall hope of victuals from the enemies. The Romans on the other fide bestirred themselves as lustly abat by keeping the possession of the Castle, all the world might see, that Tarenium was not lost by force, clean it ength and valour, but betrayed by itealth and treachery. So they founded thebasel from both parts, and ran affront one at another, with the beaks and ftems of their prows, and meither flaid rowing amain forward, nor fuffered their enemy to part or go afide from them, until they closed and grapt'd their thips together, by the means of iron hooks like hands. And soneer they buckled, in hot and furious fight, that not only they discharged shot aloof one against ano J ther, but also they coped together (as it were) foot to foot, at hand ftrokes with swordfight Their prows and for fhips fluck grapled together, while the poops and hin-decks were driven about with contrary oars of the adverte part. So neer and to thick withal flood the thips, and within fo narrow a room, that icarce one dart light into the water in vain, and did no harm. With their beak-heads they affailed one another, as it had been on land fight, and to close they were, that the fouldiers might passe out of one ship into another, as they fought. Howbeit, two thips there were above all the reft, that maintained a notable fight, and in the vanguard and forefront of the band, invested one another most furiously. In that of the Romans was Quintins himself in person, and in the other of the farentins, was one Nico, furnamed Perco, a man not only odious unto the Ro. mans, for the publick quarrel between both states, but also maliciously bent, upon a private spight K and rancour, as banding with that faction, which had betrayed Tarentum to Annibal. This Nice elpying Quinting both nghting and alto encouraging his men withal, charged him at unawares, and ran him quite through with a partifan: who was not to foon faln forward headlong upon the foredeck, armour and all, but the Tarentin following the train of his victory, and leeing the ship dis ordered and troubled for the loffe of their leader, luftily came forward, and boorded her; laid about him manfully, and put by the enemies out of his way, until the Tarentins were malters of the prow and fore taille. Whiles the Romans had much ado (fo thrumbled they were and thrult together disorderly) to defend and keep the poop and hind deck; with that, another gaily of the enemis appeared on a fuddain, and charged the hind part. So the Roman ship in the midli between both, was boorded on every fide, and taken. Whereupon all the reit were greatly terrified, feeing the L Admiral-fhip was won by the enemy, and they fled on all hands. Some were funk in the deep Sea, fome made hast with their oars, and scudded to the land, but anon were a prize and prey to the Thurins and Metapontins. But of the Hulks and Caricks, which were fraught with victual, and followed after, very few there were that fell into the hands of the enemies . the rell (hitting and turning their fails crois, this wayes and that wayes, according to the inconstancy of the wind, recovered the main Sea.

But about Tarentum at the same time, their fortune was nothing so good. For whereasthere went out of the Town upon a four thouland men a foraging, for to purvey corn, Livim, Conflable of the Castle and Captain of the garrison, spying his time (as he waited ever for all opportunities) made out of the faid Cattle 2000 armed fouldiers, under the leading of C. Perfim a valorous and y industrious man . who set upon the Tarentins stragling out of order, and dispersed in wandering wife over the fields; and after he had followed a long time the execution, killing them here and there as he encountred them; the reft, which were but few left of io many, he chaled to the Town for they made halt in great fear thither, and were let in at the gates ftanding half that, for featlet at the same randon the Town should have been lost. So the Tarentins and Romans, when they had made the reckoning, put up all on even hand. For the Romans were winners by land, the Timtins at Sear and both of them disappointed alike of their hope of corn, which was prefented to their eyes, but they nevertalted thereor.

At the same time Lavinus the Conful, after a good part of the year was gone about, arrived in Sicely, greatly expected and locked for, as well by the old allies as the new and the first thingof N all other and most important, he supposed, was together with this new peace, to settle and compose the State of Syracufa, so much disordered and out of frame. After that, he led his legionto Agrigenium, where only there remained the reliques of war; which City was kept by altrong garriion of Carthaginians. There fortune favoured his first designs. Hanne chanced to bethe General over the Carthaginians, but he wholly relied and repoled all his hope in Matinatural the Numidians. This Musines had ranged all over Sicily at his pleasure, and raised booties out of the territories and Lands of the Roman affociats, and by no force or policy could hebe intercepted of his passage back to Agrigentum, nor yet be pinned within the City, but that he would issue forth whenloever he listed. This glory of his, because now it checked (as it were) the same and honour of the General, turned the man at length to displeasure and danger : fo as, what good fervice foever was atchieved, it was never well taken by Hanno, not joyoully accepted, into gard of the perion, who was a prick alwayes in hiseye. Whereupon in the end be gave and the Capsaiuship of Marines from himself, and bestowed it upon his own Son: thinking, that is gether with his government and command, he should lose all his authority and reputationally among the Numidians. But it fell our far otherwile. For the morethat he was in differece and disfavour with Hanno, the greater grew the old favour and love of the Numidians toward him

A Neither could be himfelt endure any longer the un worthy wrong and indignity effered unto him a and therefore in revenge he prefently dispatched certain secret messengers unto Lavinna, with credence, that he would betray and deliver Agrigentum into his hands. By the mediation of their intercourriers, there passed sufficient security and afforance between them: and the matter being concluded, the manner also of contriving the plot, was agreed upon. Whereas therefore the Numidians were possessed, and had the guard of that gate that openeth toward the Sea; after they had either driven out the old warders from thence, or killed them, they let in the Romans at the same gate into the City, who were sent of purpose, according to the former agreement. And when they marched up into the midit of the City, even to the market place, with banner displaied. and with great tumult and notic; Hanno supposing it was nothing elfe, but a feditious upriling of B the Numidians (like as they had done tometimes before) came forth as to appeale and flav a mus tiny and commotion. But discovering a greater multitude afar off, than the Numidians were: and bearing withal the Romans to shout, with the manner whereof his ears had been well acquainted before time, he took him to his heels ere he came within the dart-shot. And being let out at a backpollern gate, taking with him Epicides, he recovered with some few other the Sea fide, where, a good hap was, they light upon a small bark or pinnace : and so leaving Sicily to the enemies, for which there had been much strife to many years together, they passed over into Affrick. The multitude belides both of Carthaginians and Sicilians, without any skirmilh either begun or intended, fled like blind men they wift not whither and finding all wayes made up, and no paffage forth, they were milerably flam and hewn apieces about the gates. Lavinus being possessed of the C Town, caused all the chief men and rulers of the City, to be bearen with rods, and to lose their heads: all the rest together with the pillage he fold in port-sale, and the mony that was raised thereof, he lent to Rome.

When the news of this misfortune of the Agrigentins was blown over Sicily, all at or continued Roman, and Annibat loft all. For in short space there were 20 Towns betrayed and yeelded, fix forced by affault, and to the number of 40 voluntarily furrendred to the devotion and protection of the Romans. The principal noble men of which States, after that the Confuls had either rewarded or punished according to their feveral demerits, and compelled the Sicileans generally to lay by arms and weapons, and to take themselves to the plough, for to ear, till, and low their grounds; to the end that the Hand might bring forth fruit, not only to inftain and maintain the natural inhabitants thereof, but also to ease the price of corn and victuals in the City of Rome, and throughout all Italy, like as it had done many times before . he transported over with him into Italy a rabble and damned crew of unruly people from Agatirna. Some four thouland there were of them, a confuted multitude of all forts, a very mith math and fink, dunghil of vile, and wretched persons, most of them Outlaws, Bankrupts, and notorious malefactors, in danger of death by the laws of their Cities where they lived. And being fled their countries, tome for one fad, fome for another, they chanced all upon like fortune to fort themselves (as commonly birds of a feather will flie together,) and at Agatirna, they made choile like outlaws, to live by robbing and (poiling) and this was their only profession and trade. Lavinus thought it no good policy to leave behind him their good fellows in an Iland, which began out now upon new peace to knit and unite again; for fear lest they would minister matter of innovation and change; and besides, there was some good use of them among the Rhegins, for to forage and rove about the Brutians country: for fuch they flood in need of, and had laid for a company which were acquainted with theeving and ficaling. And to this year made an end of the war in Sicily.

P. Scipio L. Deputy and General in Spain, having in the prime and beginning of Spring put his faips to Sea and fet them aflote, and by an edict fimmoned all the aids of the allies to repair to the Rendezvous at Taracon; gave order and commandment, that as well the ships of war as of charge and burden, should from thence let forward, and shew themselves at the mouth of the River Yberm. And after he had given direction and charge, that the legions from out of their winter harbors, should there meet together, himself accompanied with five thousand of his allies put himself on his journey to his main army. Being thither come, he thought it good to make lome speech to the old fouldiers especially, as many as remained alive after to great defeats and overthrows, and when he had allembled them all together to an audience, in this wife he spake unto them. " Never was there new General before my felf, that could by good right, and in regard of defert, render thanks unto his fouldiers before he had employed them, and made The Oration tryal of their good fervice. But as for me, before I ever came within fight of this Province, of P. Scipio to "before I cutred my government and faw the camp, fortune bath obliged me, and made me beholden unto you. But totalmuch as our ful purpole and present resolution is, by the leave, favour, and power of the Gods, not so much to hold the postession our selves and abide in Soam, but to disposi fie the Car hagmians that they may have no footing nor abode at all there: and fince the thing that we go about, is not sto fland keeping the bank of Iberse, for to flop the pallage of the enemy; but to give the attempt o patie over our felves by force: yea, and therewithal to transport the war over with

I fear me greatly, lest this will fem H se unto some of you a greater designment, and more andscious enterprise of mine, than may ether fuit and fort with the fresh remembrance of those late defeats, or stand well with my young and unripe age. Having by this Oration, incented and inflamed the courages of his fouldiers, and left Syllanus with a guard of three thouland foot, and three hundred Horle, for the defence of that coalt; he transported over the River Iberus, all the rest of his forces, amounting to the number of five and twenty thouland foot, and 25 hundred Horfemen. There he was advited by some about him, seeing the Punick armies were departed into three countries to far remote and diffite afunder, to fet upon and affail that which was next : but he doubting and fearing left by that means he should draw them shogether, and knowing that he was not able alone, to match and make his part good with to many holts at once, determined in the mean while, to be doing with new Carthage, and to beliege C and affault it. This City, as it was rich and wealthy in it felf, to it was full of all the enemies furniture and provision for war. There was their armour kept, there was their money laid up, there remained the holtages of all Spain. Befides, as it was leated commodiously to cross over from thence into Affrick: to ir tood upon a convenient and large baven, able to receive and harbour the greatelt navy at Sea, and the only baven (if I be not deceived) of all that coult and tract of Spain, which bounderh next upon our Sea. But no man was made privy to his determination, or knew whither they should take their journey, save only Laliss. He being tent about with the armado, had direction to to temporife and guide his course by fail and oar, that at one and the felf same instant, both Scipio might pretent his Land forces in the view of Carthage, and the fleet enter the haven. So they depated from Iberse, and within feven dayes came before the City of Carthage, both by Sea and Land. His camp he pitched on the north-fide of the City: which he entrenched and fortified on that outward back part, that flood farthell from the City : as for the forefront, it was by natural fituation of the ground, defended furely enough. For the fite of Carchage is in this fort. There is a The fituation gult or creek of the Sea, in the middle coast and river well neer of Spain, opposite most to the of New Car-South-west wind, running & retiring in length within the Land half a mile, out lying out in breadth thege. somewhat more. In the very mouth of this creek, there is a little Iland from the open Sea; which faveth, sheltereth, and defendeth the haven from all other winds, but only the Southwell. From the inmost nook of this bay, there beareth out a promontory like a demy lland, which is the very Hill or Cape whereupon the City is built. The fame on the East fide and the South, is compassed with the Sca. from the West, it is enclosed with a lake or standing mear, which also spreadeth so newhat E toward the North, of an uncertain depth; which altereth according to the tide, and as the Sea cither ebbeth or floweth. Now, there is an elbo or bank of firm ground, some what leffe than a quarter of a mile over, that joyneth the City with the main or continent. To that fide (not withit anding it had been no great piece of work there to fortifie) the Roman General cast no trench, sor raited any rampier : either upon a brave and hauty mind, to show the enemy how confidently he trafted in his own strength; or because, whensoever he advanced to the walls of the City (23 oftentimes betook occasion to to do) he might have open recourse and regrels again into the camp. But when the utter fide, which required fortifications, was finished, he let the thips in order within the haven, making a shew, as if he would besiege them also on the water side. And when he had gone through all his armado, and given the Caprains of the thips in charge, to look we'll to their centinels and watches in the night (for that commonly enemies at their first belieging, make what attempts and adventures they can in every place) he returned into his camp. And because he would not only yeeld his fouldiers good reason of this his delignment, in that he began war first and principally with the befieging of that City; but also encourage them, and put them in good hope of the winning and conquest thereof, he assembled them together, and discoursed before

"My valiant fouldiers and trulty friends, If any man here thinketh, that ye are brought hither The Oration to affail a City only, and there an end : he rather maketh reckoning of your prefers pain and of Scippo to his "travel, than casteththe profit and commodity thereof ensuing. For ye shall in very truth give souldiers. the assault to the walls but of one City; but in that one City ye shall be masters and conquerors of all Spain. Here lie the hostages of alitheir Nobles, their Princes, and States. And no "fooner shall ye be Lords of them, and have them in your rule and custody, but pretently, all that now is under the hands of the Carthaginians in Spain, will be furrendered unto you, and at your devotion. Here is all the money that the enemies have : without which like as they are not able to maintain war, (as who wage and entertain all their armies for pay) to it will mighrily thead us (if we light upon it) in gaining the hearts of the barbarous people. Here are their engines "and artillery, here is their armour, here is their tackling and provision for their navy, and all

"other munition and furniture for war : wherewith we shall both furnish our selves, and disfumily it the enemy. Gain we shall over and besides, not only right fair and beautiful, but also a most rich of and wealthy City: yes, and more than that, of right great importance and confequence, in re-" gard of a goodly and furpaffing commodious haven: by means whereof, we may be provided both from Sea and Land, of all things needful and requifite for the wars. Which, as they will be of great moment to us that shall have them, to they will be the greater loss to the enemy that " (Itall forgo them. This is their Callle for ftrength, their garner for corn, their treasury for mony, "their armory, their arfenal: and in one word, their very store-house of all things whatforver. "Hither is the direct passage and streight cut out of Affrick, here is the only port and harbor for " Thipping, between the Iflands of Gades, or Gebraltar, and the mountains Pyrenai: from whence " all Span overlooketh (as it were) and commandeth Affrick. But knowing that you are well t appointed already, and prepared to the service, I will say no more but this: Now for the honour "of the Romans, let us go couragiously to it, and with all our might and main affault new Car. " thage, And when they all with one accord cried unto him, fo to do indeed, and that no other thing was first to be done; then he advanced before Carthage, then he gave commandment to affail it at once, by Land and Sea. Mago the Captain of the Carthaginians on the other fide, whenhe faw preparation made by Water and Land to give the affault; for his part ordered his forces and dispoled them in this manner. To make head against the Romans on that side where they lay encamped, he opposed two thousand Townsmen: with a guard of five hundred fouldiers he kept the citadel ; other five hundred he placed upon a little hill belonging to the City which lookethio the East : all the other multitude whatfoever, he appointed to make refistance in other place, K where any outcries, shouts, or suddain alarms should be given. Then having set open a gate, be fendeth those forth, whom he had arranged in that street which leadeth directly to the campos the enemies. The Romans (according as they were commanded by their Leader himself) in the beginning gave ground a little and retired, to the end, that during the time of skirmith and confl. c, they might be neerer to the supply of succours, which were to be sent to second them from behind. And verily at the first they stood to it stoutly on both parts, and there was no ods perts. ved. But afterwards, the Romansbeing ftill freshly reenforced from out of the camp, not only discomfitted the enemies, and put them to flight, but preffed on them to hard, as they fled disordered and out of aray, that if Scipie had not founded the retreat, it feemed, that they would have intermingled themselves pelmel with those that ran away, and sushed into the City with them. Was z in the City throughout there was no less fear than in the battel. Many courts of guard and other places were abandoned, the curtein of the walls was left naked, and every man made what fifthe could to leap down and eleape. Which when Scipio perceived (who now was turned to a mount which they call Mercurius Tentates) and namely, that the walls were void of all the defendants, he commanded all his fouldiers to iffue forth of the camp, to fet forward to the affault, and tobing ladders to feale. Himfelf in person, defended with the shields of 3 tall lusty young men going before him (for by this time they let flie afresh from the walls a mighty velley of thet or all fors) approached the City. There he exhorted, encouraged, and commanded them to do what was requifite in this fervice. And that which made most to enkindle the courages of the fouldiers, we was there personally as an eye-witness and beholder of each mans valour or cowardise. Whereupon M they fluck not to run upon the very thot, and to receive many a wound: and now nothing could keep them back; neither the strength of the walls, nor the armed men that stood thereupen, but they scaled striving who could mount upon the walls first. At the same time, that part of he Cay also which the Sea beat upon, began to be affailed by the ships. But from thence, it should been, they made more ado with bouting and hurrying, than effected ought by any forcible affault. for whiles they came close to the walls with their Thips, whiles they put forth their ladders and their fouldiers; whiles every man laboured to gain the Land, the neerest way he could: what with their firiving and haft-making, they hindred one another. And by that time Mago had filled the wals full of armed men, who let flie arrows, Javelins, darts, and all kind of thot, whereof they bad ga thered together exceeding great (tore. But neither men, nor arrows and darts, nor any thingself.) defended the wall so much as the very wall it self. For few ladders they had that could reaching to the top: and the longer any of them were, the more weak also they were. Whereupon, ly retton that they who were climed up to the highest rounds, could not gain the parapet and distinge the ladder, and yet some or other still clambred up after, the ladders being overcharged with the weight, brake in pieces. Some again there were, that notwithstanding the ladders underthem held still and stood unbroken, yet when they looked down from on high, their eyes to dazled, and were overcalt with a milt, that they lost their fight, and fell from the top to the ground. Thus when ladders here, and men there, came tumbling down, and the enemies upon their good speed grew to be more harty and hardy, the retreat was founded which gave to the befreged within the low not hope only of prefent reft and intermiffion of fo great labour and toil, but also affured thems manner, for the time to come, that the City was tenable against all scalades, although it was invested therewith round about. And as for fabricks and mounts to be raised and planted again it, they were not only difficult and hard to be performed, but also would ask some long time : and Minister in the mean while, space sufficient for the other Generals of their own to come to the refeue- But scarce was the first assault fully ceated, when Scipio commanded other tresbut unfoiled fouldiers, to take the ladders of them that were wearied already and wounded, me with greatet violence to give a new Camifado. Himfelf, fo ison as be understood that it was ebb and low water, having been advertifed by certain fifthermen of Taracon (who iometimes with light boats nied to row, and other whiles when their veflels touched the ground; to wade all over the lake upon firm ground) that men might eafily paffe to the walls on foot a thirder to that place he brought all his fouldiers to the affault. It was now almost noon-tide of the day; and besides that the water of it telf naturally fell with the ebb into the Sea, there was a good sound not there wind arofe, which drave the water out of the lake (which now was well fain) after the tide, and dicevered fuch fhallows, that whereas in some places thereof they went up to the navel, in some again they waded fearce knee deep. Which alocit Serbie knew well to be an ordinary thing in natural reason, and therefore with good forecast had made provision accordingly to take that advaniage, yet he turned it to a miraculous and prodigious accident, attributing all to the immediate handy-work of the Gods: as who to give passage and footing to the Romans, and urried back the courie and current of the Sea, discharged lakes of their water, and opened wayes unto them, that never before were troden with the fole of mans foot ; and there with ne willed his fouldiers to follow Neptune, the guide and Leader of the way, and to passe boldly through the mids of the lake cloic to the very walls. On the Land fide the affailants had exceeding trouble in standing under the walls: for not only they were hindred by reason that the curtein was to high; but also as they went, they lay open and under their shot, and were wounded both wayes, so as their flanks and fides were more annoyed as they approached under, than their faces and forefront of their bodies. But on the other part, as they went quietly and eatily through the mear to the wall, so they climed forward as fecurely to the very top thereof. For neither was it throughy fortified with bulwarks, not railed to any height by industry and art of man, as being supposed by natural situation of the place, and the standing lake besides, strong enough and sufficiently defended a nor any guard of a med men were there in watch and ward, opposed against the assailants : whiles every man was buly, and wholly intended to help there, from whence (ome danger was feen. The Romans being thus entred the City over the walls without any skirmish, marched from thence with what speed they could, unto that gate, about which all the fight and not skirmish was already begun : for there no conly all their minds were bent and a nuted, but also their eyes and ears were occupied and possessed; whiles some fought, others looked on and encouraged the figh e s : in such tort, that there was none of them all once perceived or knew, that the City was taken and furgetied behind them, before the darts flew about their ears and light upon their back parts, and until they had the enemies both before and behind. Then not only the walls were taken (when the defendants upon a twofold fear, were driven to abandon them) but also the gate from withinforth and forced by Stiwithout, began to be broken down and anon, after continual running and beating against it, the pio, leaves thereof perforce flew apeeces, because there might be nothing to impeach or let them in their entrances then the armed fouldiers brake in most furiously. Many already had scaled the wails, and got over, but they turned and betook themselves every where to massacre and make havock of the Townimen. But the main battel, which entred in at the gate with their Captains, orderly by companies and ranks in their array, marched forward through the midft of the City to the market place. From whence Sciplo might fee the enemies flie two wayes, fome to the intress upon the bill aforesaid, which standeth to the East, and was kept with a guard of five hundred louldiers : others into the citadel, into which Mago himself, with all the armed men in a manner, who were driven from the walls, had retired and fled for to fave himfelf. Whereupon he tent a part of his forces to win the faid Hill, and himfelf in person led the test to the Cattle. And as the fort upon the Hill was taken at the first assault and onset given, so Mago, after he had a while made some means to defend the Caltle, seeing all places full of enemies, swarming every where, and no other hope, yeelded himfelt, the citadel, and the garrifon. Until the Callie was furrendred and given up, there was nothing but murdering and killing all over the City, and not one spared that seemed to be fourteen years old and up ward, if they came in their way. But then, upon the found of Trumpet the execution ceased, and the Conquerors fell to saccage and pillage, which of all forts role to a mighty thing. Of free born, such as were of male fex, there were taken priloners 10000. Then, to many of them as he found to be natural citizens of Carthage, he difmilled and let go free, and reflored unto them not only the City, but also their own goods, which the first fury and rage of warriors had left natouched. There were of Attifans and handicraftsmen, some two thousand: those by an edict he pronounced to be bond, and adjudged them as conflicate, to serve the Common-weal of the people of Rome: yet with some hope, that shortly they might obtain their freedom again, in case they performed good service, and shewed themfelvesdingent in all ministeries and offices of war. The rest of the multitude of inhabitants, such as were able and young lufty men, as also the front and flurdy bondmen, he awarded them to the thips, for to farmish up the number of Gally flaves and Rowers, and with the eight ships of war, which he took captive in the haven, he encreased his own Armado. Besides all this multitude, there were also the hostages of the Spaniards above written, of whom he took as great care, and as good regard, as if they had been the children of Allies and affociats. A mighty deal of warlike arullery and ordinance was there found and feized on. Of Catapults of the greatest fize 120, of a lefter fort 281. Balifts some greater, some small , of them 33, of these 52. Of Scorpions and Crosbows to shoot quartels as well great as small, and likewise of detentive armour, and offentive Wespons, a huge deal, and a marvellous quantity. Military enfigns 74. Of gold and filver there was a mighty mais brought unto the General. Golden cups or bolls there were 276, every one H weighing almost one pound. Of filver tryed, wrought, and coyned, 18300 pound weight: and much plate and veffels of filver. All this C. Flaminius the Treaturen, received either by weight or tale. Of wheat there was 40000 Modii, of barly 270000. Of barks and ships of burden, there were in the haven won by force, and taken, 113. Some were fraught with corn, armour, brafs befides, and iron, fail-cloth, and hemp, or spart for cables andropes, also with timber for ship-wrights, Carthage the Town it felf, in fo great store of wealth and warlike provision, was the least of all

That day Scipio, having committed the charge of guarding and keeping the City unto Leive and the mariners, brought back the legions into the camp, and commanded the fouldiers to tehreful their bodies with food and reft, wearied as they were, and over-laboured in one day with all min. ner of toil and work that belongeth to war-fervice: as who, had both fought a battel in the field. and also taken so great pains, and undergone so much hazard and danger, in assaulting and forcing the City, yea, and after it was won, had fought with diladvantage of ground, with those that were

"The next day, after he had called both fouldiers and mariners together, first he rendred laud and es praise, yea, and thanks unto the immortal Gods, who in one day had not only made him Lord of "the most mighty and wealthy City in all Spain, but also had laid up for him there against his coer ming, all the riches well-neer of Affrick and Spain: whereby as the enemies now had nothing " left them, to he and his had all things plentiful. Then he commended the vertue and valour of a his fouldiers, whom neither the fallying out of the enemies could fright, nor the mighty height " of the walls scare, nor the blind and untried foords of the lake could once dilmay, nor the fine. " tion of the Castle teated upon an high cliff terrifie, nor yet the Castle it fell most strongly built " and fortified, was able to daunt and make afraid, but that they would pais over all and breik through all. And therefore albeit every one of them deserved at his hands all rewards, yether er principal honour of a mural crown and garland, belonged properly unto him that first icaled and es mounted over the wall. Come he forth therefore (quoth he) and frew himfelf, who taketh him-44 felf worthy of that gift, and let him claim his due. Whereupon there were two that put in forit, and demanded the fame, Q. Trebellius, a Centurion of the fourth Legion, and Sext. Digitum a Servitor at the Sea. Neither traved these parties themselves so hotly about the matter, as the love and favour of them fet all the whole army divided into legionary fouldiers, and fervitours at Sei, man i heat of contention, to labour for him that belonged to their fide, and was a member as it wereof their body. C. Laline Admiral of the fleet, went with the Sailers and Seamen. M. Semproniu Tuditanne was altogether for the legionary Land fouldiers. This debate was like to breed a leb, and to raise a very mutiny in the holt. Whereupon Scipio pronounced that he would appoints Delegates three Commissioners, to sit upon the cause who should take the deposition of winesles, and give their verdict accordingly, whether of thefe two persons entred over the wall full into the Town. Now because C. Laliss and M. Sempronius were Advocats to the one party and the other, be therefore adjoyned unto them a third perion, one P. Cornelius Candinus, to go as mindifferent Mediator between them two: and gave order and commandment, that those other three commissioners abovesaid should sit together, and hear and determine the controversic. Whenas & the matter grew to a greater heat of contention, by reason that men of such mark and worth, were acquainted with the action, and had their hand in it, who were not fo much Advocats to please but moderators and judges to bear down a fide; C. Lelius, rifing out from the court, cometothe "Tribunal feat unto Scipio: and informed him that the manner of proceeding in this matteria quettion, was without all good order, modelty and reverence; and fo handled, that they were " like to go together by the ears, and try it out by knocks. But, be it, quoth he that no blowsbe dealt, yet it is a most shameful example and detellable precedent, that the honor and guerdon "due to vertue, should be carried by traudulent coven and ungodly perjury. For, quoth he, thele in gionary fouldiers frand of the one hand, the Sea fervitors on the other, and ready they be to fwest on both fides all the oaths of God, and to that rather which their will and affection carriet them N "to, than which in their confcience they know to be true. By which guilt of for wearing and per-" juty, they will not only bring a curle and vengeance upon themselves and their own lives, but at also upon the enfigns, standards, and very Eagles, yea, and their religious military Oathand Sacrament. Thus much I thought good to give you advertisement of afore-hand, and that by the id-" vile of P. Cornelius, and M. Semprenius. Scipie after he had highly praised Lelius, called the fouldiers to an affembly, and there with a loud voice pronounced, and faid thus : I am infficiently informed upon certain relation, that Q Trebellim, and Sex. Digitus scaled the wall both together, and therefore I award as well to the one as to the other a mural garland, in token and tellimony of their fingular vertue. Then he rewarded the reft alto, according to every mans defertand valorous service. But above all other, he honoured C. Lalina Admiral of the fleet, not only in 0 matching him equally with himself in all commendable parts and qualities, but also in presenting him with a coronet of beaten gold, and thirty Oxen. Then he gave commandment that the lo stages of the Cities and States of Spain should be called forth. What a number were of them, I am abathed and loth to fet down in writing: for almuch as I find in tome Chronicles, that they were upon some three hundred, in others 725. The like variety there is of other matters, 2 monght lundry writers; One writeth that the Punick garrifon were ten thousand : another 7000

and a third comes with his two thousand, and no more, I meet with one record which reporteth. that there were 10000 taken prisoners : and another, that there were above 25000. Of Scorpions or Crosbows, great and imail, I should say there were gained some 60, if I would take for mine author Silenus, a greek writer: but if I follow Valerius Antias and go by him I should tell you a tale of fix thousand of the greater fort, and thirteen thousand of the smaller. See how little rule they had of their tongues to over-reach, or stay of their pens to fet down so loud lies upon record. Nay, they are not well agreed so much as upon this point, who were the great Captains and Commanders, Most of them say, that Lalius was L. Admirall: there be again that would have M. Junius Syllanus to be the man And Armes was Captain of the Punick garrion, and yielded to the Romans, if ye lift to believe Valerius Antias: but by the testimony and credit of others, it was B Mago, Moreover, the records accord not about the number of thips that were taken, nor of the weight of gold and filver, nor yet of the sum of money that was raised of the pillage. To conclude if we must needs believe fome one or other the mean between is the best, and carrieth most likelihood of the truth.

Butto return again to Scipio: "When he had called forth the hostages into his presence first he "bad them all in generall to be of good cheer: for why? they were now in the hands of the peo-"ple of Rome, who ever defired to bind men unto them by favours and good turns more than to "awe them with fear and dread; and to have forrain nations knit and joyned in faithful amity, " rather than held in subjection by heavy servitude. Then after he had taken the names in writing of their feverall Cities, he also reviewed the number of the prisoners, and counted just how many belonged to every State. Which done, he dispatched messengers home into their countries, willing their parents and friends to come and receive every man their own, If haply any Embassadors of their Cities were present, he restored unto them their own hostages without delay: for all the rest, he gave express charge to C. Flaminius the Treasurer to see unto them in all kind, courteous, and liberall usage. Whiles he was buse in taking this order, there hapned to come from among the hostages, even out of the midst of the company, an aged gentlewoman, the wife of Mandonius, brother to Indibilis, a Prince and great Lord of the Hergetes, " She fied tears, and fell down prostrate at the feet of the L. General: and withall began to befeech him most instant-" ly, to give a more special charge, concerning the custody of the women-sex: and to recommend "them to their keepers, for to be guarded with a careful eye, and to be kept and attended on D" more tenderly. Why? quoth Scipio, I warrant thee good woman, they shall want for nothing that is meet for them. Then replied this Dame again, We stand not so much (quoth she) upon " these terms; for a little thing. God wor, may serve and content them in this poor estate and low " condition: my care is for another matter, when I confider and behold the young and tender "age of these maidens here. As for my self, I am now past date, and without danger of that injury, "which our fex is subject and exposed unto. Now there stood about her the daughters of Indibilis, virgins in the fresh prime and flower of their age, and passing fair and beautiful withall ; befides some other Ladies as nobly born as they : who all honoured her as their natural mother that barethem. Then Scipio, "I would (quoth he) in the ordinary course as well of mine own discipline "as of that which is established by the people of Rome, have a respective consideration, that no E " one thing among us should suffer abuse, which essewhere in any place of the world is held inviolable: this would I do, I say, for mine own credit, and for the honour of Rome: but to have a "more special eyethat way, your own vertue also and worthiness bindeth me: who in the midst "of these your calamities and miseries have not forgot your womanly carriage and the honour of "your fex. And thereupon he delivered them over to the custody of a man of approved honesty and integrity, commanding him to guard them with no less reverence, modelly, and continency, than if they were the wives or mothers of their nearest friends that gave them entertainment. Afther this, there was presented unto him by his fouldiers a damosel and virgin of ripe years, taken also prisoner: but so wellfavoured and surpassing in beauty, that wheresoever she went every mans eye was upon her, in admiration of so rare and perfect a creature. Scipio having enquired of Fher country where she was born, and likewise of what parents she was descended; among other things learned, that she was espoused and affianced to a young Prince of the Celtiberians, whose name was Allucius, Forthwith he fent home to her parents and forefaid ipoute, for to repair unto him: and in the mean time he understood that her husband that should be was wonderfully enamoured of her, and ready to die for her love. So foon as the young Gentleman was come, Scipio enredinto a more familiar speech with him, than he did either with the father or mother of the maiden, and in these terms he entertained him : "I am a young man (quoth he) as well as your wielf. Come on therefore, let us young men both devile and commune together more treely, and Therare con-"not be too nice, coy, and bashfull one to the other. After that your espoused wife, taken captive tinence and "by my fouldiers, was brought unto me, and that I heard of the exceeding famine and affection courtened of that you cast upon her, I beleeved it full well: for her singular beauty deserveth no less, Now soralmuch as my felf, if I might be allowed to use the passimes of youth, (I mean no otherwise than in honest and lawful love) and were not called away by the Common-weal, & emploied wholly in other affairs of state, I would think to be pardoned and held excused, if I had an extraordinary liking to a spouse of mine own, and loved her extreamly. Imust therefore needs favour and tender your love, which is the thing I can, confidering that I may not the other in any wife, Your

Marcel, the Cof, had better fortune in a battell against him before Numistro, From whence Annibal distodged and departed by night. Marcellus pursued after him, and ever as he fell off, followed him hard still suntill he gave him battell. In the former fight Annibal had the better, but Mattellus in the later. Fab. Max, the father being Consul, had the Tarentins yield dup unto him by treason. In Spain, Scipio fought a battell with Aldrubal the fon of Amilear, at Bætula, and won the field. Among others there was a boy taken prisoner of royal bloud, and of incomparable beauty: whom he sent with rich oifts unto Masanilla his uncle by the mother. Claudius Marcellus and T. Quintius Cripinus the Confedent who chanced to go out of their Campto discover, as espicies, the country, were forelaid by an ambulh of D Annibal, and entrapped, Where Marcellus was flain: Crispinus fled. Hus flood the affairs in Spain. In Italy the Conful Marcellus having recovered Salapia by composition, won by force two towns from the Samnits, Maronea and Meles. Where there were flain three thousand of Annibal his souldiers, who had been left there in garrilon. Some good portion of the pillage was shared among the souldiers. Of wheat be-Edes, there was found there 240000 measures called Modii, and of barley 110000. But the joy from hence was not so great as the loss and damage received within few daies after, not far from the City Herdonea. Cn. Fulvins the Pro-Consul lay there encamped upon hope to regain that City, which after the defeat at Canna, had revolted from the Romans: a town neither feated in a place of furety, nor yet well furnished and manned for defence. The Captain thereof (Cn. Fulvius aforefaid) was by nature ever negligent, but grown much more rechles now, preiming upon a vain hope that he had of them within, in that he perceived how the townimen already began to fail in their devotion and faithfull allegeance to the Carthaginians, especially, after they heard, that upon the loss of Salapia, Annibal was departed out of those parts into the Brutians country.

Annibal had intelligence of all this brought unto him from Herdoneaby fecret messengers, which, as it caused him to have a carefull eye to the saving and keeping of a friend City, fo it ministed good hope unto him for to surprise his enemie at unawares and unprovided. Whereupon with his army lightly appointed, he took long journies and made hafte to Mardonea, to as he prevented almost the same and bruit of his coming. And to strike the more terrour into his enemie, he thither marched inbattell array. The Roman Generall, as adventurous and bold as heevery way, but nothing at all so politick, nor so strong, brought his forces forth immore hastethan good speed, and gave him battell. His fifth legion, and the left wing of corner of Cavalry began the skirmish, and charged horly. But Annibal had given his horsemen direction, that when the Infantry was in the midst of skirmish, with mind & eye wholly oconpied that way, they should when about and setch a compass, and whiles some of them affailed

the Camp, the rest should play upon the back of their enemies: himself iterating estisons unto H his men the name of Cn. And at Rome verily, as they mourned much for the loss past, so they feared as greatly the suure vanted and exalted himself. dangers. The Conful having passed out of Sammum into the Lucans country, sare down before Numifro, in the very light of Annibal, and there in a plain encamped himself, norwithstanding the enemy was possessed before of the hill, and had the vantage of the ground. And for to make more shew of his own considence, and how little he feared, he first brought forth his men, and marshalled them in order ready to bid battell. Annibal so soon as he saw the ensigns advanted forth of the gates, staid not behind. And they arranged their battels in such manner, as that the Carthaginians with the right wing took uppart of the hill, and the Romans displaied theirles wing in length, to the very walls of the town. After they had continued fight from the third hour of the day unto night, and that the vanguards on both fides were weary with maintaining of skirmish fo long: then the first legion of the Romans, with the right wing of their hosemen the Spanish fouldiers also of Annibal his part, the Balearian slingers likewise, together with the Elephants, began the fight, whiles the rest were already in hor conflict, and close together. For a long time the fight shrunk not of any hand. The first legion of the Romans was seconded with m the coming in of the third: and among the enemies likewife there came in new fouldirs that were lufty in place of the foiled and wearied. Whereby, of a lingting and long skirmin therebe gan all on a sudden a new, hot, and cruell battell, by reason that their courages were fresh, and their bodies in heart. But the night parted the fray, and left the victory doubtfull in the midft, The morrow after, the Romans from fun-tifing flood arranged in the field untill it was far day; and feeing none of the enemies appear and shew themselves, they sell to gather up the spoils by leisure, and heaped up in one place all the bodies of their own men that were flain, and made one greather, and burnt them to ashes. The night ensuing Annibal dislodged secretly without any noise, and departed into Apulia. And Marcellus so foon as day-light discovered the flight of his enemy (taving his hurt and wounded people at Numifro with a small guard, and L. Fursus Purpuro a Con lonell to be their Captain followed him by his steps, and at Venusia overtook him. There forces tain daies passed some salies from the guards of both armies, whiles both horse and foot one with another rather made flight skirmifhes, than any fet battels; and lightly the Romanshadalwaies the better hand. From thence the armies were conducted through Apulia, without any memorable fight at all, by reason that Annibal in the night season ever set forward, seeing some opportunity of forelaying and entrapping his enemy; and Marcellus never followed but introd day light, and fent out his espials before to clear the coafts.

In this mean while Flacom spending the time at Capua, in making port-sale of the noblemen goods, and in fetting and letting out to farm the land which was conficate and forfeit to the common-wealth of Rome (and all for a rent of corn) there happed a new complet and practice which lay hidden for the time, to be detected and come to light, to the end that he might next want one matter or other totake occasion for to plague and torment the Campans, He had aken order that his fouldiers (hould remove out of the houles within the town, partly for that as well the tenements of the faid town within as the lands without should be rented forth and part ly for fear lest the exceeding pleasantness and delectable feat of that City should esseminate history my, as it had done the hoft of Annibal before time: and commanded them to build themselves about the gates and along the walls, cottages and sheds in wallike fashion, and only to serve for fouldiers. Thele were most of them made of hurdles and boords, some warled and wound with reeds, and all of them thatched with fraw and flubble, as it were of purpole to minister fuell for fire, Now there were some hundred and seventy Campans had conspired at one certain hour of the night to fet all a fite: and the principall heads and Captains were certain brethren of the Blofis: and it fortuned that by some of the same house and family the conspiracy was disclosed. Whereupon at once the gates were madefall by the commandment of the Pro-Conful: and the alarm being firicken up and tounded all the foundiers ran together. All those that were party or privy to the intended treaton were apprehended, and after rigorous examination had by corture. they were condemned and executed : the informers were made free, and had each one a reward

When the Nucesines and Acerrans made moan that they wanted place of habitation, forafmuchas Acerra was in part burnt, and Nuceria utterly razed and deftroged : Marcellus refetred them over to the Senat of Rome, and fent them thither. Now was the unmerat an end, and the time drew near of the Confulselection. But the letters of Marcellas unto the Senat (wherein he figuified that he was not for the good of the Commonwealth to depart one foot from Antibal, whom he himself purfued fill at heels, and to much the more horly because he fell off and forbare to fight :) let the LL of the Senar into a great perplexity, for feat either to call away the Comini from the wars, especially now in the midit of his best fervice, or to be without Comiuls the next year. But it was thought if the end the beff course, that Valerius the Confes, although he were not in Italy, but beyond fea, should rather be fent for, D and called forth of Sicily So by order from the Senat, there were letters dispatched unto him from L. These news being read by the Consuls so troubled and disquieted the Senat, that they thought st the feas very shortly. there was no tarrying for the ordinary election of Magistrates, summoned and called by the Conful, but that they should nominate a Dictator of purpose to assemble that solemn Session, and the Conful immediatly to return again into his Province. But hereupon grew some debate and quesion for a time, while the Consul said, that he would nominate and create Dicastor M. Sairi y #1 Me Jula, who was then in Sicity, and Admiral of the fleet: but the LL, replied again and laid, that a Dictator might not be elected or declared without the Territories of Rome, and those were all within the limits and marches of Italy, But after that M. Lacretius (a Tribune of the Commons) had pur this controversie to question before the Senat for to be cast and desided by their opinion ons; then the Senare granted out adecree, That the Conful before he departed from the City, frould put up a bill or supplication unto the body of the people, that it would please themo elect a Dictator: and whomfoever they by their fuffrages chose, him should he pronounce and declare for the Dictator and in case the Consul refused so to do, then the Prator of the City should propose the same unto the people: and if not he neither, then the Tribunes should propound it unto the Commons. But when the Conful denied flatly to put it unto the people, being atting meerly belonging to his authority and place, and likewife expressely forbad the Przetor to doit? N then the Tribunes of the Commons took the matter upon them, whereupon the Commons ganted, that Q. Fulvius, who then was in Capua, should be nominated Dictator, But the night before that very day that this affembly of the Commons was to be holden, the Conful departed privily, and took his journey toward Sicily. The Nobles thus being disappointed and declirute, thought good to fend letters unto Marcellus, for to lend his helping hand now unto the Common Val thus forfaken and abandoned by his Collegue, and to declare him for Dictator, whom the people had by their voices elected, So Q, Fulvius was pronounced Dictator by Marcellus the Confil: and by vertue of the faid act of the Commons, P. Licinius Craffus the Arch-Prelate, was by Q. Fultims mominated Generall of the Cavalry.

The Dictator after he was come to Rome, fent Cn, Sempronius Blasus his Lieutenant; whom he had at Capua, to the Army into the Province of Hatruria, in stead of C, Calpharnius the Prior whom by his letters he moved to take the government of Capua, and his army there. a fort, which by lot had the prerogative of giving their first voices, elected for Consuls Q. Fulving and Q. Fabius: unto whose election no doubt, the rest of the Tribes called forth in right course and lawfull order would have enclined, but that C. and L. Ariani, the Tribunes of the Commons came between with their negative voice: who faid, it flood not well with civility, that one man should continue ever still in Magistracy, and besides, that it was a more shamefull example and foul precedent, that himself should be created Consul, who assembled the election: and therefore, if the Dictator would admit of his own name, and allow himself eligible, they would not suffer the affembly to continue any longer: but if there might be some other propounded besides him. they would not hinder the proceedings thereof untill all was finished. "The Distator alledged g " in the behalf of the election, and maintained the cause by the anthority of the Senat, by the "grant and act of the Commons, and by fundry examples of former times. For when Cn. Servili-"us was Conful, at what time as Flaminius the other Conful was flain at Thrafymenus: by order "granted out of the Senat, there was a bill preferred to the Commons, and the same passed by "their voices, That fo long as the war continued in Italy, it might be lawfull for the people to "chule and create Confuls again, as often as they pleafed, wholoever they would, out of the "number of them that had been Confuls, And as for examples (quoth he) in this case, I can al-"ledge both old and new: to wit, long ago L. Posthumius Megillus being Interrex, was even in "that very election which he called and held, created Conful himself, with Cn. Jun. Bubulcus: and "of latter daies Q. Fabius likewile, who verily would never have accepted of the Confulship, and C "fuffered it to be hung upon him so continually, if he had deemed it to be against the good of "the common-weal. After much debate and long alteration, entertained with fundry like speeches, at length the Distator and the Tribunes agreed to this point, and agreed of this issue, That they would fland to the award and judgment of the Senat. The LL, of the Senat were all of this mindsthat the present condition of the common-weal required no less, but that the state and the affairs thereof should be managed by old and experienced Captains and Generals, and such as were skilfull in feats of arms. And therefore they utterly milliked that the election should be hindred and disturbed. Thus the Tribunes relented, and the election went forward and was finished. So there were declared Confuls, Q. Fabin Max, the fifth time, Q. Fulvius Flaceus the third time. Then were created Prators, L. Veturius Philo, T. Quintius Crispinus, C. Hostilius Tubulus, and C. Au-D runculeius. When the Magilarates were once elected for the year, Q. Fulvius refigned up his Di-

In the very end of this summer, a Carthaginian fleet of forty fail, under the conduct of Amilear the Admiral, passed over into Sardinia, and at first invaded and wasted the territory of Olbia: then, after that P. Macline Volfo the Prayer there, showed himself with an army, they set a compass about, and sailed to the other side of the Island, and fortaged the lands about Caralita: and fo returned again into Affrick enriched with prizes and booties of all forts.

In that year divers Priests died at Rome, and new subdituted in their tooms, C. Servilius the Prelator Pontiex was invested and installed instead of T. Othacilus Crassus. In like manner T. Sempronius Longus, the son of Caiss, was chosen Decemviz, deputed for holy ceremonies, in place of T. Sempronius Longus, the son of Titus, M. Martius the King of Sacrificers departed this life and M. e-Emplos Priests deputed that year, In this year also were Censors created, to wit, L. Vetunius Philosom Priests deputed that year, In this year also were Censors created, to wit, L. Vetunius Philosom Priests deputed that year, In this year also were Censors created, to wit, L. Vetunius Philosom Priests deputed that year, In this year also were Censors created, to wit, L. Vetunius Philosom Priests depote he was made Censor, but stepped the reight from his Ædiles room into the place of Censor. But these Censors neither made choice of new Senators, nor yet did any publike act: the reason was because L. Vetunius died, whereupon Lieinius also gave over the Censorship. The Ædiles of the Chair L. Vetunius, and P. Licinius Verus, exhibited the Roman games, and renewed them again one day more than ordinary. The Ædiles of the Commons, Q. Catius, and L. Portius Licinius Sett up in the Temple of Ceres, the molten images of brais, which were made of the mopping; right stately and americements: and represented the plaies and patimes to their office belongs, with the stately and with great furniture and preparation, as the wealth and plenty of those times would a flord.

In the end of this year C. Lalius the Lieutenant of Scipio arrived at Rome, the four and thirtieth day after that he looked and took fea at Timeoni And as he entred the City with a mighty train of Captives, he fet the people on running out of all parts to fee that fight. The morrow after he was admitted into the Senat-houfe: where he related, that new Caribage, the head City of Spain, was forced and won in one day: that divers Cities which had revolted were received upon furrender: and other new entred into fociety and friendfhip with the people of Rome. And by enquiry of the Captives they found their intelligences to agree in manner with the advertilements and tidings contained in the letters of M. Valerius Maffala. But the thing that troubled the Lords G most, was the voyage of Afarabalinto Italy, which hadfala. But the thing that troubled the Lords G min and Ambaliatogether, Lalius being brought into the generall affembly of the people-diffourfed of the same points which he had related in the Senat-House. And the Senat, in regard of the happy factets of P. Scipio, granted by a decree, a foleman proceffion for one day; and gave order that C. Lalius with all convenient speed should make haste again, and repair into Spain with the very same ships that he brought from thence.

The winning of Carribage I have let down in this year, having the warrant of many writers: and yet I am not ignorant, that some there be, who have affirmed that it happed the next year follow. H ing. But me leems, it was an unlikely matter, that Scipio should spend one whole year in Spainin doing jult nothing.

Now when Q. Fabius Max. was Conful the fifth time, and Q. Fulvius Flaccus the third time, on that very day upon which they entred their office (which was in the Ides of March Jooth of them by decree of the Senat, had the government of the Province Italy: but fo, as their jurisdiction was fet out by the countries: fo as Fabius should war about Tarentum, and Fulvius in the Lucaus and Brutians countries. M. Claudius continued fill ingovernment one year longer. The Prators had their Provinces parted between them by lot: nnto Cains Hostilius Tubulus tell the juridiction over the Citizens, but to L. Veturius Philo, over forreiners, together with Gallia, Titus Quintini Cri-Binus ruled Capua, and C. Aurunculeius governed Sardinia. The armies were divided among the I Provinces in this wife : Unto Fulvius were affigned the two legions which M. Valerius Levinus had in Sicil, : Unto Q. Fabius, those in Heirnria, which were commanded by C. Calphurnius. The City army was appointed to succeed those Legions in Hetruria: and C.Calphurnius was ordained to fit in the government of that Province, and to have the leading of that army which Q. Futoing had. It was agreed moreover, that T. Quintius should be Lord President of Capua, and have the charge of the army there. And that C. Hoftilius should receive the jurisdiction of C. Lettorius the Pro-Prator, over the province at Ariminum, and likwite his army Unto M. Marcellus the lame legions were allowed, wherewith he had warred fo fortunatly when he was Contul, Unto M. Valle rius and L.Cincius (for they also continued one year more governouss in Sicis) was the army remaining after the battell at Canna granted: and they were commanded to supply and make up & all the companies thereof, out of those fouldiers that were left of the legions of Cn. Fulvius. For the Confuls caused them to be fought out and gathered together, and fent them into Sicily : and difgraced them with the very same kind of ignominions souldiery, in which the Cannians level; as also those who remaining of the army of Gn. Fulvius the Prator, had been thither sent by order from the Senat, for anger and despite that they fled like as the other. Unto C. Aurunculeins, the same legions were given by decree in Sardinia, wherewith P. Manlius Volso had ruled and governed that Province, And P. Sulpitius having his government prorogued for one year longer, was commanded to rule Macedonia with the same legion and Armado fill. Thirty Galleaces of five banks of oars were appointed to be sent out of Sicily unto Tarentum, to Q. Fabius the Conful, With the rest of the navy, it was agreed and order set down, that M. Valerius Levinus should either him. I felf pals over into Affrick, for to forrage and spoil the country, or fend L. Cincias or M. Valmin Meffela, whether of them he would. For the government of Spain there was no alternation, fire only this, that Scipio and Syllanus had their commission continued, not for a year as the jell, but untill such time as they should be called from thence by order from the Senat, Thus were the Provinces divided, and thus were the forces bestowed for this year. Among other affairs of greater importance, the Election of the high Curio, or chief pailli-Priest, who was to be elected in the room of M. Emylius late deceased, renewed, and set on sort again an old contention[between Commons and Nobles,] For the Patritis denied, That C. Manie lius Attilius (who was the only man of the Commons that Rood for it) was eligible, and therefore not to be pricked; for afmuch as never any before him obtained that faces dotall dignity, but M one of Senators calling. The Tribunes being called unto for their affiftance referred themaust to the Senat, And the Senat put it unto the people, for to be decided by them, So.C. Manilius Anilius was the first Commonner that ever was created Maximus Curio, i. e. the grand-superintendent over all the Curia in matters of Religion.] And P. Licenius the Arch-bishop constrained C. Valuius Flaccus to be initalled and inaugurate the Flamine of Jupiter against his will. And C. Lettria Was created Decemvir for holy rites and ceremonies and for facrifices, inflead of Q. Mutius Same La late deceased. The cause and occasion of inaugurating that Flamine by constraint and compalis on I would willingly have concealed and smothered in silence, but that the ill name, wherembe was turned afterwards to good fame and reputation. This Flaces for his careles, loofeardiotous demeanor in his youth, in regard of which victors course of life, he was odious to his own N naturall brother L. Flacens, and other his kinsfolk, was for the same cause chosen Flamin by P.Lieinigs the faid Arch-bishop. This man, so soon as his mind was employed about Church-matters, and religious ceremonies, fo fuddenly all at once altered his life, and cast off his old behatious that there was not one of all the young men in Rome in more account and credit, nor better liked of the chief of the Nobility and LL, of the Senat, as well those of his own house and linage, 25 others that were strangers unto him. And when he saw himself grown, generally into this good opinion and reputation among men, he began to have a very good conceit of his own pasts and worthiness, inlomuch, as he brought up an old custome again, and was so bold as rotake his place in the Senat-House (a thing, that for many years space had been intermitted and discontinued in regard of the base unw orthiness and injusticiency of the former Flamins.) When he wiso entred into the Senat-chamber. C. Licinius the Przetor willed him to go forth, as being no place for him, and therewith drew him out : whenpon the Flamine called for help of the Tribunes of the Commons pleyding the ancient right and preheminence of that Prieftly dignity, and ailedout that C. Flaminius in times past enjoyed that place, together with the pall, or embroidered ich robe, and the Ivory chair. The Prator on the other fide came mon him again, and taid That right was not grounded upon old examples past all date, fetcht out of Chronicles time out of mind

The seven and twentieth Book of T. Livius.

A but he would needs have it to be carried by the most fresh practice of the newest and latest cuflome, affirming, That by prescription of the time, either of our fathers or grandfathers daies. there was no Flamine of Jupiter usurped that priviledge. The Tribunes, who were to moderate this question, gave their judgment thus, That if a thing were forelet, and discontinued through the supine negligence of some Flamins, it was worth for themselves and they deemed it no reason, that it should hurr or prejudice the whole priesthood. Whereupon, the Prator himselfforced not greatly upon the point inor flood much with him, and so they admitted the Flamin into the house with great confent of the Nobles, as well as of the Commons. And all men thus conceived of it. That the Flamin had obtained the thing, rather in regard of his fanctimony and holiness of life

B than in the right of his facerdotall dignity. The Consuls before that they went into their Provinces, enrolled two legions of Citizens, for to supply and make up sufficiently the defect of all the other forces. The old City army Fukvius the Conful committed unto C. Fulvim Flacom his Lieutenant, (and brother he was belides to the Conful) for to be led into Herruria; with direction, that the Legions already in Hetruria should be brought to Rome. And Fabius the Conful caused the residue of the army of Fulvius to be lought up and rallied, which arose to the number of 3.336: and commanded his son Q. Maximusto lead them into Sicily, unto M. Valerius the Pro-Conful, and of him to receive the charge of two Legions, and the thirty galliaces aforefaid, bearing five ranks of oars. The withdrawing of theie Legions out of the Mand, nothing diminished nor abridged the garrisons of that C Province, either in strength or shew. For besides the two old legions, well and sufficiently filled and furnished, he had a great power, as well horse as toot, of Numidians, such as were fled from the adverse part unto the Romans: and took up and levied besides for new souldiers, even those Sicilians also, who had been of the army of Epicides and the Carthaginians, men of approved valour, and skilfull warriors. These forrain aids, when he had put to each of the Roman legions, he kept fill the form of two compleat armies. With the one he gave order to L. Cincius to defend that part of the Island which had been the Realm of King Hiero; with the other he maintained the rest of the Island, divided sometimes by the confines of the Roman and Punick dominions. There was a fleet also rigged and trimmed, containing of seventy ships, for to guard and defend all the maritine coasts, along the tract of the sea side. Himself in person, with the horse-D men of Mutines, rode about all the Province, for to visit the lands and grounds, and to take note which were tilled and well husbanded, which lay forelet and untilled, and to commend or chastise and rebuke the landlords and owners thereof accordingly. The care and regard of corn, thus far forth did good, that the Province was able both to fend good store to Rome, and also to convey unto Carana sufficient to maintain the army that was to lie in standing Camp that summer about

But the souldiers who were transported over into Sicily (and for the better part they were Latines and other Affociats') were like to canse a great rising and commotion: whereby we may fee, that of final occasions and beginnings oftentimes arilegreat matters of important consequence. For the Latines and Allies in all their Diets and Councils athome, began to mutter and E grumble, "That now for ten years space they were with continual musterings and paiments of "fouldiers wages confumed and spent, that there was not a year in manner went over their heads "but it cost them some great loss and overthrow in battell. Many were slain in the wars, other "died of diseases, So that a Citizen of theirs, if he were taken and prest once by the Romans, for "tobe a fouldier was more fure to perish, than if he were taken prisoner by the Carthaginians: "for the enemy fent their captives back again graits, and without ranfome, home into their coun-"try: the Romans posted and packed them away out of Italy, as confined to a place of ba-"nishment (to speak truly) rather than appointed to serve in warfare. For see how the souldiers, "remaining after the field of Canna, have continued there, and waxen old these eight years al-" ready, and no doubt there were they like to lay their bones before that the enemy (who never fo "flourished, nor was so strong as now) would depart from thence. In case then that old souldiers "return not into their country, and new still bechosen, within a while there would be none left "behind, And therefore belt it were for them before they were come to extream poverty and de-"folation presently to deny the people of Rome that, whiles somewhat is left, which shortly they must be driven to do of very necessity when all is gone. And if the Romans see their Allies "once agree together, and take this courie, they will then verily bethink themselves, and grow to "some terms of making peace with the Carthaginians. For otherwise be sure as long as Anni-"bal hath a day to live Isaly will never be clear of wars. There and fuch like speeches passed in their Diets abovefaid. There were at that time thirty Colonies of the people of Rome: and Whilesthe Embassages from them all were at Rome, twelve of them denied the Coniuls flatly, and faid they were not able any longer to find either men or money. And those were these, Ar-G den, Nepet, Sutrium, Circeit, Alba, Carfeoli, Suessa, Sora, Setia, Cales, Narnia, Interamna. The Confuls amazed at this strange and unexpected accident, being desirous to drive them ont of that mind, and to scare them from so detestable a resolution, supposed they should prevail more by chastising and rebuking, than by fair and gentle dealing: and therefore told them again, "That they had prefumed to speak that unto the Confuls, which they again were abashed "and could not find in their hearts to deliver and relate in the Senat-house, For furely (fay they) "this is not a refulall of fouldiery and war fervice, but a very meer revolting from the people of Rome, and no better than an open rebellion. Therefore they were best to return again speedily w " into their feveral Colonies, and to confult with their neighbors & countrimen, whiles the mat-"ter remained yet all whole as men who had rather let fall some words rashly at adventure, than refolved indeed to attempt and commit fo hainous an act: yea, and totell them, and put them in "mind that they themselves were neither Campans nor Tarentins, but meer Romans, from them "descended, and of their race; from thence sent as Colonies into the lands that were won by conquest, for to breed, increase, and multiply; and to admonish them, That whatsoever duties children owe to their parents, the same they owed unto the Romans, if there remained in them "any kind and naturall affection, any remembrance of their ancient native country; and to ex-"hort them to confider better of the matter, and to lay their heads together anew, Forasmuch as "those designments of theirs tended to betray the State and Empire of Rome, and to deliver the I " vistory of all unto Annibal. When the Confuls one after another had dealt and been in hand with them a long time in this manner: and the Embassadors nothing moved with their words, made answer again, That neither they knew what other message to bring home; nor their Senat what new counfell to take; fince that they had not any more men to be must red for souldiers, nor money to be paid for wages: the Confuls feeing them fo fliffly and obstinatly bent, maderlation thereof before the Senat, whereupon every man was stricken into to great fear and trouble of mind, that many of them gave out, that the Empire of Rome was come to an end. The like flay they, will the rest of the Colonies do, and jurely all our confederates and allies are combined and agreed to betray the City of Rome unto Annibal. But the Confuls comforted the Senat, and bad them be of good chear, laying, That all the other Colonies besides would continue loyall and fall K in their duty and alleageance: and even those also which had failed in their obedience, if there might be Embassadors ient amongit them, to rebuke and chastise them, and not to speak them fair and entreat them by way of prayer, would no doubt have a respective reverence of the majefly of the Roman Empire. Now when the LL of the Senat had committed the ordering of this matter wholly unto them for to manage and handle, according as they should think good for the weal-publike: after they had throughly founded the hearts and minds of all the rest of the Colonies, they called and cited all the Embassadors, and demanded of them whether their fouldiers were in readinels, according to the capitulations of the covenant. Then M. Sextilius of Fregele made answer in the behalt of eighteen of them, "That not only their souldiers were readyaccording to the form of the covenant, but also if more were needful more they would allow, and L " what loever else the people of Rome imposed upon them, and wished them to perform, the same 66 Would they firain themselves to do to the utmost : for, as yet they had people flore, and a pune ood enough; and as for their heart, it was much better than their ability. The Confulsafice they had made a short speech unto them by way of a preamble, taying, that they thought it not fufficient for their desert to be commended from their mouth only, unless all the LL. generally in the Senat-house gave them condign thanks with one voice and common accord, willed them to follow after them thither. The Senat having thanked them in as honourable terms they could possibly devise, and entertained them with most gracious words, gave order to the Confuls, to bring them forth also in the face of the whole people of the City: and before them, among other fingular favors and kindnesses which they had shewed both unto them and also un. M to their ancestors, to make rehearfall of this late good defert of others, which they afforded unto the Common-wealth: to the end that now also, after so many ages and lives of men past they should not be forgotten and buried in filence, nor defrauded of their just praise and due commendation. And these were they that remained true hearted and fast unto the City of Rome: The Signins, Nolans, and Norbans; the Satriculans, Brundufins, and Fregellans; the Lucents, Venufins, and Adrians; the Firmans and inhabitants of Arminum, And from the other feather the Pontians, Pestans, and Costans: and of mid-landers, the Beneventins, Essenins, Spolenis, Placentins, and the Inhabitants of Cremona. Upon the aid and succour of these Colonies, the Roman state at this time rested and stood maintained: and these all were highly thanked both in the Senat, and in the affembly of the people. As for the other twelve Colonies, which N had refused to do their obedience, the LL, of the Senar gave express commandment that they should not be so much as once minded or named: and that the Consuls should neither gire them their dispatch, nor retain them still, nor so much as speak unto them. This silent kind of rebuke without word giving, seemed to stand most with the majesty and grandeure of the people

Whiles the Confuls were diligent in providing and making ready all other things requifite and meet for the wars, it was thought good to bring abroad the vicefimery gold. It o wit, the twenteth part of all their tributes and revenues which had been laid up and referved apart in a more fecret close to fithe City-chambers against an hard winter(as they fay) to serve for what need form the Common-wealth should stand in. So there was taken forth four thousand pound weighting gold, whereof three hundred pound weighting to the two Consuls apiece, and so likewise to M. Marcellus, and P. Sulpitius the Pro-Consuls: and to L. Viturnus the Pravor, unto whose lother Province of France befell. And Fabius the Consul had an addition besides himself above therefor one hundred pound weight of gold for to be carried into the Castle of Tarenum, Thereto the gold they disbursed for to make ready paiment down upon the nail unto them that undertook provide apparted for the army in Spain, which to their own same, and the honour of their General, More

Moreover, it was thought good, that before the Confuls departed into their Provinces the prodigious tokens should be purged and explate, On the Alban mount there were smitten with he from heaven the Image of Jupiter, and a tree standing near unto the Temple: likewise the lake at Hoftia, the wall at Capua, and the Church of Fortune : and at Sinue ffa the wall and gate of the town. These, I say were, blasted with lightning, and smitten with thunderbolts. There were fome also brought word, that the water at Alba ran blond. And at Rome within the fanctuary of the chappel of Fors Fortuna, a little image that flood upon her coronet, fell of its own accord from the head of the goddess into her hands. And at Privernum it was for certain reported and known of a truth, that an Oxe tpake, and that a Vulture or Gripe flew into a shop in the market place, B whenit was full of people. And at Sinneffa there was an Infant born of doubtfull fex, between male and semale, (which the common fort call Androgynos, as for the most partgreek names, admit more easie composition of two words than the Latine) and there it rained milk, and a manchild was born with an Elephants head. These strange and fearfull figns were expiate, and satisfaction made for them with greater sacrifices ; and a solemn procession in all the Churches and Chappels, with prayers and supplications was proclaimed for one day, Besides, a decree was granted, that C. Hostiliss the Prator should vow and set out the games and plaies of Apollo, in such manner as of late years they had been vowed and fet forth,

About the same time & Fulvius the Consul held an affembly for the creation of Censors, and elected Ceniors were M. Cornel, Cethogus, and P. Sempronius Tuditanus, who neither of them had C everhad been Coff. And by a grant or commission from the Senat, there was a bill preferred unto the Commons, and the same passed, that these Censors should set, and to farm let the territory of Capua. The review of the Senat and choice of new Senators was hindred and staid, by reason of a contention between the two Ceniors, who should be the president of the Senat. Now the choosing of him lay in Sempronius his hand. Howbeit Cornelius alledged, that the custome and tradition of fore-fathers should be followed, namely, to elect him for President, who of all them that were now living, had born first the office of Censor. And that was T. Manlius Torquatus. Sempronius replied again, and faid, that as the gods had given him by lot the first place, so they had granted him free liberty to choose whom he would. And thereforehe would elect Q. Fabins Max. whom at that time he was able to prove to be the principall man of all the City, without excep-D tion, and take Annibal himself for the Judge. After much variance and contelling of words, at length Sempronius by relenting and permission of his Collegue elected Q. Fabius Max, the chief Senator, Then the Senat was changed, and new Senators chosen, and eight were overpassed and lest ont, among whom was L. Cacilius Metellus, he that gave the infamous and shamefull counfell, to abandon Italy after the defeat at Canne. In noting likewife and diffracing the Knighte and Gentlemen, the same cause was considered of and took effect, but very sew there were of them that were touched with that infamy: but all those horsemen belonged to the Cannian legions who were in Sicily (and no small number there was of them) had their horses taken from them: And to agravate this sharp punishment and note of disgrace, they were plagued also with time of long warfare: for fo many of them as had ferved with horse allowed by the City, should not reckon upon the years passed already, but were to follow warfare ten years forward, and find themselves horses. Moreover, these Censors after diligent search and survey found out and met with a great number of those that ought to have served on horseback: and look how many of them were fixteen years old and upward at the beginning of the war, and had not been employed in the wars those all they diffranchised, and made Ærarii, or contributaries. After this, they bargained by the great for the repairing and re-edifying again of tho eedifices which had been confirmed by fite about the Forum, [or matket place] namely, the seven shops, the [fish] shambles, and the Kings Hall,or royallgallery.

Thus when all things were finished which were to be done at Rome, the Consuls set forward to the wars. And first Fulvius went before to Capua: and some few daies after Fabius followed: who belought both his own Collegue by word of mouth most earnestly, and also Marcellus by effeduall letters, to make sharp war upon Annibal, and to keep him occupied, while he assailed Taremum: which City, if it were once taken from the enemy, he were then driven out of all, & having no place to put his head in, nor which he might make account to stand fast and trusty unto him, he should have no reason at all once to stay in Italy. He dispatched also a messenger to Rhegium unto the Captain of the fort and garrison, which by Lavinus the Conful was there placed against the Brutii: and those were eight thousand men. The greatest part of them were of these good fellows, and that damned crew, wheref we spake before, who nsed to live by robbing and stealing, and were brought thither from Agatirna out of Sicily. Unto whom there were adjoyined many of the Brutii also fugitives from thence, and as good as themselves every way, both for audaciousnels, and also for neediness to set upon any bold adventure whatsoever. This power of men he commanded thould be lead to waste and spoil the Brutians country first, and then to lie against the City Canlonia, and to affault it. They having performed this service, not only willingly & chearfully, but also with greediness: having also chased away and rished the husbandmen and peasants of the country, affailed the City with a I forciole means. Marcellus stirred up and provoked by those letters of the Conful: and having a good opinion of his own that of all the Roman Captains there was not one so able to match Annibal as himself, left his wintering standing Camp, so foon as ever there was for rage and grafs in the country, took the field. and encountred Annibal hearing once that Marcellus approached, he dislodged from thence. The country thereabout was plain and open, without any covert places to bestow an ambush, and to lay trains in therefore he began to retire himself from thence into the woodland parts. Marcellus tracked him sail, and followed him hard at heels, and encamped close unto him: and ever as he had fortified and entrenched himself, he brought forth his men into the field, ready for battel. Annibal entertaining fmall skirmishes with certain Cornets and troops of horsemen, and with light appointed outmen, that lanced darts and javelins, thought it not necessary yet to come unto a pight let battel. and venture all upon one throw. Howbeit he was drawn to a fight mangre his head, how loeier he laboured to avoid it. For being gone afore one night, Marcellus overtook him upon a plain and open ground : and as he was pitching his tents he kept him from fortifying, by charging his pioners and labourers on every fide. Whereupon they came to a very battell, and fought with all the forces they had on both fides: and when it grew toward night, they departed afunder on even hand: but before it was dark they had encamped not far one from another, and in great hallemade shift to fortifie themselves. The next morning by day light Marcellus came forth into the field with all his power: neither refused Annibal the challenge, " having with many words comfound "and encouraged his fouldiers to remember Thrasymenus and Canna, to cut the comb and best "down and tame this fell stomack and lusty courage of the enemy : who presset still (quoth he) "and feeketh uponus, not fuffering us to march on quietly in our journey, nor to pitch our tentes er giving us no leave to breath our felves, nor time to look about us. There is not a morning but o foon as the fun is up in the horizon to give light to the world, the Roman army is out in the K " field to give us battel. If we could draw bloud of him once, and fet him out of the field with "bloud about his ears, he would for ever after fight more quietly, and take better leifure with him. With these and such like comfortable words and effectuall remonstrances they were well animated; as also provoked seeing themselves thus molested by the enemy, who day by day never cerfed to challenge and brave them ftill: whereupon they began a fierce and cruell battell. They had now continued fight above two hours, and then began the Roman Cavalry from the right wing, and the extraordinary fouldiers that flanked the main battell, to give ground and difmanth, Which Marcel, perceiving he brought forward the eighteenth legion in the vanguard, And while fome retreated back fearfully, others come forward but flowly, the whole battell was put out of order, and disarrayed; and so at length it was discomfitted; and for that fear surmounted shame I they turned their backs and fled away amain. Slain there were in the conflict and in the row together tome 2700 Citizens and Allies one with another: among whom, there were four Roman Centurions, and two Colonels, Marcus Licinius, and Marcus Fulvius. Of military enign, there were four loft of that right wing which first shrunk and lost ground : and two others of that legion which came to fuccour their fellows that gave back and retreated. Marcellus after that he was returned into the Camp, welcomed his fouldiers with fuch a bitter and sharp Oration, that the very words of the Generall in his anger and wrath were more heavy and grievous unto them, The Oration than the conflict it felf, which they had unfortunatly endured all the day long before, "Iyield of Marcellus to "praife yet, and render thanks to the immortall gods, (quoth he) as I may in fuch a cale that our enemies having vanquished & conquered you in the field, and driven you in so great sear to run M headlong within your trenches & gates, came not with all at once to affail the camp. For firely in the same fearful fright that you for sook battel, you would likewise have abandoned your tents & 40 pavilions. What fearfulness is this? Whence cometh this terrour? What means this oblivion of " yours? How cometh it to pals, that ye should so forget all on a sudden, both your own selves, and them with whom ye have to fight? Why furely, they are the same enemies & no other, whom the "fummer past, you did nothing but either vanquish & overcome, or else pursue & follow inchie: whom for these certain daies past, ye have been ready to tread on their heels as they fled and ran "away before you both by day & night; whom in light skirmishes ye have discomfited; whom no "longer ago than yesterday, you suffered neither to march forward, nor to pitch their camp, list-"bear to speak, and I pais in silence those things which in good right ye may stand upon & mileN "your boaft. I say nothing of that whereof ye ought to be ashamed & displeased with your selves, " namely, how but even yesterday ye brake off the fight on even hand, and retired out of the field, "when the enemy had got no advantage? What hath this one night, or what hath oneday out " you off? Are either your forces in this mean time abridged & diminished, or your enemies ang-"mented & encreased? Now surely, me thinks, I speak not to mine own army, nor to Roman soul-"diers. Only ye carry about you the same bodies & armour that ye were wont. For if ye had born "the same minds and hearts with you, should the enemies ever have seen your backs? Should they have taken either banner from any company, or enfign from cohort and fquadron? As " yet the enemy never vanted and made boalt of the defeat of our Roman legions, You are "the very first that this day have given him the honour of discomfitting and putting to flight on 0 "army. Then they all cried out, and belought him to pardon that daies default, and to make this conce again of his fouldiers courages when and wherefoever he would. Mary, and that I will "(quoth he)my fouldiers: I will put you to it: even to morrow I will bring you abroad in othe

"field, and after ye have got the victory ye shall obtain that pardon which ye now crase, So he gave order, that those cohorts which had lost their enfigns should have the allowance of

barly in stead of wheat: and as for those Centurions of the bands or companies, whose banners

A were loft, them he degraded in this manner: He caused them to be disarmed, and their skeins to be drawn naked and taken from them, and so let them go and shake their ears. And withal, he made proclamation, that the next day they should all present themselves in readines, as well footmen as horiemen. Which done, he dismissed the audience, and they all confessed and acknowledged, that they were justly and worthily thus checked and rebuked: and that there was not that day one man in the Roman army, fetting afide the General himself only, but he was bound to make amends and fatisfaction, either with spending heart-bloud, or atchieving a noble victory, The morrow after they all shewed themselves unto him in their armor, and wel appointed, according to his commandment. The General commended them for their forwardnes: and gave them to understand, that he would set those in the soresfront of the vanguard, which the day before be-R gan to run away, as also those cohort likewise that lost their enligns. And now he gave them warning, and charged them all to fight it out lustily, to win the field: and to endeavour and stain themselves, both all and some, that the news of yesterdayes slight came not to Rome before, and presented the fame of this dayes victory. Then he willed them to go to their meat, and to firenethen their bodies: that in case the fight should hold long, they might be able to endure to the end. Now when all was laid and done, that might encourage and thir up the hearts of fouldiers, they went out & advanced their enfigns into the field. Annibal being advertised hereof, "Now believe "me (qd. he) we have to deal with an enemy indeed, who is of that nature, that he can neither "brook hisgood fortune, nor away with bad. If he hath won at any time, he purfue the nofe whom "he hath vanquished, truelly. Contrary-wise if he have lost, he beginneth to fight with the con-C "querors again right freshly. Then he commanded the trumpers to tound, and brought forth his power in battel array. A field was fought there on both hands more sharply a good deal, than the day before. The Carthaginians strived to keep the honor and reputation of yesterdayes service the Romans strained to wipe away the ignominy and shame of that dayes foil. On the Romans side, the Cavalry of the left wing, and those cohorts which had lost their ensigns, fought in the vanguard, and the twentieth legion was marshalled and ranged in the right point of the battel. L. Cornelius Lentulus, and C.Claudius Nero had the leading of both these wings, M. M.treellus himself commanded the main battel, and withal his perional presence encouraged them, as a witness of their valour and courage. Now, when as the fight had continued long, and the victory enclined no way, Annibal commanded the Elephants to be put forth upon the very forefront of the batnel, to see if that object might possibly work some terror and confusion among the Romans. And at the first they disordered the enligns, and troubled the ranks: so as partly by treading under soot, and partly by scattering them for fear, that were all about they had laid naked and open the battel in one part; and in more places than so had the Romans fled, but that C. Decinius Flavus, a Colonel, having from the first band of the Hastati, caught up the banner in his hand, commanded the company thereto belonging to follow him; and thirther he led them where the foresaid Elephants were gathered round, and made foulest work, and charged them to sling their darts and javelins at them. All this shot light sure, and missed them not, yea, and some stuck in them: and no marvel, for the beafts were neer at hand the bodies great and standing thick in a plump together. But as they were not all wounded to they that had the darts fertast in their backs and sides, were as ready fuch is their nature, dangerous to meddle withal) for to hurt their own malters, as the enemies: and all turned upon their fellows that were unhurt, and drave them back. So as now, not that entire band only, but every fouldier elie for his own part, who was able to reach the herd (as it were) of the Elephants as they fled, did his best to lance javelins and short darts at them. And so much the more furiously ran the beasts upon their own, and made a far greater havock there, than they had done among the enemies; by how much more fiercely fear and fright fer them agate, and fent them forward, than the will of their masters that sate upon them, was able to rule and reftrain them. The Roman footmenespying this advantage, came forward with their enigns and banners upon that battaillon, which was put in difarray by the running to and fro of these unruly dumb creatures, and without much ado and farther skirmish put them to flight, after they were once broken our of their ranks, and fet in a fright. Then Marcellus, fent his Cavalry after them, to purfue them as they fled, and to follow the chale, and never gave they over hunting and couring them, until they had lodged them in great fear within their camp. For befides all other things, which made them thus feared and affrighted, there chanced two Elephants to fall down in the very gate & entrance thereof, to that the fouldiers were forced to rush into it over the trench and rampier. In that place was the greatest flaughter made of the enemies. For there were flain eight thousand men, and five Elephants. Neither had the Romans a bloudless victory of it: for of the wolegions, there died fast upon 1700, and of the Allies more than 1400. Besides, many a citizen and confederat fore wounded. And Annibal the next night dislodged and departed, Marcellus although he was desirous to follow upon him, yet he could not for the multitude of his hurt men. The einials that were fent out to puriue him in his march, brought word back the next day, that Annibal took his way into the Brutians country,

Neer about the same time, the Hirpins; Lucans, and Volscents, after they had delivered up the guilons of Amibal, which they had in their Cities, yeelded themselves also to Q. Pulvius the Conful, and were received to mercy with great clemency by the said Conful, after some rebuke given them in words only for their trespass and errour past, The Brutians also had the like hope of pardon, when as Vibin & Pattins, two brethren, of the noblett house of that nation, came from them to fue for the same condition of yeelding and surrendring themselves, which was grantedly

Q. Fabius the Conful, won by affault a Town in the Salentins countrey called Mandaria. Priloners were taken there 4000, and some good flore of other pillage. From thence he went to Tarenum, and in the very mouth of the haven, lay against the City. Those ships which Living had for to wast the convoy of victuals, he partly charged with engins, and other ordnanceto affault Towns withal, and partly furnished with artillery, with stones, and shot of all forts: the ships of burden likewife, and not the Gallies only which were guided by oars; to the end, that fome might bring Engins and Ladders unto the walls, and others aloof from out of the ships, wound and hurt thole that defended the City. These ships were ordained and appointed from the open Sea to affault the City. And clear was the Sea of all danger from the Punick navy, which I was fent unto Coreyra, at what time as Philip minded to affail the Etolians. In this mean while, the affailants of Canlonia, a little before the coming of Annibal, for fear left they should be furprifed betook themselves to a little hill; which as it was (for the present danger) a place of safety, io it wanted all things elle. Fabius, as he lay at fiege about 7 arentum, was much helped to the atchieving of a matter of great importance, by a trifling thing to speak of, and of small moment init felf. The Tarentins had a garrilon of the Brutians, fent from Annibal to defend the City. The Captain of this garrifon was greatly enamoured and ready to die for the love of a woman, who had a brother that served in the army of Fabius the Conful. He being certified by letters from his fifter, of this new acquaintance that she had with that forrainer and stranger, so wealthy and so honorable a person among his country-men; conceived some hope by means of his filter, that g her lover might be brought to any thing, and wrought as they would: and so acquainted the Conful with his conceited hope. And this feemed no vain imagination. Whereupon the young man was sent to Tarentum in habit and quality of a fugitive, and by the mediation of his fifter, grew into some favour with the Captain aforesaid: and at first practifed secretly to underseel and found his mind, and afterwards feeing the weakness and inconstancy of the man, he prevailed with him fo much, through the flattering speeches and allurements of the woman, as to betraythe keeping and guard of that place whereof he had the charge, After that the manner how, and the time when this plot should be put in execution, was agreed upon, the said souldier was let out of the City closely by night in a place between the corps de guard, and informed the Consul what was done already, and in what fort every thing was to be done. Fabins at the first watch, after he had I given a token and watchword to them in the Castle, and to those likewise that had the keeping of the haven, himself fet a compass about the said haven, and lay as closely as he could to that part of the City which lieth to the East. Then all at once the trumpets sounded from the Castle, from the haven and ships, which in the open Sea rid neer at hand. Great houting there was, and muth ado on set purpose from all these quarters, whereas indeed there was least danger or noneatall there, In the mean feason the Consul kept his men in. Whereupon Democrates, who had beforetime been Admiral of the Armado, and whose chance it was to have the guarding of that place, against which the Conful lay close, seeing all thereabout quiet enough, and no stirring at all, and hearing all other parts to ring again and refound with fuch alarms as otherwhiles it feemed the City was taken and won, and fearing left if he fat still and bestirred not himself, the Conful wouldy make some Camilado, and give the affay to enter the City with banner displaied; withdrew his guard toward the Cattle, from whence was heard the greatest and most terrible noise. Fabius when he perceived once by guessing at the time, as also by the silence it self in that place (for where but a while before they kept much ado raising up one another, and calling to arm, there nowall was husht, and not a word) that the guards were had away from thence, he commanded that the ladders should be brought to that side of the wall, where the brother & broker both of the wall, ton, had brought word that the cohorts of the Brutians were quartered and kept their guard, Thus on that part was the wall won by the means of the Brutii, who were ready to helpand take them up, and so they got over into the City. Then was the next gate broken open, that the amy might come by companies under their feveral colours. Whereupon they fet up a shout and aliate before break of day, they marched as far as into the market flead, and met with none to make head against them, and caused all them that fought at the Castle and the haven, to turn upon them. There, in the very entrance of the market place, began a great skirmish, rather fought holythan maintained thorowly. For the Tarentin fouldiers were nothing comparable to the Romans, elther in courage of heart, or goodness of armour; in skill and knowledge of war, or in lustinels and firength of body. And therefore when they had only fhot their darts, even before they cameto handltrokes, they turned back and flunk away through the lanes of the City, where with they were well acquainted, some to their own home, and some to their friends houses. Two of their Cap tains, Nico and Democrates, fought manfully, and were flain. Philomenes, who was the principal head that wrought therevolt unto Annibal, fled out of the skirmish as fast as ever his horiewould carry him: but a while after his empty horse was seen & known wandering aftray in the City, but his body could never be found. It was commonly believed, that he flung himself headlorg from his horieback, into a certain open pit. As for Carthalo, Captain of the Punick garrifon, hecal sway his armour and weapon, and as he was coming to the Conful with a goodly tale, recounting and remembring his fathers friendship and intertainment to the Romans, there hapned a souldiero meet him and strike off his head. Then by fome or other in every place, the Carthaginians and

A Tarentins both went to wrack, and were killed without mercy and regard, as well unarmed as armed. Yea, there were many of the Bruitans also fell upon the edge of the tword, were it that they were midaken, or for an old grudge and in-bred hatred; or to suppresse and extinguish the bruit and rumor that went of betraying the Town: to the end that Tarentum might seem the rather won by assistant and force of arms. I hen from murder and slaughter, they fell to lack and spoil she citied and coined: of gold 87000 pound weight. Images and pained ables or pictures, so many, as very neer amounted to the number of the ornaments of Spracyla, But Fabius of a braver mind, abstained from that kind of prize and pillage, which Marcellus sorbate not. For when his Satuesthey were of the Gods, of a mighty bigness and proportion, portraied every one in their sown habit like warriors:) Mary(qd, he) set the Tarentins have their angry Gods till among them for me. After this, the wall which divided the City from the Castle, was dismantled, rated down, and liddeven with the ground.

Whiles these things happed at Tarentum, Annibal (after they had yeelded themselves unto him that befieged Gaulonia) hearing of the fiege and affault of Tarentum, went night and day and made all the half he could, with a running march, to rescue & succour the City: but hearing by the way that it was forced and gone, "Ah, I fee well,qd,he,the Romans also are not without their Anni-"bal. In good faith, to was Tarentum won, and to loft again, by treachery and treason. But be-"cause he would not be thought to turnback & flie, in the very same place wherehe made stay, he c fat down, and encamped almost five miles from the City: and after he had abode there some sew daies, he retired himself to Metapontum. From thence he suborned two Metapontins, and sent them to Fabius at Tarentum, with letters devised from certain principal men of that City, wherein they promised to betray Metapontum and the Punick garrison into the Consul his hands, upon assurance made unto them, that all former trespasses offences should be forgiven and forgotten. Fabius supposing all was truth and plain-dealing, appointed a certain day when he would come to Metapontum, and fent his letters also to those principal citizens, which letters were brought unto Annibal: whereat he was right glad and took great contentment that his frand fped so well, and that Fabina also might be entrapped caught, and overtaken by his wily fetches as well as others: and thereupon laid an ambush for him in the way not far from Metapontum. As Fabius (before he should go out of Tarentum) attended to know what the birds fignified, he observed once or twice that they approved not his journey. And when he killed a facrifice, thereby to know the will of the Gods, the Sooth layer, or bowel-prier gave him warning, to take heed of the deceir of his enemies, and beware of wait-laying. The Metapontins, feeing that he came not at the day appointed, were fent again to hasten him forward, and to encourage him to come: who were all suddainly at once apprehended, and for fear of farther torture, disclosed the practise of the ambush,

In the beginning of that summer wherein these occurrents hapned, after that Scipio had beslowed the whole winter, in winning and reconciling the hearts of the barbarous people, partly, with gifts and rewards, and partly with enlarging and sending back their hostages, and the prisoners: there came unto him one Edefeo, a noble and famous Captain of the Spaniards. His wife and children were in custody with the Romans: but besides that occasion which brought him to Scipiosthere was another cause, even a general inclination of all their minds, that chanced I wet not how, which withdrew and estranged whole Spain from the Carthaginian Empire, unto the Roman, The same reason moved Indibilis also and Mandonius, the greatest LL, and Princes no doubt of all Spain, to leave Afdrubal, and with all the power they could make of their followers and vassals, to depart into the mountains standing just over his camp, from whence they might from hill to hill continually retire themselves in lasery to the Romans. Afdrubal perceiving the puissance of his enemies to grow and increase still more and more by little and little, and his own to diminish: and fore-seeing, that unless he made some hardy adventure and prevailed that way, all would be naught and fall to the ground, as it was beginning already to reel, determined to put it to a battail with all speed possible. Scrpio also was sharp set, and the more desirous of fight, as well for the good hope, which the success of his sormer affairs confirmed and encreased; as also because, before the armies of his enemies should joyn together, he was more willing to fight with one General and one army, than with all them joyntly at once; and yet he had well amended and encreased his forces politickly of purpose, against the worst, in case he should be driven to right with many of them together. For, seeing there was no nie of ships, became all the Rivers and Seas along Spain, were elected of the Carthaginian navy, he withdrew his fleet up into the harbor at Targeon, and joyned his Sea-fervitors to his Land-fouldiers. For armour he had ftore enough, which was either taken in the pillage of Carthago, or newly made after the winning of the Town, by so many Artificers and Crassimen that he kept there hard and close at work. With this power, Soppe in the beginning of firing departed from Taracon (for now by this time was Latins returned from Rome, without whole company he was not willing to enterprife any fervice of great moment and importance) and led forward against the enemies. As he journeyed peaceably all over the country, and passed through the territories and confines of every City and State, his Alies were ready to entertain and accompany him. Indibitis also and Mandonius among the rest, with all their power met him. Then Indibitis in the name of them both, spake, not like a fortish bachatian foolifhly & inconfiderarly have rather with a modelt kind of gravity: more like one that excused his revolt and running from the adverse part upon confireint and necessity, than made H boast of catching and embracing the vantage thereof upon the first opportunity prefented, "I want or catering and embacing the very name of a tugitive revolt, as it is odious and detellable whowful well (quoth he) that the very name of a tugitive revolt, as it is odious and detellable " to old Allies, fo it is suspicious to new. And I cannot greatly blame the manner of men info doing, in case it be not the bare name, but the double dealing that causeth the hatred. Then he "reckned up his own good turns and deferts done unto the Carthaginians on the one fide: and "recented up in own good turns and pride on the other lide, together with their injurious dealings "recounted their coveronmers and therefore, quoth he, this body of mine only hath contended with himself and his people. And therefore, quoth he, this body of mine only hath contended " among them until this day, but my heart and affection hath long fince been with them, where "Ibelieve verily, that right, justice and religion is regarded and maintained: for even fodowe " flie as suppliants in humble manner to the Gods also, when we can no longer endure the vio-"lence and wrongful outrages of men: Befeeching Scipio this one thing withal that this his flar ting from the enemy, and ranging with him, he would neither blame and condemn prefently as a transgression, nor honor and commend as a good delett of hiss but as he should find both him and the reft, by good poof from that day forward, even fo to make reckoning of them accor-"dingly, and not otherwise. Scipio made answer again, That in truth he would so do: neither would he take them for fugitives and runawayes, who judged that they were not bound in conscience to maintain the society and alliance with them as good and lawful, who made no country all to observe inviolable, any promise or duty to God or man. Then were their two wives and children brought forth into their fight, and delivered unto them, whom they received, and field tears abundantly for joy, and fo for that day they were had to their lodgings. The morrow after g faith was plight and contracted between them, and the same confirmed by covenant; and they were difinified to bring their forces, and to shew them before him: and to they quartered and lodged in the same camp with the Romans, until by their guidance and direction they came unto the enemy. The army of the Carthaginians next unto them was under the conduct of Afdenhal, neerunto the City Batula, Before his camp, he kept certain flanding guards of horfemen. Upon them the light armed forforn hope of archers and datters of the Roman host which went before the battailto skirminh, likewise they of the forefront and vanguard, charged forcibly with the Shot; yet so contemptuously, and in cornful wite, even presently upon their travail in journey, and before they had chosen a peece of ground to encamp in, that it was soon seen what hearther was in both parts. For the Cavalry of the enemies tearfully fled, and were driveninto the camp [but the Romans advanced with banners diplaied, hard to the very gates: and so for that dayber flomacks were only up and provoked to a fight, and then the Romans pitched their tens. 身 drubal in the night retired his army to a mount, which in the top had a broad plain, Behindthis hill there can a river the fore-front thereof, and the fides all about the skirts were compaffed as it were with a fleep bank flanding plumb upright. There lay under this hill top another plain lower than the other which also was enclosed round about with the like bank, as difficult for ascents the former. The next day Aldrubal, after he faw the enemies standing arranged before their camp, fent down his Numidian-horfemen, the light armed llanders also of the Baleass and likewife the Africans. "Then Scipio rode about all the regiments, enfigns, and ranks of his sumy, "marshalled as they stood in battail wife, and shewed unto them their enemies, how they de-g " spaired afore-hand to fight on equal and even ground how they taking the vantage of the hills "braved and thewed themselves, prefuming and trusting upon the place, and not upon therom "valour and firength of arms, Howbeit (quoth he) Carthage had higher walls, and yetthe Ro "man fouldiers were able to icale and get over: neither Hills nor Castle, no, nor the very ta "food in their way then, nor flopped them of their entry. And as for these high place with "the enemies are possessed of, they haply may serve their turns well, when they shall taken " flight, and leap from off the freep banks, and run down-hill apace, and fo get away. But luvi, "I shall debar them there, and lay a block in their way on every side. Whereupon he commoded two fquadrons, the one to keep the ftreights of the valley, through which the river magen: the other to befer the passage that leadeth from the City into the fields, and croffeth overhount the hill fide abovefaid. Himself led the light appointed vantcurriers, who the day beforehidding comfitted the guards and wards of the enemies, to affront the light armed fouldiers, the were quartered in the nether brow of the hill. And first they passed through the roughs, and weenor impeached nor hindred other wife than by the difficult paffages. But afterward, when her wer come within (hor, at the very first they were welcomed with a mighty volley of all forts, going (as it were) like hail upon them, Himfelf answered them again, and recharged upon them, long drive and discharging the stones which lay strewed all over the ground, and were such in many all, as might be welded and flung from them with ease. And not only the souldiers, but lais and horse boyes, & such as followed the camp, were intermingled amongst the armed company And albeit the aftent up the hill was hard, and they were pelted and almost overwhelmed ref darts and flones, yet being fo inured as they were to clime wals, and resolute with al, they month up first to the top: and to soon as they had got some even ground, where they might held footing, they found the enemy, (who was light and nimble, and able to run to and from the light and nimble, and able to run to and from the light and nimble, and able to run to and from the light and nimble, and the light and nimble, and the light and nimble himfelf and thift well whenhe was far off, all the time that they skirmifted aloof and philips one another with light (hot) now that they came to close fight, and to hand-firokes, notified Band his ground: and so they drave him from his place, and with great flaughter chaled him

A fer him back to the very battel, that flood upon the higher hill. Then Scipio having given commandment to these, for to follow on the train of their victory, and to enter up ftill upon the main battel of the enemies, parted the rest of his forces, together with Lalius, willing him to coast along and wheel about on the right hand of the mount, until he found tome way of easter ascent himself on the left hand, setched no long circuit and compass, until he came cross overthwart the slank of the enemies. Hereupon first began their battel to be disordered, whiles they were desirous to turn their wings, and to oppose their ranks and iquadrons against the noises and shouts which rangevery where about them. In this tumultuous trouble, Lelius also was got up; and while the enemies drew backward and gave ground, because they would not be charged behind on their back, the vanguard of their part was displayed and lay open : and so the Romans even of the mid-B dlebattel also, had a lane and spacious room to get up and enter upon them: who never had been able to have gained the ground, and won the plain above, (confidering the difadvantage of the fleep bank) fo long as the ranks had flood unbroken, and the Elephants were opposed against them before the Ensigns, in the forefront. Down went the enemies now on every fide, and gamman were pieconfly killed: and Scipio, who with his left wing en: ountred the right, charged and plaid effectally upon the naked fides of the enemies. And so by this means, they had no way left them to flie and escape clear. For the Roman guards on both hands, as well on the left as the right, had beiet all the passages. And as for the gate of the camp, the General himself, and the other Captains and officers of the Camp, had taken it up as they fled that way: besides the combersome trouble of the Elephants, whom being now affrighted, they seared no less then their ene-Cmies. So there died of them 8000. Afdrubal, who before the conflict had made fure work with all the money, and taken it with him, sent the Elephants before, and having rallied as many as he could, of them that fled and escaped out of the camp, he made haste along the river Tagus, toward the mountain Pyrenaus. Scipio being now master of the enemies camp, after he had given to the fouldiers all the pillage and spoil, but only the prisoners, such as were freemen: when he came to take the number of the captives, found they were ten thousand sootmen, and two thousand horse. Of which number, as many as were Spaniards he set at liberty and sent them home withoutransom. But as for all the Africans, he commanded the Treasurer to make money of them. Then the whole multitude of the Spaniards, as well those that before had yeelded themselves, as they that were taken prisoners the day before, saluted him with great consent and general voice, D by the name and title of King, Whereupon Scipio, after filence made by the crier flaid, "That he "took the name of *L, General or Commander, to be the greatest of all other names, by which * Impresses his own fouldiers used to call him. As for the title of King, how foever in other places it was great and honorable, at Rome surely, it was odious and intollerable. For his own part, the mind "indeed he caried of a King, and if they deemed it to be the highest honour that can fall to the "nature of man, let them judge so in their own hearts secretly, and please themselves with that "file: only he wished them to forbear the word and term thereof. These very Spaniards, as barbarous as they were perceived by this speech how haughty and magnanimous he was, who in the height of spirit contemned that as a base thing, whereat in admiration only of the very title, all mortal men besides are amazed and astonied. After all this, he bestowed upon the Princes and great Potentats of the Spaniards, fundry gifts. And of the hories, whereof he had taken in the field and campgreat flore, he gave Indibilis the choise of three hundred where he would. When the treasurer was selling the Affricans, according to the General his commandment, he hapned upon a young springal and stripling, of rare and singular beauty: and hearing that he was of royal bloud, he fent him to Scipio. And when Scipio demanded of him who he was, and what country-man, and wherefore at those years he was in camp among rude souldiers; "I am (saith he) a Numidian born, (and with that his eyes flood full of water) and in my country they call me Massiva, Being left and orphan and fatherlefs, I was brought up with my grand-father by the mother fide, Gala the King of the Numidians, And with my uncle by the mother, Mafaniffa, who was lately come with a power of horsemen to aid the Carthaginians, it was my hap to sail over into Spain. And never to this day, have I been in any battel, by reason that Masanissa would not in regard of my tender age, suffer me in any hand to go to the wars. Howbeit that very day when the battail, was fought with the Romans, unwares to my faid uncle, I fecretly got an horse under me, and armour upon my back, and went forth into the field; where my horse chanced to fall, and cast 'me down headlong on the ground: and fo it was my fortune to be taken by the Romans. Scipio swe order that this Numidian youth should be kept safe, and so proceeded to finish matters that were brought before him, as he far upon the Tribunal in marshal court. And after he was come back from thence into his royal pavilion, he called the party again before him, and asked him, whether he were willing to return again to Malaviffa. Whereat the tears gushing out of his eyes for joy, ea, full fain (qd. he) and with all my heart. Then after he had given the young gentleman a ring of gold, a coat embroidered with purple stud, wife, with a Spanish fouldiers cape, a golden class or putton & a brave confer, with all the furniture & capatifon thereto belonging he fent him away, nd commanded certain horfmen to fafe-conduct and accompany him to far as he would himfelf. Then Sofpio fell to confulf about the wat. Some there were that advised him, presently to pursue All what but he supposing that to be a dangerous confie, for feat lest Mago and the other Afarmal hould joyn their forces to his, he sent only a good guard to keep the passage of the hill Prom, and imploied the reft of the fummer, in receiving homage and featty of other States of Spain.

Within few dayes after the battel at Batula, when as Scipio in his return to Taracon, was gone H past the chase or forrest of Castulo: Asarabal the son of Gisgo and Mago, the two Generals, arrived out of the farther province of Spain unto Asdrubal the ion of Amilear. But they came aday after the fair, and too late to help an overthrow past already: yet in very good time, to give counsel for the managing and executing of the war behind. There as they conferred together, concerning the disposition of the Spaniard, and how they stood affected in the countries of each province, only Afdrulathe ion of Gifgo was of opinion, and perswaded, That the utmost tract and coast of Spain, which lieth upon the Ocean and Gades, was hitherto unacquainted with the Romans, and therefore fast enough and sure to the Carthaginians. But the other Afdrubal and Mago, were of another mind, and agreed in this, That Scipio with his favours and benefits had pofferfed the affections and hearts of all men already, both in general, and also in particular, and that there would never be an end of fliding from them, and fiding to the Romans, before that all the Spanish souldiers were either removed into the farthest parts of Spain, or conveighed over into France, And therefore, albeit the Senat of the Carthaginians had not granted out any fuch act and commission, yet there was no remedy, but that Afdrubal must go over into Italy, where Annilal was the head of the war, and in whom lay the main chance of all by which means also he might withdraw out of Spain all the Spaniards, far enough from the naming and hearing of Scipio, For As drubal his army, as well by daily falling away and revolting to Scipio, as also by the late defeat much empaired, was to be replenished again with new souldiers. Moreover, that Mago should deliver his army to Afarnbal the fon of Gifgo, and himself in person cross over into the Balan K Islands, with a great sum of money, to wage new aids and succours from thence. And that Alarge bal the fon of Gifgo, with his army should retire farther up into Portugal, and not encounterthe Romans at all in any hand. And that out of all the Cavalry there should be chosen out the very flower and thrength, to the full number of 3000 for Masanissa, and that he should range and o. verrun all the hither Province of Spain, partly to help the diffressed Allies, and partly to ipolithe enemies towns, and forrage their lands. After these orders and directions set down, the Generals departed alunder to the execution of these determined designments, Thus ye see what werethe affairs and occurrences of Spain for that year.

At Rome the fame of Scipio grew greater every day then other. Fabius for the winning of Tarentum, albeit he gat it rather by craft and policy, then by force and vertue, was glorious therefore. I The name of Fulvius began to age and decay. Marcellus grew also into an ill name and someoble. quy, both for that at first he had a foil, and also because he suffered Annibal to range over Italian his pleasure, and himself at mid-summer had retired his souldiers to Venusia to take up there (18 it were) their winter quarrers, He had a fore adversary in the City, one C. Publius Bibulus, a Tribun of the Commons: who from the very first time of that discomfiture, with continual speeches and Orations brought Claudius into hatted and inlamy with the common people, and now was in hand with them to deprive him of his government. Howbeit, the friends and kinsfolk of Claudius obtained thus much, That Marcellus leaving his Lieutenant at Venusia, should repair to Rome for to make his purgation, and acquit himself of such crimes as his adversaries objected and laid against him: and that during his absence, they should not treat not debate about his deprivation, w

It hapned much about one time, that both Marcellus came to Rome (to meet with the shamefulflander that ran on him, and to tave his honour) and also Q. Fulvius the Conful, about the new election for the year following. The question touching the government of Marcellus, was de-Bated and handled in the lifts or Creats, called Flaminius and a great affembly there was and much concourse of the Commons and of people of all degrees and calling. The Tribun accused not Marcellus only, but all the nobility : by whose fraudulent practise, and by whose cold and delaying ceedings, it was come to pass, that Anubal now theleten years had remained in Italy (as it weet) in his province continually, where he had had led a greater part of his life, then at Carthage in his native country. And now (quoth he) the people of Rome taffe the fruit, proceeding of proroguing and continuing of government still in one person. For see what is come of it; Marcellus his at N my hath been twice defeated and fallen upon the enemies fword, and now, for footh, is housed in Venusia for fun burning. But Marcellus to confuted this accusatory speech of the Tribun, by secounting his own worthy noble acts; that not only the Bill preferred for the depoling him out of his room, was disannulled, and the neck of it broken, but also the next day after, all the Centuries with one general voice created him Conful. There was joined with him companioningovergment T. Quintius Crispinus, who then was Pretor. The morrow after were the Pretors thofen, to wit, P. Licinius Craffus Dives, who was at that time the Arch-bishop, P. Licinius Varah Sex, Inlins Cafar, and Q. Claudius Flamen.

During the time of this solemn Parliament or Session for the election of Magistrates, the City was much disquieted for the revolt of Hetruria: C. Calpurnius who ruled that province as Pro 0 pretor, had by his letters given notice, that the beginning therof arose from the Arctins; and the fore immediatly M. Marcellus the Conful elect, was thicher fent with commission, to look into the tratter, and (if he thought it requifite) to fend for his forces, and to translate the wat out of Applicanto Tufcany, For fear whereof, the Tufcans puld in their heads, and were quiet,

The Tarentine Embassadors made suit for peace, and that together, with their freedom they might enjoy their own laws. And this answer was returned by the Senat, That they should come again when Fabius the Conful was returned to Rome, The Roman Games, and also the playes called Plebeii, were exhibited that year, and renued one day apeece more then ordinary. The Ædiles of the chair were L. Cornelius Caudinus, and Servilius Sulpitius Galba: but those of the Commons were C. Servilius, and Q. Cecilius Metellus. As for Servilius, it was denied, that he had been Triwere to see that he for her for the common before, or now Ædile by right and order of law, because it was now for For none certain known, that his father (of whom the opinion went currant for ten years that he was flain might be Triby the Boians about Mutina, at what time as he was Triumvir for the division of lands) was now bunor Edile, living, and in the hands of the enemies in flavery and bondage.

In the eleventh year of the Punick war, M. Marcellus entred his consulfhip the fifth time (10 was living, you reckon upon that Confulship which he never bare through, because there was an error com-B mitted in his creation) and with him T. Quintius Crispinus. To both Contuls the Province of Italy was affigned, and both armies of the Confinis the former year. There was a third army then at Venusia, whereof M. Marcellus had the conduct. Of these three, they were to chuie two, which they would ; and the third remaining, was to be committed unto him, who was by lot to have the government of Tarentum, and the Salentins. The rest of the Provinces were thus divided amonght the Pretors. P. Licinius Varus had the jurisdiction civil, and P. Licinius Crassus, (then Pontifex Max,) that of the forraigners, and to go whither toever the Senat should think good to fend him. Unto Sew. Julius Cofir befell Sicily, and to Q. Clandius Flamen the City of Tarentum, Q. Fulvius Flacens had his commission renewed, to continue in government for one year longer; and he was appointed to govern Capua, which had been the charge of T. Quintius the Pretor, and to have under his hand the command of one legion, Likewite C, Hoftilius Tubulus remained still in office, and that as Pro-pretor he should succeed C. Calpurnius, and have the conduct of two legions. Moreover, L. Veturius Philo had his authority & government confirmed to him anew, that as Propretor he should fit Lord Deputy in the same province of France, and have the same two legions as before, when he was Pretor there. The like decree that was granted for L. Veturius, puffed also in the Senat for C. Aurunculeius, and a bill was propounded unto the people for the proroguing and continuance of his office, who as Ptetor ruled the Province of Sardinia with the fireneth of two Legions. And for the defence and guard of the faid Province he had an addition of fifty ships of war, which P. Scipio had sent out of Spain. P. Scipio likewise and M. Syllanus, held sill, by vertue of a decree, their provinces of Spain, and commanded the same armies for one year longer. As for Scipio, he had direction to fend over into Sardinia fifty ships, out of thole eighty which he had under his hand, either taken with him out of Italy or won from the enemy at Carthage, because there ran a rumor, that there was great preparation at Carthage for a navy that year, and that the Carthaginians would take up, and fill all the sea coast of Italy, Sicily and Sardinia, with an Armado of two hundred fail. In Sicily the government was divided in this manner, Sextus Cafar had the leading of the Cannian army: M. Valerius Levinus (for his government also was confirmed for a year longer) the charge of that fleet of seventy ships, which rid about Sicily: with commission to add therto, those thirty ships which the former year lay before Tarentum and with this Armado confifting of one hundred fail, to put over into Africk, if he thought so good, and there to fortage and letch booties. Over and befides, P. Sulpitius was for one year longer to continue in office, and to govern the provinces of Macedony and Greece, with the force of the faid Navy which he had before. As touching the two legions which remained about the City of Rome, there was no alteration. Only the Confuls were permitted to levy and enrol a new supply as need should require. Thus the Empire and State of Rome for that year was maintained with the power of 21, legions. P. Licinius Warmthe Pretor of the City, was charged to repair those thirty old ships, which lay at Hostia, and to furnish twenty new built, with sailers and marriners, that with this Armado of fifty fail he might be able to defend all the fea coast neer unto the City of Rome. C. Calpurnius was forbidden to remove his forces from Arretium, before a successor came in his place. The same order was given to Tubulus, and to have especially a vigilant eye, that no commotion atose from thence. And then the Pretors went into their provinces.

As for the Confuls they were troubled immind and made fome foruple of confcience to go to their provinces, upon the report of fome prodigious and ominous figns, and because also in their facrifices they found not the gods fo propitious and favourable unto them. For out of Campania news came, that in Capun two Temples, to wit, of Fortune and Mars, and also some Tombs and Sepulchers, were smitten with lightning and besides (see how vain and preposterous superstition, impute the ven the least triffling things to the hand of God) that certain Mice, for footh, in a Chappel of Jupiter grawed the gold : Allorthat in Casinum, a great swarm of Bees settled in the very market place. Moreover, that the Wall and one of the Gates at Hoftia was blafted and stricken with lightning. That In Cere, a Gripe fled into the Church of Jupiter. That at Volfinii, there was a Pool flowed with blood. In regard of these strange and wondrous tokens, there was a devout supplication for one day. And for certain days together, greater beasts were killed for facrifices, without any good token: and for a long time the grace and favour of the gods could not be obtained Dut yet the fortune of the Common west flood flill upright, and all this anget and mischief portended by those wonders, light upon the head of the Confuls alone, and their death exculed all the reft. The Playes called Apollinances, in the year of Q. Fulvius and op. Claud. Confuls, had been by P. Cornel. Sulla Pretor of the City, first exhibited: after whom all the Pretors ever afterdidthe like. But they rowed them a year before, and performed them on a day uncertain. The time year hapned a grievous plague both in the City and in the Countries about, which

yet in the end turned rather to long and chronick diseases, then to sharp and deadly maladies. For H this pestilence there was not only solemn going in procession, in all the high streets, carresours, and cross ways throughout the City: but also P. Licinius Varus Pretor of the City, was commanded to propound unto the people, that the Playes above said should be vowed for ever against a set and determinat day, Himself therefore was the first that vowed them; and exhibited them upon the *third day before the Nones of July, and the same day ever after was observed and kept holiday for that purpole.

As the rumor of the Aretins revolt encreased dayly greater, so the LL. of the Senat were care. ful about it every day more then other, Letters therefore were fent unto C. Hoftilius, that he should without delay take pledges of the Arentines: and C. Terentius Varro was fent with commission, to receive the laid holtages at his hands, and to bring them to Rome. He was no fooner come, bot Hostilius presently commanded that one legion, which lay in camp before the town, should enter the City with banner displayed, and there he put sufficient guards in places convenient Then having called and summoned the Senators to appear in the market place, he demanded of them hostages. And when the Senat requested but two days respit to consider of the matter, he made proclamation, that either they should deliver them presently, or else the next day he would feize upon all the Senators children every one. Then he commanded the Colonels, the Captains of the Allies, and the Centurions, to ward the Gates, that none might go forth of the Cityly night. But this was Hackly and negligently executed, for seven principal Senators, before the warders were fet at thegates, escaped forth with their children before night. The morrowmor. ning by break of day, when the Senat began to be cited into the Common Hall, these parties werek missed, and their goods confiscat, and sold in port-sale. Of the rest of the Senators, their children were taken hostages to the number of 120. and were delivered to C. Terentins, for to be conveigh. ed to Rome: who when he was come into the Senat, made such relation of the matter, that the fulpition of their revolt was much more pregnant then before. And therefore, as if some insurection had like presently to grow from Tuscany, C. Terentius himself was commanded to conduct one of the two legions about the City of Rome, unto Aretium, and there to lie in garrison withit for to keep the town in order. And it was thought meet that C. Hoftilius with the army belides, should survey and visit the whole Province, and to be careful and circumspect, that no occasion nor opportunity might be given unto them, that were minded to feek alteration and to rebel (Terentius to foon as he was come to Aretium with the legion, when he called unto the Maji-L strates for the keys of the gates, and they made answer that they were but miscast aside and could not be found; supposing that they were rather cautelously laid out of the way forthe nonce, than loft by negligence, caused other keyes and locks to be made, and set upon everygat: and took as great heed and care as he could, to have all under his own hand. He gave especial warning also to Hostilius as touching the Tuscans, and told him, that he should never hope to reft in fecurity, that they would not rebel, unless he took order with them aforehand, that they polibly

After this, there was much debate and contention in the Senat about the Tarentins, even before Fabius, whiles himself excused and defended them whom he had conquered and subdued by force and arms : but others were mightily offended with them, yea, and most of them gave out plainly, y that they were full as faulty as the Campans, and deferved no less punishment, And so there was an act of the Senat granted according to the opinion and advice of M. Acinius, that the town should be held with a garrison, and all the Tarentins kept from stirring out of the City: and that the matter should surther be debated and decided afresh another time, when the state of has flood in better tearms of peace and quietness. And the like contention and variance was among the LL. of the Senattouching M. Livius Constable and Captain of the Castle of Tarentum, whiles some were of mind to condemn him as in great fault, because through his carelesness and soth, Tarentum the City was betrayed to the enemy: others again awarded him good confidential and reward, for that he kept the fort so well by the space of five years, and by his meansement ly and by none else Tarentum was recovered. But some were of opinion between these and sid, N that the discussing and determination of that matter pertained properly to the Censors and not to the Senat: of which judgement Fabius also himself was. And this moreover he said with al, that he must needs confess, that true it was, which Livius his friends in the Senar stood so much pool, and iterated fo often, namely, that he was the only means that Tarentum was recovered: for in good faith, quoth he, it never could have been regained if it had not once been loft before.

T. Quintius Crifpinus one of the Consuls, went to the army which Q. Euloius Placeur Individua new supply into the Lucans country, But Marcellus fill was staid behind, upon occasion dura scruples of conscience, and sundry objects that troubled his mind, and kept a hammering in in head one after another. Amongst which, this was one, that having vowed in the Gasis wit Laffalium. A Temple to Honor and Vertue: the dedication of the said Church was hindred bythe Bisshops, who said, that one Chappel, by right and according to their ceremonies, served but one Sains, and could not be confectated unto more. For in case it should be blasted and spin by fire from heaven, or other wile some prodigious token hap therein, hardly could the righter plation and purging thereof be performed, because it might not be known, to which of theirs or gods the factifice should be done; for by order one facrifice could not serve twain, with there were some particular and especial gods memed. So there was sain to be another Chappel.

A built for Vertue: and great haft there was made for the rearing thereof, and yet it was not his foruneever to dedicate those chappels. So at length he set forward and put himself on his journey with a supply, unto the army which he had left the year before at Vennsia.

When Crifpinus minded to affault Losri in the country of the Brutians, because there went a great name of Fabius for the affailing and winning of Tarentum, he fent for all kind of artillery and engins out of Sicily, and ships also were brought from thence, for to batter that part of the City that lieth to the Sea side, But the enterprise went not forward, because Annibal had removed, with all his forces to Lacinium. And besides, the news went that his colleague had already brought out his forces from Venusia, with whom he was desirous to joyn. And therefore he returned out of the Brutians country into Apulia: and so between Venusia and Brutia, the Consuls encamped leverally, within three miles one from the other. Annibal likewise was retired into the same country, considering that the war was turned from Lecri. There the Consuls (hot men of nature both) almost every day led forth their men into the field, not doubting but if Annibal oncementhem (having two Confular armies joyned together) to make a dispatch of the war once for all. Annibal because the year before, he had twice affronted Marcellus, and both given and raken the foil: like as he had great reason, as well to sear as to hope, if he were ro encounter and fight with him alone: to he thought verily, that he was never able to make his part good with both the Confuls together. And therefore laying off his Lyons skin, he took himself wholly to his old Foxes coat, and fought all means and opportunities to lay a train for to entrapthem, Howbeit there passed some light skirmishes between both their camps, with variety of fortune and interchangeable success. By which, the Consuls thinking that they should hold out and keep the enemies play, during the immmer feason, and yet nevertheless be able to affault Locri, wrote unto L. Cincina, that he should take the Seas, and cross over with his fleet out of Sicily to the City of Locri, And to the end that the Town might be likewise assailed from the Land side, they commanded part of the army which lay in garrilon at Tarentum, to be conducted thither. Annibal having intelligence afore-hand of these things, by certain Thurins, sent forth certain of his forces to belet the wayes from Tarentum. And there under the fide of the Petellian mount, he bestowed secretly in ambush two thousand horse, and three thousand soot. Upon whom the Romans (marching without their espials sent afore them) chanced to light, and were slain to the number oftwo thouland, and upon twelve hundred taken alive: the reft were scattered and fled over the fields and forrests back to Tarentum. Now there was a little hill between both the camps of the Carthaginians and Romans, and the same all overgrown with wood, which at first was posfessed and kept, neither by one nor other: because the Romans knew not the situation of that side which lay toward the enemies camp: and Annibal supposed verily that it was a place fitter for to lay an ambush than to encamp in and therefore he sent by night for that purpose, certain troops of Numidians, and bestowed them closely in the mids of the wood, and not one of them stirred all the day long out of their standings, for fear lest either their armour or themselves might be espied a far off. In the Roman camp, every man generally was of mind, and let not to say, that the faid hill was to be feized and fortified for their use, with a good fortress built upon it, for fear lest if it were first gained by Annibal, they should have the enemy as it were over their heads ready to annoy them. And Marcellus himself was of the same opinion : whereupon, Why go not we our felves in person (quoth he, to his colleague) with some few horsemen, to view and confider the place, where our eyes shall be our judges; and seeing the ground once, we shall resolve more certainly what courieto take? Crifpinus liked well of the motion: and so they went forward accompanied with two hundred and twenty horsemens of which forty were Fregellans, the rest all Tulcans. There followed after them, M. Marcellus, the Conful his fon, and Aulus Manlius, two Colonels: also L. Arennius and M. Aulius, two Captains of the allies. Some Authors have set down in writing, that Marcellus the Col. facrificed that day; and when the first beast was killed, the liver was found without an head: howbeit in the second, all things appeared that were wont to be feen. But in the head of that liver there shewed I wot not how, a kind of extraordinary excrescence: which the Soothsayer had no liking to, because after those inwards which seemed before short, unperfect, and misliking; now those again were seen too well sed and overgrown. But the Conful Marcellus was so hot and desirous to fight with Annibal, that he thought himself never encamped neer enough unto him. And even then also as he went forth out of the camp, he gave order to his fouldiers to be ready at a short warning, and have their eye upon the places that presently, if he liked the hill, for which they went to view, they should dislodge, trus up bag and baggge and follow prefently. Now there was a little flat and plain ground before the camp from whence the way that led unto the faid hill, was on every fide very open and evident to the eye: where there lay a scout or spie, set of purpose to discoverany of the enemies gone far from the camp stragling and ranging abroad either for fewel or forage, that they might be intercepted: and not for any hope of logreat effect as fell out. This fellow gave a fignunco the Numidians, that all at once they should arise out of their lurking & starting holes, And they that from the top & ridge of the hill, were to rife & shew themselves affront, never appeared & made head, before that they had fet a compass about, for to shut up the passage at the back of the Romans. And then from all parts they began to flart up & with a main shout charged & ran upon them. The Con, now were in that valley, from whence they neither could possibly get up to the pitch of the hill, possessed aforehand by the enemy: nor had any place of fafe retreat behind, for that they were invironed & hemmed in on everyfide. Howbeit they might have maintained skirmish and held out a good while, but that H the Tuscans began to run away, and put all the rest in a bodily fright. Yet the Fregellans, forsaken as they were of the Tuscans, gave not over, but fought manfully, (so long as the Confuls flood on foot unburt) & received the charge of the enemies, encouraging their people, and fighting them. selves right valiantly. But when they saw once both their Consuls wounded, and Marcellus also run through with the push of a lance, and falling from his horse ready to die : then they also fand few of them God wot remained alive) together with the Conful Crifpinus (who was wounded with two javelins) and young Marcellus, who was himself also fore hurt, fled away and escaped There were flain in this skirmish, A. Manlius a Colonel, of the two Captains of allies, M. Anlius was killed out-right, and L. Arenius taken prisoner. As for the Lictors belonging the Confuls, five of them then fell alive into the hands of the enemies: the rest were put to the sword, or estaged with the Conful. So there were three and forty horsemen died either in the conflict, or in the flight, and eighteen taken prisoners. In the camp there was much ado, and crying out for to go and succour the Consuls, when they saw one of them, and the other his son grievously hurt, and the poor remnant of that unfortunat expedition, coming toward the camp. The death of Marcil. lus was much pitied and lamented in many other respects, but for this especially: that he, amin of that age (for he was now above threefcore years old) and who should have had more wir: an old Captain and Leader (I fay) that should have had more wisedom and forecast, so unadvised had brought both his colleague together with himself, and also in manner the whole common wealth into so desperate a danger. I should make much circumstance, and fetch many turns and compasses about one point, if I would rehearse all that writers have diversly set down, as touching y the death of Marcellus. But to let all others go, L. Calins delivereth the thing three mannet of waies: the one by hearfay only, and a general report: the other, extant in an Oration of the praise of Marcellus, penned by his own fon that was himself present at the action: the third, which Caliss himself alledgeth upon his own knowledge, and after diligent enquiry into the matter. But howfoever the voice and fame varieth in fome circumstances, most of them jump in the occasion, That he went forth of the camp to view the place: and all agree of the event, That he was entireped and fo flain. Annibal supposing that the enemies were mightily terrified, as well by the death of the one Conful, as the hurt of the other: because he would take all advantage, and omitto good opportunity offered, forthwith removeth his camp, and pitcheth upon the very hill what he had fought. There he found the corps of Marcellus, and caused it to be enterred.

Crifpiniis affrighted both at the death of his companion in government, and also at his om hurt received, dislodged in the dead time of the night following, and in the very next mountains that he could come unto, encamped and fortified himself upon an high ground, and lurely lexed on every fide. There the two Generals of both parts, beat their brains, and occupied all their wis contriving the one to lay trains, and the other to avoid them. Annibal together with the body of Marcellus, had gotten his ring or fign manual. Crifpinus fearing that Annibal might public fome crafty fetch, and beguile some body by the means of that fignet, sent messengers to all the Cities next adjoyning, giving them notice, that his brother Conful was flain, and that the enemy had gotten his feat ring, and warning them, that they should give no credit to any letters written in his name, or figned with his feal. This message was not so soon brought to Salapia, but streight after there came letters thither from Annibal, framed and indited in the name of Marcellar to this effect, That he would the next night that immediately followed that present day, be in persons Salapia; willing the garrison souldiers to be in readiness, for to be emploied in some service that should be thought needful. The Salapians perceived whereabout he went, and supposing that was a perillous plot, whereby Annit at fought fome opportunity to be revenged of them and to punish them, for anger, not only that they were revolted from him, but because they had killed his horsemen: they therefore lending the messenger back again, (who was a Roman ingitive me renegate, and had fled from them to Annibal) to the end, that their fouldiers might effect that which they were minded to do, without the knowledge of the messenger, and not beespied by him; bestowed all the Townsmen along the walls and in sundry convenient places of the Town, N to keep a standing corps de guard. The watch and ward they tended the next night very carefully, and about that gate where they supposed the enemy would come, they opposed the strength and most able men of all the garrison. Annibal neer about the time of the relief of the fourth watch came to the City. In the vanguard marched certain Roman Rebels and Renegates, with Roman armor upon them: who when they were come to the gate, called up the watch, and spake all in Latin unto them, willing them to tet the gates open, for that the Cof, was come. The watching making femblance as if they were roused and awakned at their call began to bestir themienes,10 make haft with much ado, as bufy as ever they might be. The Port-cullis which had been be down, flood yet flut. Then they began, some to heave and to weigh it from the ground with let vers & coleweighs, others to draw it up with ropes unto that height that men might go upright 0 under it. The passage was scarcely made open & set wide enough, when the sugitive traitors come tushing in at the gate apace, striving who might enter first. And when there were almost 600 of them got in, the rope was let go, at which the port-cullis hung, & it fel down with a mighty noise, The Salapians then fomeran upon the fugitive Romans abovelaid carving their armor looicly and tetchlefly hanging upon their shoulders, as travellers & wayfaring fouldiers in a peaceable county of their friends: others fro the turrers of the gate pelted the enemies with Rones, & pulhed arthur with punchion poles, or with darts and javelins flew them. So Annibal caught in his own frares. was fain to depart.

He went from thence to levy and raise the sege before Locri, which Town Cincins beleagueredstreightly, and atlaulted most forcibly, having raised fabricks about it, and planted all kind of engines, artillery, and ordnance against it, which were brought thither out of Sicily. Mago who began already to diffrust that he should not be able to defend and keep the City, conceived now the first hope of better, when he heard once of the death of Marcellus. And then there came also amessenger with news, That Annibal having sent afore him the horsemen of the Numidians, sollowed after himself in person, as fast as he could, with the power of the footmen. And therefore foloon as he perceived, by a fign given from the hill tops, that the Numidians approached, himfeliat once fet the gate open, and suddainly fallied forth upon the enemy with great violence. At the first the skirmish was doubtful, more because he came upon them at unawates, than for that he was equal to match them in strength : but afterwards, when the Numidians charged them befides, the Romans were so cerrified, that they fled here and there in every place to the sea and their thips, leaving their fabricks and engins wherewith they had shaken and battered the walls. So by the coming of Annibal the fiege brake up before Locri.

Crifpinus, after he was advertised that Annibal was gone into the Brutians countrey, commanded Marcus Ma ecllus a Colonel or knight Marshal, to lead away unto Venusia, the army which had been commanded by his Colleague new deceased. Himself went to Capua with the legions, have able to endure the shogging and shaking of the horselitter, for pain and grief of his wounds, From whence he wrote letters to Rome, giving notice, That his brother Conful was dead, and in what danger himself was. Signifying also, that he could not himself come unto Rome against the election, because he thought he should not be able to endure the travel of the journey: and beides, he was in great care for Tarentum, lest Annibal from out of the Brutians countrey would um thither with all his power. Moreover, he gave the Senat to understand that it was requisite there should be sent as Embassadors or Agents unto him, men of wisdom and discretion, whom he might confer with, and acquaint with his will and mind, as touching State-matters. The reading of these letters, caused them much, to lament and mourn for the death of the one Consul, and greatly to fear what would become of the other. Therefore they not only dispatched Q. Fabins the fon, unto the army in Vennsia, but also fent unto the Consul three commissioners, Sex. Julius Cafer, L. Licinius Pollio, and L. Cincius Alimentus, who but a few dayes before was returned out of Sicity. These had in commission to signify unto the Consul from the Senat, that in case he were not able himself to come to Rome against the Election, he should nominat within the Roman territothe Consul went to Tarentum, that Q. Clandius the Pretor should withdraw his legions from thence into those parts, whereas he might defend most Cities of the Allies.

In the same summer M. Valerius took the Seas, with a fleet of a hundred sail, and from Sicily passed over into Africk: and having disbarked and landed his men neer the City Clupea, wasted the countrey all about, and met no armed men, to speak of, to make head and withstand his invafion. Then these rovers and forragers retired in hast unto their ships, because on a suddain there was a rumour blown abroad, That the punick Armado was coming, confifting of 83 fail. The Roman Admiral fought fortunatly with them not far from Clupes. And after he had boorded and taken eighteen of their ships and put the rest to slight, he returned to Lilybaum, with a rich Land-

The same summer Philip also sent aid to the Achei, that earnestly belought his help: whom not only M_{sel} anides the Tyrant of the Lacedemonians, grievoully afflicted with warring upon their confines, but also the Atolians, who having crossed the streights or narrow Sea, between Naupalism, and Parse (which the inhabitants there call Rhiss) and fet over a power of armed men, had pooled their territory. Moreover, there went a great rumour and speech that Attalus King of Afathe leis, would fail over into. Europe, because the Ætolians in their last Parliament or general Diethad conferred upon him the soveraign magistracy and rule of their nation. For these causes bil p ame down with a power into Greece, and at the City Lamia, the Atolians encountred him with their Captain Physics, who for that year was created Pretor together with King Attalus in is ablence. They had in their army certain aids from Artalus, and almost a thousand Romans out of the Roman Atmado, sent from P. Sulpinius. Against this Captain and these forces Philipfought wo battails with prosperous success, and in both slew very many of his enemies: and when the Atolians were driven for fear from thence, into the City of Lamia, and within the walls thereof aredthemselves, Philip retired his army into Phalera. This is a place situate in the gulf of Mac), lonetimes much peopled and frequented for the paffing fair haven, and many good har-lors and fair rodes for thips, befides other special commodities as well of Sea as Land. Thither epaired andry Embassadors from divers parts, to wit, from Prolomeus King of Egypt, from the Rhodians, the Athenians, and inhabitants of Chiar, and all to treat about a pacification, to ake up the war between Philip and the Ætolians. And of neighbour-borderers there was in he behalf of the Ætolians as peace-maker, Aminander King of the Athamans, All of them were por to careful and earnest for the Etolians, who were more fierce, stout and imperious than he Nation of Grecians naturally is: as they laboured this point, that Philip with his Kingly overanginty, to the prejudice of their liberty hereafter, should not be interested, nor meddle in the affairs and flate of Greece. As concerning a peace, the confultation was put off and referri red to the general Councel of the Aclas: and for the faid Diet of Councel, was a place aptoin. ted, and a certain day let down and published. And in the mean space, a truce obtained for thir-

Then the King departed from thence, and through Theffaly and Paoria, came to Chelcin Eubea for to put by Attalus (whom he heard fay to be coming with a navy for Eubaa) from arriving in any havens, or landing in any place on the fea coaft. Then leaving a guard behind for to withliand Attalus, (if haply in the mean season he should chance to pass over) he marchedhimfelt forward with some few horsemen, and light armed footmen, and came to Argos. Thereby tile suffrages and voices of the people, the honour of exhibiting and celebrating the solemn gamer. called Herai and Nemei, was recommended unto him, because the Macedonian Kings give out & fay, that they are descended from that City. After he had performed the solemnity of the Herein presently he went from the very games and pastimes to the Councel of his allies long beforepro. claimed, as is above said. Much debate there was for a finall end of the Ætolians war, that neither the Romans nor Attalus might have any occasion to come into Greece. But the Ætolians matred all this before the time of the truce was well expired: by occasion that they heard, that Andre both was come to Agina, and the Roman navy anchored at Naupactum. For being called into the Councel of the Achai, in which the tame Embassies were, who before at Phalera had treated for peace, first they complained, that some things had been done, during the time of the trucesgainst the faith of the covenant and accord. But at last they flatly denied and said, That there could not possibly be an end of wars, unless the Achai rendred Pylos unto the Messenians; and pency were granted and restored to the Romans, and likewise to the Athamans, to Scerdiletus, Pleurs. tus and Archides, Whereat Philip was very wroth, and thought it a foul indignity, that conquend persons should take upon them to article and capitulat with him their conqueror. "But neither heretofore (quoth he) gave I audience to the treaty of peace, nor yeelded confent to truceup "on any hope I had that the Ætolians would ever be quiet: but to this end, that all confederate " friends might bear witness that I sought means of peace, and they sought occasions and pickt "quarrels for war. So without conclution of any peace, he diffolved the Diet; leaving fourthorfand fouldiers for the defence and guard of the Achaeans, and receiving of them five ships of war, (which if he had joyned to the armado of the Carthaginians, lately lent unto him, and allow those ships which were coming out of Bithynia from King Prusias; he determined to assailed Romans with ship-fight, who had a long time been mighty masters of the Seas) himself present ly from that Councel departed back to Argos: for now the time drew neer of the games News, which he was defirous to celebrate and honor with his prefence. Whiles the King was occupied in the preparation of these games and pastimes, and lolaced himself during these feativalholydayes, with more liberty of mind and repose, than he should in time of war; P. Sulpitius having loofed from Nupactum, arrived with his fleet between Sicront and Corinth, and wasted that goodly territory, most renowned of all other for fruitfulness of all things. The noise and rumor of this occurrence awakened Philip, and caused him to leave his disports: and so he tookhis Cavalry with him in hall, and fet forward, having given order that the Infantry should follow stright after: where he found the Romans stragling here and there all over the countrey, loden with boo-y ty and prizes, (as who feared nothing in the World lefs) fet upon them, and drave them to their thips. Thus the Roman fleet nothing well appaid for the booty they had gotten, returned to Naupattum. And Philip greatly augmented the folemnity and magnificence of the games that were behind, by the same of a victory over the Romans at that time, how much or little som it was. And with great joy and mirth were those holy-dayes kept: and so much the more beside the King for to please the people withal, laid aside the diadem of his head, put off his purplember and other princely and royal habit, and in outward port bare himself equal to others, and note ter: a thing right acceptable and pleasing to free States, as nothing can be more. By which ded of his, he had given great and undoubted hope unto all men, of liberty and freedom; but thank flained and marred all again with his intolerable lust and looseness of life. For he used to goth N ging up and down with one or two of his favourits in company, and did nothing elie but ham inspected houses by the Sea side day and night in disguised manner: and thus by dehasing himself to the meanestate of a private person, the less he was suspected and known, the more disolate he was : and whiles he pretended unto others a vain shew of freedom, he abused all to his own licentions en Neither paid his purse for all his pleasures, nor with flattring perswasions and sin speeches obtained he his desires: but to accomplish his wickedness, he nied oftentimes south violence and dangerous it was both to husbands and parents, to be any thing ftreight lated, and make it goodly by redions delay and unleasonable severity, to seem but to stay the unbridled and appetite of the King. From one of the Princes also of the Achai named Aratus, he tooks wife away called Polycratia, and upon hope and colour of mariage with the King, drew her amil with him into Macedony. Having thus with these lewd and wicked pranks passed the times the folemnity of the Nemean games, and some few dayes over and above; he went to Divelor to diffeilin the garrison of the Ætolians, which they had sent for and received into the City of Dyma from the Eleans, Cicliades (who was the foveraign or chief magistrat of that state and the Achair met the King at Dyma: who as they hated the Eleans, because they differred from the the of the Acheans, fo they were maliciously bent against the Ætolians, whom they were persuaded

A to have stirred the Romans to levy war upon them. So from Dyma they departed, and with joint armies passed over the river Larifus, which divideth the country of the Eleans from the territoty of Dime. The first day after they were entred the confirst of their enemies, they spent in forraging. The morrow after, in battail array, they presented themselves before the City, having sent out their Horiemen before them to make bravado's before their gates, and all to provoke the Atolians; a kind of people full of itomack, and ready enough to fally forth and make excurnous. Now, were they not ware all this while, that Sulpitim with fifteen ships had croffed over from Nanpattum to Giffeners, not that he had landed four thouland fouldiers in the Militime of the night (because they might not be seen to march) and entred Blis. And therefore, this suddain and miexpected object put them in a terrible fear, when they faw and knew once among the Atolians and B the Eleans, the Roman enligos and their armor, At the first, the King would have had his mento retire: but afterwards feeing the skirmish was begun already between the Ætolians and Triballi, (a kind of Illyrians) and perceiving that his fouldiers also were put to it and charged; then the King also himself with his Horsemen assailed the Cobort or Squadron of the Romans. There his Horle was with a dart floot through a and when he had once flung and caft the King forward over his head, there was a cruel and deadly fight on both fides, whiles the Romans laid hard at the King, and the Kings men protected and guarded his perion. Himself fought right manfully above the rell, confidering he was torced on foot, to maintain skirmith among the Horlemen. But afterwards, by reason of the great disadvantage, and seeing many about him striken down and wouldded, he was caught away by his gard, mounted upon another Horfe, and to be fled and escapedi C And the fame day be encamped 5 miles from the City of the Eleans. The next morrow he led all his whole power to a Castle of the Eleans situate neer at hand, called Pyrgos: into which he had intelligence that a multitude of the country peatants for fear of being (poiled, were with their cattail driven and retired. This confused, disordred, and naked company he took captive at his coming, prejently upon the first charge and onset that he gave and with that booty he licked hourfelf whole again, and salved the shameful defeat that he had received at Elif. As he was busy in sharing the prizes, and dealing abroad the prisoners (and there were of men some four thousand, and of cattail of all kinds one with another ewenty thousand head I there came a post out of Macedon, with news, that one Eropus had surprised Lychnidum, by corrupting for a piece of money the Constable of the Caltie, and Captain of the garrifon there: and that he held in possession certain borrough Yowns of the Daffaretians, and still ratted the Dardanisos to Rebellion. The King therefore gave over the Achaan and the Etolian wars : yet leaving two thousand five hundred armed fouldiers of all forts, under the leading of Menippus and Polyphanies for to defend his Allies, he went from Dyme through Achaia, Baotia, and Beoats; and upon the tenth day came to Demetrias in Theffalia. Where other medlengers also encountred him, bringing sidings of a greater inturrection : namely, that the Dardanians had invaded Macedony; and were malters of Orestia, and camedown into the plains of Afrans: and that the rumor was rife and went current among the barbarous people that Philip was flain, The truth is, in that expedition wherein he fought at Siejon with those that preyed and made spoil in the country, he was carried by his hot and fromack-full Horse under a Tree, and there against a bough or arm thereof that stood out, he chanced to break a corner of the creft of his helmet at one end. That piece chanced to be found by a certain Btolian, and was brought into Atolia unto Scerdiletus, who knew by the mark that it was the Kings helmet. whereupon the fame of the Kings death was divulged commonly abroad. After the departure of Philip out of Achaa, Sulpities who was arrived with his navy at Egina, went forward, and joyned with Attalus. The Aches, not far from Meffena truck a fortunat battail with the Etolians and the Eleans. Attain the King, and P. Snipitine.

In the end of this year, T. Quintin Crifpmu the Conful, when he had nominated for Dictator, L. Marcelius Torquatus, for to hold the tolemn election of Magistrats, and to set out the games, died of his burt aforesaid. Some tay he lefthis life at Tarentum: others in Campane. Thus both Coll.being flain withcur any memorable bartail, (a thing never feen afore in any other war) left the Common-wealth defolate, and as it were clean fatheriefs. Mantine the Dicator chofe-for his General of the Horfe, C. Servilius, at that time Ædile curule. The Senate upon the very fittle day that the L L, were affembled, gave order to the Dictator, to exhibit the great Roman games, which M. Emilian the Pretor of the City, whiles C. Flaminian and Co. Servitim were Coll. had represented and wowed for s. years. Then the Dictator, both fet them forth and also vowed them for the next five years. But confidering there were two Confider at mies without their Generals, so neer unto the enemies: the LL of the Senate and the people fer all other matters affect and had a principal care above all things to creat Consuls as foon as politisly they could a and inch especially, whose veriue and valour should be thought secured and late enough, from Punick craftinels and deceitful trains. For whereas during the time of all these was, the overbally heads and hot spirits of the Leaders, had been ever dangerous and hurtful to the state: for in this very year, the Confuls upon immoderate defire to fight with the enemy, was fallen and planged into a jeopardy and mischiefere they were aware. Howbeit the immortal Gods had mercy and pity upon the Roman name, in sparing the guildels armies, and punishing the inconfiderate rafiness of the Confuls, what he lofte only of their own lives. And when the of the Senate looked about every way, to lee if they could spicout any to make Confuls of above all others by many degrees, C. Claudius Nero excelled and was the enely Paragon. But all companion with him in the government they were likewife to feek for. As for him, to dout, they deemed him a fingular man and a brave Captain: but yet more to ward and eager, than the quality and occaons of this war required, or to be matched with such an enemy as Annihalwis. And therefore they thought good to joyn with him for his colleague, a lober, wife, and pirding man, who might temper and qualifie that fierce nature and disposition of his. Now M. L. 12/11/14 many years ago had been upon his Confulfhip condemned by the judgement of the people, Which ignominy and reproach he took to grievoully to the heart, that he departed into the courts, and for many years together, forbare not only the City, but to converte and keep company with men. And almost eight years after his condemnation aforelaid, M. Claudin Marcella, and M. Valerius Lavinus the Confuls, reduced him again into the City. But he uled to go inold and ! worn apparel, letting the hair of his head and heard grow long, carrying in his very counterarce and array, the fresh and notable remembrance of the difgrace before received. But L. Veterin and P. Licinim the Centors, compelled him to cut his hair, and lay away his vile and unlet miv weed, to come into the Senat, and to meddle again in civil matters and affairs of State. Andre in to doing, he would never proceed farther, than to fay Amen to other mens opinions, and freth but one word, yes and nay : or elie nothing at all, but fiew his mind by paffir g on his feet to con fide or other. Until fuch time as a kiniman of his own, M. Livine Micatus, being introuble and his name and honour called in queltion, canled him to fland up in the Counfel-house and deliver his opinion. And when after to long discontinuance, he was feen and beard enceto freak. he turned every man his eye upon him, and ministred occasion also of speech in these terms, name v ly, "That the people had done the man exceeding great wrong, yea, and hurt the common west "much, in that during the time of to dangerous a war, there had been no in ploy ment of to wor-"thy a person, either for his travail and pains, or his advice and counsel. But to return against the Lords of the Senate: they knew well, that neither Q. Fabris, nor M. Valerine Laving, could possibly be joyned as companion in government to C. Nero: foralmuch as it was not law. full that both (hould be choien out of the Nobles or Patritii. And the same was T. Manlin his cale allo. Besides that, as he once refused the Consuls room, when it was affered unto him to no doubt he would not accept thereof the recond time if it were tendred unto him. But fifty should fort Marcin Livin and C. Claudin together, there would be an excellent couple of Cenfuls in deed. Neither stood the people against this overture, thus moved first by the Lords outef. Senat. The only man in the whole City, that denied it, was the very party h mich, unto whim this dignity and honourable place was prefented. Who much blamed the levity and inconfiancy of the City : laying, "That they had no pity of him, when it was a namely, whiles he was in queof ftion and accused, and during the time of his trouble wase poor and simple garments: but now er against his will, they offred him a glittering white robe to stand for a Consulship. Thus (quoth "he) they punish and depreis, thus they honour and advance the same persons. If they took me of for a good and honest man, why condemned they me as they did, for a wicked one and again; " If they found me naught and faulty, what cause have they to trust me with a second Consultip, " who used the former to badly, which was committed unto me? As he argued and mide com-4 plaints in this wile, the Lords of the Senat reproved him, and replied again : fetting before his "eyes the example of M. Farim, who in times past was called home out of exile; and when the "frate was decayed and lying along, fet it upright again in her former place and priftine glory "And like as the curlinels and rigor of parents, is to be mollified by patience, even to the bad se and shrewd dealings of a mans country, is to be dulced and mitigated by bearing and sufference. So they all fluck close together, and choic M. Livins Conful, with C. Clanding. Three dayes the, they went to the election of the Pretors. And there were created Pretors, L. Porcim Linius. Caim Manlins, A. Hoft ilim, and C. Hoft ilims, both Cates. When the election was finished, and the games celebrated, the Dictator and General of the Cavalry jurrendred their places, C. Tutttins Varro was lent into Herraria as Pro-pretor, to the end that out of that province, C. Hoffilms should go to Tarentum, unto that army which T. Quinteres the Cost. had. That L. Maxlim should N go beyond Seass Embassador, to see how the world went there: And withal, considering that in Jummer, there were to be solemnized the samous games at Olympia, which were celebrated with a most frequent refort and meeting of all Greece, in case he might safely and without imperchaent of the enemy, he should visit that great assembly: to the end that if he could light upon any Side lians, who were fled and banished their country, or any citizens of Tarentum, confined thither and ient away by Annibal, they should repair home again into their own countries, and know, this whatfoever they were possessed of, before the wars began, the people of Rome would restore the fame, and make good again unto them.

Because it was like to be a right dangero is year, and no Consuls were invested fully inthe Common weal, all men depended upon the Confuls elect, and were defirous that they should with o all speed, cast lots for their Provinces: and every man was willing to know aforehand, whit Province each one should rule, and what enemy he was to deal withal. Moreover, a motion and speech there was in the Senat-house, that the Consuls should be reconciled and madefilends and Q. Fabins Max. propounded that first. For there had been notorious enmity and variated between them aforetime: and the calamity of Livins made the same more grievous and unfor portable unto himfelf; in regard that he was periwaded, how in that mitery of his, beus

A despited of his adversary. Whereupon he grew to be more implacable of the twain, and worle to be intreated, "There needs (quoth he) no reconciliation, neither is it material and to any pur-"pole, For they will do all with more diligence and better spirit, who ever stand in fear that their " advertary and concurrent shall grow great and be advanced by their default. Yet the authority of the Senat bare fitch a froke with them, that they laid afide all malice and old grudge, and with one mind confent and counfel, administred the affairs of the common-weal. Their Provinces were not intermingled, nor their government extended into one anothers country, as in former years, but diffant afunder and divided by the remote frontiers and farthest marches of Italy. For unto one of them were affigued the Brutians and Lucans country against Annibal: unto the other, Gallia againit Asarabal; who as the rumour and bruit went, was come forward neer unto the Alper, B Of those two armies which were in Gallia and in Hetruria, he whose fortune was to go into Galla, was to chuse which army he would, and have besides, that other of the City. And he whole lor fhould be to go into the Brutians country, befides the new legions enrolled of citizens, was to take unto him, the army of whether Conful he lift, of the former year. Also Quintius Fabius the Pro-conful, had the charge of that army which the Conful refused and his authority was renued for one year longer. As for C. Hostilim, whose Province Tarentum they exchanged for Hetriria, they altered his Province again, to wit, Capua instead of Tarentum. Unto him was allowed that one legion which Falvius the last year commanded.

Now encreased their care every day more than other concerning the coming of Astrala into Italy. And the Embassadors of the Massilians had brought news first, that he was passed over into Gallia: and that the minds of the Gauls were mightly cheered up by his coming, because the freech went, that he had brought a huge deal of gold with him, for to hire and wage fouldiers for aidin the wars. Then afterwards, Sex. Amissius, and M. Retius, who were sent Embassadors back with them from Rome, for to see whether it were so indeed, had made relation unto the Senate, that they had ient certain of purpose guided by the Massilians, who by means of their especiall riends, the Princes and Lords of the Gauls, might learn the truth, and bring word back accordingly. By whose report it was for certain known, that Astrubal having levied already a puisfant army, was minded the next spring to passe over the Alps: and that there was nothing else flaid him, but that it had been done already, faving only the passages of the Alps which were clofed up with the winter fnow.

In the room of M. Marcellus, L. Aquilius Patus was created Augur, and so consecrated. And likewise Cn. Cornelius Dolabella was inaugurat or installed King of the factifices, instead of Marcus Martin, who died two years before. In this very same year the City was purged, and there was ageneral survey and numbring of the people, by the Censors taken, P. Sempronius Tuditanus, and M. Cornelius Cethegus. There were reckoned and entred into the Ceniors books of Citizens, 137108. A maller number by much ods, than before the war. It is recorded in the Annals, that this year first after that Annibal came into Italy, the Comitium was built over head and covered. And that the Roman Games were once renued by the Ædiles of the chair, Q. Metellin, and C. Servilius: and that the other Games called Plebeii, were renned two dayes by Q. Marlins, and M. Cacilius Metellus, Ediles of the Commons: who also offered three images and set them up in the Chappel of Ceres. And the folemn feasival dinner of Jupiter was celebrated by occasion of

Then C. Claudius Nero, and M. Livius the second time, entred their Confulship: who (because whiles they were but Coss, elect, they had cast lots for their Provinces) commanded the Pretors to do the like. And to C. Hostilus sell the jurisdiction over the citizens, who had that likewise over strangers and forrainers; to the end, that the other three might go forth into their Provinces. To A. Hostilius, was allotted Sardinia: to C. Manlius, Sicilia; and to L. Porcius France. In sum, the legions were in number three and twenty, divided into the Provinces in this fort: to wit, the Confuls had two apeece, Spainfour. The three Pretors for Sicily, Sardinia, and France each of them twain, C. Terentius in Hetruria commanded two. Q. Fulvius in the Brutians country, other two. Q.Clandius about Tarentum, and the Salentins conducted twain: and Caius Hostilius Tubalas at Capua, one. Last of all, two were enrolled for the City. In the four first legions, the people chose all the Colonels or Marshals, but to all the rest the Consuls sent new to make up the

Before the Confuls went forth there was a Novendial facrifice celebrated because at Veii it had tained flones from heaven. And after one prodigious fight was once minded and spoken of, there were (as it is commonly feen) others also reported: namely, that in Miniarna the temple of Juthe and the facted grove of * Marica was fmitten with lightning; and at Atellathe wall and gate * The fact likewife, was blafted with fire from Heaven. The men of Minimese spake also of a more fearful that Circle and terrible thing than that, to wit, that there ran a river of bloud in their very gate. Laid of all, at Capasa Wolf entred the gate at night, and worried and diffmembred one of the watchmen.

These wonderful figns were explate with facrificing of greater beafts, and a supplication was holden for one day, by verme of a decree from the Prelats. Then was the Novendial facilfi.e once again renued, because it was seen, that in Armitestrum it rained stones. And mens minds were no fooner freed of one religious feruple, but they were proubled gain with another, For word was broughe, that at Fragino there was an infant born, as big as ordinary a child is at four years of age. And the thing was not fo strange for the bigness of the body, as for that it was born doubtful, whether it were male or temale, like as two years before, at Simueffa, H The wisards that were lent for our of Herrur a, faid, that this of all other was a foul and filing monster, and that it should be had forth of the Dominion of Rome, and drowned in the deep, fo as it might touch no ground. Whereupon they put it alive into a coffer, and when they had carried it a good way into the Sea, they flung it in, Moreover the Prelats made a decree, that cer. tain Virgins in three companies, having nine apiece, should go through the City, and singcertain Canticles. And whiles in the Temple of Jupiter Stator, the Maidens were a learning their fong by heart, deviled and framed in veric by Living the Poet, the Temple of Queen Juno in the Avenuine hid, was firiken with lightning from Heaven. And when the Aruspices had declared that this prodigious token touched the matrons and dames of the City, and that the goddels was to be pacified with an oblation; they were (by vertue of an edich granted out by the Adiles of I the chair) called all into the Capitol, as many as had any houle, either in the City of Rome, or Within tenmiles every way. And they among themselves choice five and twenty, into whose hands all the rest should put some small portion of their dowry. Of which there was made a fair and large golden bason, for to be presented unto Juno: and it was brought into the Aventine; and withal, the dames offered unto her purely and chastly their factifices. And streight after the Decemvirs proclaimed a day for another facrifice of the fame goddels, the manner and order whereof was this: There were two white heifers led from the 1 emple of Apollo into the City, through the gate Carmentalis: after them were carried two Images, representing Juno, made of Cypress wood: then went there feven and twenty Virgins in long fide garments, Chanting hymns and longs to the honour of Juno. These songs in verie were peradventure commendable, and pasted K for good with those rude and gross wits then living : but it they should be rehearled now adayes to our fine heads, they would feem but simple stuff, and composed without rime or reason, Aiter this row of Maidens, followed the Decemvirs deputed for facred Ceremonies, with chaplets and garlands of Baies, clothed in vesture and robes embrodered with purple, From the gate abovenamed, they passed by the freet Jugarius into the Grand-place, and there rested this folemn pomp and train. Then these Virgins taking hold of a cord, which went through all their hands, sung a fong, and danced the measures, footing it artificially according to the note. From thence they went by the Tuscan-street and Velabrum through the beasts market, and so forward into the Ciwas Publicus, until they came to the Temple of Juno. There the Decemvirs facrificed two bealts, and the Images of Cypress wood were offered and set up in the Temple. When the Gods and & Goddelfes were duly paified, the Confuis took musters more streightly and with greater precise nels, than any man could remember in former years. For both the fear of the war was two-fold, by reason of a new-come enemy into Italy, and also there was less flore of youth, out of which the fouldiers should be enrolled. Whereupon they compelled the inhabitants of the Colonies by the Sca aide, who were faid to have an especial immunity of warfare (by a facred law) forto find fouldiers: and when they denied, and stood upon their priviledge of exemption, they fee them down a certain day upon which every man should repair into the Senate, and shew what cards they had for their immunity and vacation. Upon the day appointed there presented themfelves before the Senat these Commonaities following, to wit, of Hostia, Alfia, Antium, Antium, Minturne Sinn ff and Sena from the upper Sea. When every one of thele States exhibited and w read their charter of immunity, there was no ne of all them dispensed with, but they of Azium and Hoftsa, in regard the enemy abode in Italy: and so the young and serviceable men of those Colonies, were put to their oath and tware, that not above forty of them should lie one night forth of the walls of their Colony, so long as the enemy continued in Italy.

When all the LL, of the Senat were of opinion, that the Confuls were to go forthto the wars with all speed possible (for that both Asdrubal was to be encountred coming down the Alps for fear he should soilicit the Gauls on this side the Alps; and the Tuscans likewise who hoped and looked every day for a change and alteration; and also Annibal was to be kept occupied in his own war, that he might not go forth of the Brutians country, and meet with his brother) only Livius made some stay and drew back, as reposing but small trust in the armies belonging to his M own Provinces. And as for his Colleague, wellhe wift, that he had the choise of two notable Consular armies, and of a third, whereof Q. Claudius had the charge at Tarentum. Whereupon he had made tome motion of calling the Volones [or voluntaries] again to their colours, and to ferve in the wars. The Senat granted the Confuls alarge and free commission, both to make supply som whence soever they would, by chusing out of all the armies whom they pleased, and to make exchange with whom they would, yea, and to draw out of the Provinces whomfoever, according as they should think it good for the Common-weal. And all this was executed with the exceeding concord and unity of the Confuls. The Volones were enrolled into the nineteenth and twentieth legions. Some Authors have written, that Scipio fent unto Livius from out of Spain,2 firong power of auxiliaries for that war, to wit, eight thouland of Spaniards and Frenchmen, two O thouland legionary footmen, and eighteen hundred men of arms, partly Numidians, and partly Spaniards: and that Marcus Lucretius brought these forces by Sea: also that C. Manlim sentone of Sicily four thousand archers and slingers.

The sear and troubles in Rome were much increased, by occasion of letters sent out of Gallia from L. Porcius the Pretor; purporting thus much, That Aldyabal was removed out of his winting harbours, and was passing over the Alps: that there were eight thousand Ligurian.

Alevied and ready in arms, to joyn with him to foon as ever he was come into Italy, unless tome one were fent against the Ligurians, to prevent and keep them otherwise busied with war. As for himfelf, he would with that weak army that he had, go forward, as far as he thought he might with lafety. There letters caused the Consuls to dispatch the musters in great halt, and to go forth into their Provinces, fooner than they had purposed: with this intent, that both of them as well the one asthe other, might in his feveral province keep the enemies occupied, and fuffer them not to joyn, and lay their forces together. And verily the thing that helped them molt in this their delignment, was an opinion and pertwasion that Annibal had: For albeit he was assured that his brother would that immurer pais over into Italy, yet when he called to remembrance what a toil he had himfelf, and how much trouble and travail be endured in the passage, one while of the river Rhodanss, ano-R ther while of the mountains of the Alps, and how for the space of five moneths together, he was forced not only to fight with the people, but struggle also with the difficulties of the places; he never looked that Afdrubal could to easily and to speedily pais over as he did: which was the canfe that he diflodged out of his wintring places to much the later. But Afarabal found better expedition, and all things more easy and speedy than either himself hoped for, or others expected. For the Arverni, and other nations (by their example) both of France and also about the Alps, not only received and entertained him, out also accompanied him to the war. Over and besides, as he conducted his army by those passages which were prepared and made open by his brothers journey, and had been afortime unpassable wilds and craggy rags: to against his coming the Alps were much more easy, by region of twelve years continual passage to and fro those wayes and the na-Crute of the pearants more civil and tractable. For the people before, being not nied to any ftrangers and aliens, nor accultomed to fee paffengers or travailers coming into those parts, were in manner un ociable lavage and wild, and could not a way with the fociety of men. And at the first not knowing whitner Annibal intended to go, they supposed that he came for to surprise their holds in caves and rocks, to take their fortreffes, and to drive away their people and cattail as booties. But afterwards the fame that went of the Punick war (wherewith now twelve years Italy was plagued and vex-d) had raught them infliciently, that the Alps were nothing but the way for the Carthaginians to travail inrough. And by this time well they knew, that two most pullant Cities and States, divided and removed one from another by a great space of Land and Sea between, thrived to, wher and warred for their greatness and Soveraignty. Upon these occasions, I lay, the Alps D were open and pathable to Alarmeal with case, But look what time he gained by speedy journies, the time he it again option about Plaganta, whiles he lay there in vain, rather belieging than affailing it. He was carried a way with a perf walton, than the Town leated upon a plain and champain country, might foon we to reed and won; and the great name that went of that noble Colony, induced him to believe, that by the overthrow and rating of that City, bethould ftrike a terror to all the rell, But in lying against that Town, ho not only hindred himself much, but allo staid Anni-but, who having heard that he was passed over the Alps, and come down into Isaly, o much sooner than he looked for, was upon the point to diflodge out of his standing wintring camp. For he confidered and cast in his mind, not only what a long and tedious piece of work it is to besiege and affault Cities, but also well remembred how himself after his victory at Trebia, affaied to force E that colony in his return from thence, but might not prevail.

* The Confuls being departed from the City, and gone divers wayes as it were for two fundry "warsat once, diffracted mens minds with many cares and troublous imaginations, as well in "remembrance of those losses and overthrows, which they had received at Annibal his first co-"ming; as also in thinking, what gods should be so propitious and favourable to the City and "empire of Reme, as to profper the affairs of the State and Common-weal, at one time in both "places. For until then, their fucceis had been variable and alternative; and their prosperity al-"wayes delaied with lemblable advertity: and again, their lottes were recompented with equal "gains, For when in Ital's the Common-wealth of Rome went one way downward headlong to "the groups at Thrasparent and Caune: the fortunat wars another way in Spain, let it upright a "gain, Affect was so, when in Spain one overthrow and defeat happed in the neck of another, "at what time as I was noble Caprains, were flain, and two valiant armies in part deftroyed; the "happy and tooky hauf in Sigily, and Italy, made up those breaches, and for the reeling state on "foor 1830". Let ANY A they every diffusee of the place to far remote, (because one of the wars war managed in the purpose of the World) yielded time and respite to breath themselves and gather new Ifrench, But now, two wars at once are entertained within Italy, two most "bave warriors and rendwhed Captains enclose between them the City of Rome: all dangers "come huddle together; all the heavy load and whole burden beareth upon one and the left-"fame place i, and no, doubt, but whether, of those two Captains first shall get a victory, he "will within few dayes after joyn his torces to the other. The fresh and lamentable remem-G" brance allo of the very laft year, wherein two Confuls loft their lives, mightily affrighted the "hearts of the people. So as, in their perplexities and troubles of minde, they accompanied the Confels as they departed and went into their leveral Provinces. It is more over in tome records found, that when Q. F. b. 161, advited and warned M. Livings being upon his journey toward the wats, the talking and hand over head to give coatral to the enemy, before he knew his nature and qualities, he full of apger full and discontentments with his tellow crizens, made this anliver, That to foon as ever he could have a fight of his enemies army, he would fight and being

Before that Claud in the Conful was come into his Province, C. Hoftilim Tubulm accompanied with certain cohorts lightly appointed, encountred Annibal as he led his army and marched by the atter confines and marches of the territory of Larinny, which leadeth to the Saienting. and charging upon his difordred army, put them to great trouble, flew four thousand of his men, and carried away nine Enfigns. Q, Claudius who had certain garrisons planted in all the Cities of the Salentins country, hearing of the enemies econing, had removed out of his wintring camp. and therefore Annibal, because he would not fight with two armics at once, by night dislodged I out of the territory of Tarentum, and withdrew himself into the Brutians country : and Claudin turned with his army to the Salentins again. Hofilins in the way to Capas, met with the Conful Claudius at Venufia. There, out of both armies, the Conful picked forth forty thousand choice Footmen, and 2500 Horlemen, for to war with Annibal. The reft of the forces Hoftilim was commanded to lead unto Capua, and to deliver them to Q. Fabius the Pro-conful-

Annibal having affembled his forces from all parts, as well those which he had in campdaring winter time, as those that lay ingarrison in the Brutians country, came as far as Grumentem in the territory of the Lucans, upon hope to recover the Towns, which for fear, hadrevolted to the Romans. Unto the same place the Roman Coff. making out his cipials before to discover and eleer the wayes, marched from Verusia, and about a mile and half from the enemy, K encamped himlelf. The Carthaginians had fortified themselves, and cast a trench closeina manner to the walls of Grumentum: and between the camp and the Romans was someball mile. A plain lay in the midft : and on the left hand of the Carthaginians, and the right handot the Romans all along between, the hills overlooked them, bare and naked, and of neither part fulpected, by reason that they had no wood growing upon them, nor any lurking places to hide an ambush in. Into the plain between they used to put out certain bands and companies from the Corps de guard of both fides, and made light skirmishes not worth thetalking of. And it feemed that the disit of the Roman Conful was to keep the enemy in, and not to infer him to go his wayes. But Annibal desirous to be gone, entred the field with all his power in order of bittail. Then the Conful borrowing a little of his enemies cunning, for that in to open hills there I was lefs fear and suspicion of ambuss, gave order that five Cohorts and Horsemen, reenforced with as many bands of footmen, should by night get over those hills, and in the Vallies behind, fit down closely: with direction to T. Clandin Mellin a Colonel of footmen, and P. Clandin a Captain of allies whom he fent to conduct them, at a certain time to arise out of ambulh, and to charge the enemy : himselt by day light led forth all his whole power as well foot as Horseino the field. Within a while after, Annibal likewise put forth the figual of battail : and all thecamp over they let up a cry, running all about to their armour and weapons. Then Footmen and Horsemen both rulled space out of the gates who could be foonest forth; and scattered uthey were all over the plain, made hast to the enemies. Whom when the Conful faw thus dilordered, he commanded C. Aurunculessu a Tribun or Colonel of the third legion, to put out the Ca- M valry belonging to that legion, for to charge the enemy with all the violence he could , for that like theep they were to spred over the plain without all form and fathion, and might be surprised, discomfiled, and beaten down, before they could be brought into array and let in order of butail. Annibal himfelf was not come forth of the camp, when he might hear the noise of them fighting together and hard at it : and excited with this tumult, he led in great halt all the relief his forces against the enemy. By this, the vanguard and forefront of his battail was frighted with the Horsemen of the enemies: yea, and the first legion of the Infantry and the Cavalyof the right wing began to charge. The Carthaginians difordered as they were, fought at a tenture, as they chanced to meet either with Footmen or Horsemen. The conflict grew hour, by reason of new supplies and fresh succours, and sucreased still by the number of them that N continually ran out to the fight. And furely Annibal, notwithstanding this tumult and troublefome fear, had fet and marshalled his men in good order as they were fighting (which had been no easy thing to do, but that the army was of old souldiers, and their Captain wellesperienced and beaten to it) if it had not been for the shout of the cohorts and bands above faid, which they heard at their backs, as they from the hills behind ran down upon them; and fet them in great fear, left that they would thruit in between them and home; and so shut them out of their camp. Hereupon 1 fay they were affrighted, and began to flie here and there, But the flaughter was the leis, because the camp was neer, and far they had not to run thither and fave themselves in this their fearful fright. For the Horsemen plaid upon their backs still, andgare not over : the cohorts from the open Mountains ran eafily down the bill, and charged croft () upon their fides and flanks. Howbeit, there were flain more than eight thousand men, and above co taken Prifoners: nine Enligns won and carried away: of Elephants alfo (whereof there was little or no uie) in a fuddam and tumultuary skirmish four were killed, and two gotten alive. Of Romans and Allies, there died two hundred. The next day after, Annibal limed nor. The Roman Conful having brought his army forth into the field, and feeing none to come abro d and make head against him, commanded the flain enemies to be difarmed and despoiled

Athe spoils to be gathered up, and the bodies of his own men to be brought together into a place and buried. For certain dayes after continually, he pressed so hard at the camp gates, that he wanted but little of entring thither with banner displayed. In 10 much as Annibal at the third watch of the night, leaving behind him many fires burning, and divers tents standing, on that fide especially which looked toward the enemies, and some sew Numidians, to make a shew upon the Rampier and at the gates; dislodged, and purposed to go into Apulia. The next morning by day light, the Roman army embattailed, approached the trench and rampier. The Numidians of fet purpose shewed themselves in the gates and upon the rampier, and when they had a good while dallied thus and played with the enemy, they mounted on Horieback, and spared no Horse-flesh until they had overtook their fellows. The Consul perceiving that Ball was quiet within the camp, and teeing not fo much as those few appear any where, who in the morning betimes had walked their stations, fent forth two Horsemen into the camp as espials. After he understood for certain that all was safe, and the coasts clear, he commanded his enligns to make an entry. And staying no longer there, than whiles his fouldiers ran up and downto pill and spoil, he sounded the retreat: and long before night, brought his army back again. The next morrow after, he fet forward by the dawning of the day, and with long journeis, following his enemies by the voyce of the country, and tracing them by their footlieps, he overtook them not far from Venusia. There also was a scusling skirmish between them, and not so iew as two thousand Carthaginians slain. From thence Annibal ever marched by night, and journied through the mountains, because he would give his enemy no vantage of fight, un-Cill he came to Metapontum. From whence Hanno (for he was Captain of the garrison there) was sent with some few in his train into the Brutians country, to levy a new army. And Annihalaster he had joyned those forces to his own, returned again to Venusia, by the same way that he came from thence; and so forward he marched to Canusium. Nero never left the enemy, but was ready to tread on his heels, and as he marched himself toward Metapontum, he had sent for Q. Fulvius to repair into the Lucans country, because those parts should not be dissurnished of

In this mean space, there were four French Horsemen, and two Numidians, sent to Annibal with letters from Afdrubal, after he was removed from the fiege of Placentia: who having travailed in manner all the length of Italy, through the mids of the enemies, whiles they follow af-D ter Annibal in his retire unto Metapontum, miffed of their way, and light upon Tarentum: where they were encountred by the forragers of the Romans that ranged about the fields, and by them were brought before Q. Claudin the Propretor. At the first they entertained him with flim flams, with doubtful and intricate answers: but when the fear of the rack and other tortures, had forced them to tell a truth, they confessed, that they had letters about them to deliver from Aldrabal to Annibal. With those letters sealed as they were, they were committed unto L. Virginius a Colonel, for to be conveied unto Claudius the Conful. And two troops or Cornets befides of Samnit Horsemen were sent to guard them. So soon as they were come unto the Consuland the letters read by an interpreter, and some examination taken of these captives: then Clandus confidering that the common-weal was not now in that good case, nor the occasion such, Ethat each Governor needed no more, but to make war by the ordinary course of commission, within the compass and limits of his own Province, with the help of his own army alone, and against an enemy affigned unto him by the Senate: but that some unlooked for adventures must be enterprised, some new designments and unexpected put in execution, which when they are begun and attempted, might make no less wonder and fear among their own friends, that terror among the enemies: and being once performed and done, might turn the former fear into as great joy and gladnes; fent the letters of Afdrubal to the Senat at Rome: and withal, himself acquainted the Lords of the Senate what he intended to do. And for almuch as Afdrubal wrote unto his brother to meet him in Umbria, he advised them to send for the legion at Capua to Rome, totake musters also at Rome, and to oppose that army of the City, against the enemy at Narnia. F Those were the contents of his letters to the Senate. He dispatched likewise messengers before, through the territories of the Larinats, Marucins, Ferentins, and Pretutians (by whom he meant to leadhis army) for to give notice, that all the inhabitants of those parts, should out of their Villages and good Towns, provide and bring forth victuals into the high wayes, for to refresh his fouldiers; also to come with their Care-horses, draught-oxen, and other beasts for carriage, together with wains and carts, that the wearied fouldiers might ease themselves thereby. Himself out of his whole army, as well of citizens as allies, chose forth the flour and most picked men of all to the number of fix thousand foot, and one thousand horse, and gave it out openly, that he minded to surprise the first City that he came next unto in the Lucans country, and withal, the garnion of Carchaginians that lay there; and therefore commanded them to be ready for the G journey and expedition. Thus when he had fet forward in the night, he turned his way into Picenum. And the Consul made no more ado, but with long journies highed him as fast as he could, and led his army directly to his colleague, leaving Q. Tatins his Lieutenant, to guard and command the camp. At Rome, they were no leffe terrified and troubled, than they were two years before, at what time as the Carthaginians were encamped before the walls and gates of the City. And men wift not well, what to make of this adventurous and audacious journey of the Conful, whether they should praise or dispraise it. And it seemed that they would measure it and report thereof accor- H ding to the event, than which forely, there is nothing more unjust and unequal. But thus they whilpered, "That the camp was left with an army, and without their General, neer unto the seemy Annibal, yea, and the fame guelded of all the ftrength and flour thereof : that the Conful 6 pretended an expedition into the Lucans country, when indeed he went toward Picenum and " Gallia; leaving the camp by no one thing more fafe and fecure, than by the errour and miltaking of the enemy, who is altogether ignorant, that the General is gone from thence, and part of the "forces with him. But where would they be then, and in what taking thould the camp be, in cale "that were known abroad; or it Annibal would either with his whole army follow after Nere, being gone with no more than fix thousand? or affault the camp, left as it were for a preyunto " him, without forces, without conduct, and without the fortune and good luck of the General to 1 " protect it? The old defeats received in this war, the fresh remembrance of two Consuls shin but the last year, encreased mens tear. All which misfortunes hapned, when there was in Italy "but one Captain General, and one fingle army of the enemies. Now, of one war of the Carthaginians there are made twain: and two Annibals (as a man would tay) be both at once in se fealy, right valorous and renowned warriors. For even Afdrubal alio, was Amilear historias "well as Annibal, as valiant and redoubted a Captain every way : as who for to many years toer gether in Spain, bath been exercifed in the Roman wars, and born the name of atchieving a twofold victory, and defeating two armies, with two molt noble and famous commanders: and " as for expedition and speed in his voyage out of Spain, and for railing the Nations of Franceup " in arms, he may make his boalt much more truly than Annibal himseit. For even in those very K " place, where Annibal had loft the greater part of his foundiers, with hunger and cold, (which s kind of death of all others is most miterable) this Afdrubat bath levied a power of armed men Moreover, they that knew Spain well, and the affairs which had patien there, faid befides. That "he had not to deal with Nero, as with a warrior whom he knew not already; for why? he had When it was, made a Child of Nero, by a good token, That when Afdrabal was by chance in a " wood, and could not get our, was put to his shifts; but whiles he trifled out the time with Not es in booking decentul conditions and capitulations of peace, he shewed him a consening Carthi-"ginian call, gave him the fair flip, and escaped out of his hands. And to conclude, in all their "discourses at Rome, they magnified every thing on the enemics part above all truth, and debated all their own means of help beneath all reaton : such was their fear, which interpreteth and con-

The Speech of fouldiers,

Nere, when he had now gained to much ground, and was gone to far from the enemy, as it had not mattered much if his defigns had been revealed and made known unto him, for any danger that might enue thereof; called his touldiers before him, and spake some few words to this or the like effect. ' Never was there de gnment (qd. he) of any General in the field, in outward flew more e danger us, in deed and truth more tafe and fecure, than this of mine. I lead you to a certain and " affured victor), even to that war, unto which my colleague would not go before the Sente bid callowed non to his till contentment, a greater power both of foot and Hotle, and the isme better tet out and more turns ned, it an if he thould have gone against A a bal himself : and therefore whatfoever small posse and addition of torces you bring thereto, you shall sway thereby the M " whole, and as it were weigh oown the ballance. For when the enemies ready embattailed to "fight, shall bear (and before that time, I will take order I trow, that they shall not hear) that ano-"ther Confui and another army is come, no doubt the day will be oursy and they shall yeeld us the " victory. For it is a fame & name only, that fighteth the field & determineth battails. And small " matters many times carry away the game, and caule mens minds both to floop for fear, and to Strife with hope. And verily, of a well fought field you are they that thall reap the fruit & gainthe #glory. For alwayes it is feen that a little help that cometh laft, is more than all befides & jeemth "to effect the whole. And you fee your felves, with what concourfe, with what admiration, with " what affectionat favour all men do entertain & regard you by the way. And in very truth, as they marched along in their journey, it was a world to fee, how both men & women flocked out of all N the villages of the countrey to fee them, how they forted themfelves into companies & degrees to welcome them, and how as they pailed as it were in a lane through them, they made vows in their name, they poured out their prayers in their behalf, & dealt praises among them a calling them the very guard & detence of the Common weal, the taviours & redeemers of Rome & the Roman Empire s acknowledging that the lives and liberties of themselves and their children, lay in their right hands and depended upon the force of their arms : praying to all the gods and goddeffes, and to all the holy halows of heaven, to vouchfate them a lucky journey, a fortunat fight, and a speedy victory over their enemiess withing heartily that they might be bound and condemned (as it were) to pay and perform their vows, which in their name they had underraken & promited defiring earnefly, that as now they went along. & accompanied them with careful minds for tear of the peril which M they went unto, to after few dayes they might meet with them upon the way with joyful hearts, as they remin with Triumph for their victory. Every man for himself in particular invited them friendly, offered them trankly, entreated and belought them importunatly, that all things whalloever they stood in need of, either for themselves or their beatts, they would receive at his hands especially, as being ready to afford them all most liberally, heapful, and with the better. The fouldiers again, for very modelty strove to take no more than was very needful and necessary,

A no itay they would make with any, nor one jot depart from their colours. Their meat they took by the way as they went, journeying night and day, and fearce allowing their bodies rest and fleep to content their weak nature that looked for it. Now had Nero lent afore-hand to his brother Control certain Courriers, to give him advertisement of his coming, and to know again from him his mind, whether he should come openly or lecretly, by day time or by night, and lodge in one camp with him, or in another apart by himself. Livins his advice was, and he thought it the bettet of the twain, to enter into his camp, closely in the night featon, and had given a watch-word, and made it known throughout all the camp, that every Marshal and Colonel should lodge a Mathalor Colonel, every Centurion entertain a Centurion, every knight or man of arms receive a knight orhorieman, and every footman take unto him a footman into his pavilion and cabbin Regit was not expedient that the camp should be enlarged and set out wider, for tear that the enemy might take knowledge of another Confuls coming: and fo much the more early might many of them be bestowed in the streight room of their pavilions, because the army of Claudius had brought in manner nothing with them in this expedition, fave their amour only. Moreover, in the very way as they came, the company was well mended and much encreased by many voluntaries that offered themselves willingly of their own accord, as well old souldiers, fuch as had ferved out their years, as young and builty men: whom Clinain perceiving fo to firing fortohave their names entred if he faw them personable and rong of body and like to do good ferrice, had enrolled into the muster book. The other Confus lay encamped before * Sena, and + Senagagliza Aldrubal some half mile from him. And therefore Ners, being now approached and come neer. fat him down close among the mountains, because he would not put himself within camp before night. And when they were come thirher they were welcomed every man according to his degree, by them of their own place and calling, and brought into their tents and pavilions and with regeneral joy of all, friendly entertained as their loving guests. The next day following they affembled together to counsel: at which meeting, L. Poreius Licinius the Pretor was present: who was himself encamped close unto the Consuls leaguer. He before their coming, by leading his army over the high places, and one while keeping the narrow streights of the forrest to impeach and flop the passages, another while charging upon the slanks and sides or else upon the back and tail of the enemy, had by all the devices and policies of war, mocked him and kept him play. This man, I say, was at the foresaid counsel. Many men there were of opinion, that the day of battel should be deferred for a time, whiles Nero might have some few dayes respite, both to refresh his fouldiers, wearied with long travail and much watching, and also to know the quality somewhat better of his enemy. Nero not only perfifted still to perswade, but also began most earnefly to intreat, " That they would not by long delay make that delign of his to feem raffa "and dangerous, which speediness in execution had made safe and secure. Considering, that "whiles A nibal upon ignorance and error (which is not like to continue long with him) "lay fill afleep and benummed, neither once thought upon it, to affail the camp left without a "General, nor put nimielf upon the way, to make purinte after me; now before he once ftir, "I may (quoth he) defeat the army of Afdrubal, and return again into Apulia. But he that "by deferring still, giveth the enemy time and respite, betraieth asmuch as lieth in him, the "campunto Annibal, and laieth the way open for him into Gallia, to joyn with Afdrubal at his "good leafure and pleasure. Nay (quoth he) the signal of battel must be given forthwith, and "we must into the field. We must, I say, take the van age and make the best of the error and ig-"norance of our enemies, both absent there, and present here: that neither they with Annil al "may know that they are to deal with fewer; not these again beware, that they are to fight with "more in number, and stronger in power. Thus the counsel brake up, and the signal of battel was put forth, and presently they went into the field. The enemies were already advanced in battel array, and stood with displayed ensigns. The only stay of joyning in fight was this, That Afdrubal riding our with some few Horsemen before the entigns, chanced to mark some old targets of his enemies which he had not as yet feen, and their Horses more lank and lean, than earst betione. And (as he guessed) the number also was greater than ordinary and usual. Suspecting therefore, that which was indeed, he founded the retreet in all halt; and fent out prefently to the river where they nied to water, to fee if they might either light upon some & catch them prisoners, orat least-wife rake good marks by their eye, whether any of them haply were higher coloured, othooked funburnt, presently upon their late travel. Also he gave them commandment to ride aloof about their camp, and to spie whether the rampier were enlarged or set out farther in any place, and to liften attentively whether the trumpet founded fingle or double within the camp. When all other circumstances besides were related in order affirmatively, only the not enlarging of the camp, put them by their him, and gave the occasion that they were beguiled. Two severall camps they were, like as before the coming of the Conful: the one belonging to M. Livius, the other to L. Porcius. And in neither of them were the rampiers and trenches let out any jot, whereby they might put up more tents, and quarter themselves in larger room, But this one thing troubled this old experienced Captain, and acquainted fo well as he was with the Roman enemies that his elpials brought word how in the Pretors camp they founded the trumpet on c, and in the Confuls twice. For furely that was an evident argument that two Confuls were there. And in thinking how the other Conful had departed from Annibal & given him the flip, he mightily tomented himself. And he could not suspect & imagine that, which was indeed the truth, namely, that Annib. I was deluded and mocked in a matter of lo great moment, as to be ignorant what if was become of the General, or of the army, to which he lay to close and neer encamped, Surely (thought he) and without all question, he bath received no small foil and overthrow, and in this fright dareth not make after and follow the enemy. Nay, he feared much, left all were loft and gone, and that he should not come time enough to help and succour him : and that the Romans had gotten already the same good hand in Italy, which they had before in Spain. Otherwhiles he was perswaded, that his letters never came to Annibal his hands, that they were intercepted, and so the Conful made hast to prevent him, and give him the foil by the way. Being perplexed with these careful cogitations, he caused the fires to be put out, and at the fignal given at the first watch, to truis up bag and baggage, and to dislodge, and be gone. In this learful hast, and nightly tumult, the guides whiles they were flenderly looked unto, and imall heed was taken of them, I one of them lat down and refted close in a secret lurking hole which he had before deflined inhis mind; the other waded over the river Metaurun, through the foords that he was well acquainted with, and to got away and made an escape. So the army left at random without their guides, fifth wandred over the fields, and then diverse of them being weary and sleepy with overwatching, laid them down along here and there, and left their colours with few about them. Aldrubal commanded them to march along the bank of the River, and to foilow it, until the day-light might direct them the right way: and lo going a compass in and out according to the winding reaches and cranks of the River, wandred a great while, and gained but a small ground sorward. Now when day light once appeared, he purposed to spie out the first place for convenient passage and there to get over. But finding no foords, by reason that the farther it was from the Sea, the K higher were the banks from the water that kept in the River, he spent all the live-long day, and gave the enemy time to follow after him. And first Claudius Nero came with all the Horiemen, then Porcius followed hard after with the van courriers, and light armed footmen. Whilesthey made offer to charge their enemies in their march, every way, and plaid ftill upon them, info much as now sifarubal leaving to journey forward (wherein he feemed rather to flee than march) was defirous to take a little hillalong the river fide, and there to encamp and fortifie: Livius was come also with all the main power of footmen, so armed and so orderly appointed and marshalled, as they were not only provided to march in journey, but ready also preferrly to give battail. But when they were all joyned together, and aranged in battail array, Claudius had the leading of the right wing, Livius commanded the leit,, and the Pretor took the charge and E conduct of the main battail. Afdrubal leeing no other remedy but to fight, never fortified his camp; but in the fore-front before the vanguard, and in the very mids, placed his Elephants: about them in the left wing he opposeth the French against Claudius; not so much trusting upon them, as supposing verily that the enemy was afraid of them: and in proper person he took up the right wing against Levius for himself and the Spaniards, in whom (being old beaten souldiers) he repoted his most hope. The Ligurians in the mids were bestowed behind the Elephants. But the battail was rather drawn out in length than stretched forth in breadth. The Frenchmen were defended with the hil, that hare out over them. That front which the Spaniards kept, encountred with the left wing of the Romans. And all the battail of the right fide, which bare out from the conflict, stood still and fought not. The hill that was opposite against them, was the me cause that neither afront, nor assault they could charge upon the enemy. But between Livini and A drul al there was an hot fight begun a ready, and cruel bloudshed on both fides. There were both the General Captains: there was the greater part of the Romans, as well foot as Horle: there were the Spaniards, old and experienced fouldiers, skilfull also in the Roman manner of fight: there were the Ligurians, a tough nation, and hardy in fight. Against this battailonwere the Elephants turned, who at the first shock and onset troubled and disordered the vanguard, yea, and began to force the enfigns to give ground. But after upon the noise that grew greater, and the battail that waxed hotter, they began to be unruly, and travers between both battails, as it were doubt'ul to whether fide they belonged, much like to ships left hulling and floring without their pilots and theers men. Then Claudius cried out eftfoons to his fouldiers: To what N end, quoth he, made we such post hast, and took to long a journey? But seeing that he laboured in vain to advance his banners and mount up against the hill opposite unto him, and perceiving that way how it was impossible to come unto the enemy and to enter upon him, he drew forth certain cohorts out of the right wing where he saw they were liker to stand still than to fight, and wheeled about behind the enemies battail and so unwares not only to the enemies, but also to his own men, he charged upon the left flank of the enemies : and he bestirred himself so nimbly, that when he had shewed himself on the sides, presently he plaid upon their backs; in such sort, that now on all hands, affront, behind, and on their flanks, down went the Spaniards and Ligurians and were hewn in pieces, yea, and the execution reached to the very French. There, with them was least ado, and smallest fight of all: for a great many of their fellows had abandoned their co-O lours and being flipt away in the night, lay affeep all over the fields: and fuch as were there, weary with travail and watching (as having bodies that of all things cannot away with labour and pains taking) were scarce able to bear their cortelets on their backs. Besides, now it was high noon: and what with drought & heat together they flood gaping for air & yeelded their bodies either tobe massacred, or taken captive. As for the Elephants, there were more of them killed by the hands of the governors and guiders that fate upon them, than by the enemy that lought against them. For

Atheir manner was to have about them a Carpenters chiffel and a mallet, and when the bealts begn once to rage and to run upon their own fellows, their mafters would fet the faid chiffel between their ears, even in the very joynt where the nape of the neck and the head meet together, and with his mallet to drive it as hard as he could this was found to be the readiest and most specdy way to kill fo mighty and huge a beatt, when they were past all hope to rule them and keep them inorder. And the first inventor and practifer of this feat was Afdrabal, a famous and memorable Captain, as in many other respects, so especially for this battail. He it was that held ont to the end, exhorting his fouldiers to fight, fighting also himself, and adventuring all dangers : heit was, that when his men were weary and drew back (by reason of long toil and labour) incented them again, one while by fair words and intreaty, another while by that p checks and rebakes : he reclaimed them again when they were running away ; he renewed the fight in divers places when it flaked and gave over. And at the very lalt, when he faw evidently that the enemy had the honor of the day, because he would not remain alive after so great an army defeated that followed his standard, and were induced by the reputation and name that went of him, he fet spurs to his Horse, and rode among the Squadrons of the Roman Horsemen; and there, as befeemed Amilears fon, and Annebals brother, fighting right manfully, was flain. Never during the time of this war in one field were there to many enemies killed: and it feemed now that for loffe of Captain and overthrow of army, they might well cry quittance with them for the defeat at Came. Slain there were 56000 enemies, 6400 taken pritoners and a rich booty and pillage gained of all forts, besides gold and silver. Moreover, there were recovered of Roman citizens above four thousand, who had been taken prisoners, and were among the enemies. That comfort they had to make amends for the fouldiers that died in this battail : for they won not the victory without bloudshed in this field, wherein to the number almost of eight thousand Romans and allies together, loft their lives. And the Conquerors themselves had so much their fill of bloud and flaughter, that the next morrow, when word was brought unto Livius the Conful, that divers Citalpine Gauls, and Ligurians, which either were not at the battail, or escaped out of the execution, and were going away in one company all together, without a certain Leader, without Enfigns, without any order or command, and might all be put to the fword and utterly deltroyed, if there were but one cornet of Horsemen tent out after them. "Nay, quoth he, let some ren ain alive to tell the news both of our enemies losse and ruin, and of "our own vertue and valour. And Nero the very next night after the battail, marched with more speed backward, than he came thither, and within fix dayes returned again to far as to his standing leaguer, and the enemies. All the way as he marched, he was not indeed so resorted unto and frequented by fo many men, by reason that there went no harbingers or messengers before: but his coming was welcomed, with fo great gladness and mirth, that for very joy, the people were welneer besides themselves. As for Rome, it cannot be uttered and expressed in words fufficiently, how men were affected the one way or the other : neither how penfive the City was in doubtful expectation of the event, nor how joyous and jocund again, upon the news and tidings of the victory. For never one day (after the rumour once was blown thither, that Clanding the Conful was gone forth in his expedition) from the fun-rifing unto the fetting, departed either Senators out of the Councel-chamber, from attendance upon the Magistrats, or the people out of the Common-hall. The dames of the City, because other help they could yeeld none, betook themselves to their beads and devotions, and in every Church went up and down, and plied all the Gods with prayers, with vows, and humble supplications. As the City was thus perplexed and in suspence; first there came some slying news, that two Horsemen of Namia were come out of the battail, and returned to the camp which lay to guard and keep the lireights and passages of Umbria, who had brought word thither, that the enemics were defeated. At the first, they rather lent their ears to hear these tidings, than bent their minds to entertain the isme; as being greater than they might in heart conceive, and more joyful than they could affuredly believe : and the exceeding swittnes of the rumor hindred the credit thereof, because it was reported withat, that the battel was fought but two dayes before. Then were letters brought from L. Manlins Acidinus, fent out of the camp, which confirmed the arrival of those Horsemen of Namia. Those letters were brought through the common place, unto the Tribunal of the Pretor: whereupon the Lords of the Senat were fent for out of the Councel-house. But the people kept such a thrusting and thronging about the door of the Senat, that the messenger could not passe thither, but was haled and pulled by the people, queltioning with him, and calling hard upon him, that the letters should be read at the market cross, and in the Roftra, before they were opened in the Senate. But at the laft, they were restrained by the Magistrais and caused to void, and hardly could the joy be contained among to unruly people, who had no measure nor rule of their affections. Well, the letters were first read in the Senat, and then in the affembly of the people : and there, according to the divers dispositions of men, some took joy and contentment of mind, as upon a certainty : others would give no credit, before they either heard the messengers speak directly from the Confuls, or faw their letters. After this, word came, that there were Embaffadors themselves at hand. And then indeed, there can to meet them, of all forts, young and old, every one defired to be the first, to see and to hear these so glad ridings. And they went out so far as the bridge Milvius, and all the way along, was full of people. These Embassadors or messengers, were La Veturius Phile, P. Licimus Varus, Q. Cecilens Metellus, Who being accompanied with people of all degrees and qualities, that flocked about them, came as far as to the common place: femel questioned with themselves, others enquired of their train and retinue, what news, and how the World went. And as any one had caught an end from them, that the army and Captain General of the enemies was flain, or the Roman legions fafe, and the Confuls alive and well, he would immediatly impart his joy unto others. Much ado had they to come unto the Caria, and more ado there was, to keep out the multitude, that they were not mingled among the Lords of the Senate But at laft the letters were read in the Senat. From thence were the Embaffadors brought into the general affembly of the people. And L. Veturim after he had read the letters, explained himfelt from point to point in order, how every thing was done, with great applaule ; and alterwards. with a general shout of all the assembly, who hardly could conceive in their minds sogreat joy, Then they ran divers wayes, some to the Temples of the Gods to render thanks, others to their own houses, to communicate with their wives and children so lucky and fortunate tidings. And the Serial decreed a folemn procession for three dayes together, for smuch as M. Livemand C. Clanding the Confuls, with the fatety of the legions had vanquifted the enemies, killed their General, and put their army to the tword. This procession (. Hestition the Pretor, published into open affembly of the people: and it was celebrated and folemnized, both by menand mone, all the Temples for three dayes fully, were likewife replenished with the one tox and the other. For the Matrons and Dames of the City, in their belt apparrel, together, with their children, yetlded praise and thanks to the immortal Gods, as if now they had been freed from all feat, and the war come to a final end for ever. This victory altered the very flate and course of the commonweal, fo as from that time forward, as intime of letled peace, men durft make contracts, buy and fell, borrow and lend, yea, and pay debts to their creditors.

"C. Claudiss the Conful, to foon as he was entred into the camp again, canfed the head of Afirabal (which he had preferved with great care and brought with him) to be thrown outbeine the Corps de gased and flations of the enemies, and that the Affrican captives; flouid believe beind as they were in chains: and two of them to be fent loofe unto Annibal, to declare andrecount in order, how every thing hapned. Annibal having at once received this double blow, mourning as well for the publick loffe of the flate, as for the calamity hapned in his own hout, fetched a deep figh (by report) and faid: Ah, I fee well the had fortune of Carthage; Andaflodging from the nec, because he would bring together all his forces (which being disperded aimder, he was not able to hold and maintain) into the utmost angle of Isalj, (the Brutians country) he brought thither as well the Metapontins, even the whole state of them, who alvandoned their own Towns and Cities, as also the Lucans, as many as were subject unto him, and under his ob-dience.

The Breviary of L. Flores upon the eight and twentieth Book.

THE prosperous affairs in Spain, under the conduit of Syllanus the Lieutenant of Scipio, and Li-Scipio his brother, atchieved against the Carthaginians: as also the abts performedly Sulpitius the Pro-conful, and Attalus the King of Alia [the lefs] in the quarrel and behalf of the Atolians, against Philip King of the Macedonians, are reported and fet down [in this book.] When there was a Triumph decreed and granted unto M. Livius and C. Claudius Nero the Confals: Livius, because he N that performed the exploit in his own Province, rode in a chariot drawn much four steeds: and Neto, became the came into the Province of his colleague, to belp forward the wittory, rode after him monnted on bor (chack : Howbeit even then, in this habit and manner of triumph, he carried the more glo-17, port, and reverence: for to fay a truth, in this war he had done more good fervice than his brother Conful. The fire ment out in the chappel of Velta, by negligence of a Virgin, that had the keeping and rending thereof, and looked no better unto st. The faid Virgin was well whipped. P. Scipio finished the mar in Spain against the Carthaginians, when it had continued fourteen years : and in the fift) car after that he went from the City of Rome. And baving differed the enemies quite of the poffession of Spain, he recovered it wholly for the Romans. From Taracon he loofed, much two barks, and failed into Affrick unto Syphax King of the Numidians, with whom he concluded a league. Aldrubal the fon of O Gigo, fat there with him at one table, and they supped together. He exhibited a game and positive of God playing at new Catthage, in the bonor of his father and uncle: and the same was not performed by common fencers and sword-players hired thereto, but by such as either for the honour of their Captain, or to determine fome controversie, gave desiance one to the other and entred the list in combal: Among whom, two great LL, of the country, who were brethren, fought at sharp for the soveraign Of the Kingdom. When the City Altapa was besieged and asfailed by the Romans, the Townmin

h confed a mighty pile of wood to be made, and fee on five, and when they had killed their wives and children, he there we themployed be callong into the five after them. SCIPIO himself, while he lay grievously firk, and there hapned by occasion thereof a maniny to a mighin one part of his army, when he was amendance again. There was likewife an amity and lociety concluded with Malanifla, King of the Numitians: who also prompicalism be aides, in cafe he would come over nine Afficiet. We to the Gadinars affinishes the departure of Mago from thence: who had received letters from Carthage, that he flouid piftib feat into Italy. Scipio, after he was returned to Rome, was cread longist. And when he made facts have the Prevince of Affick, Q. Fabius Maximus withshood him: at g he had the government of Sicily: but with commission to fail over into Afficiet, in case he behough it good for the Bommonweal. Mago the for of Afficiet from the lesser lister of Italy.

The eight and twentieth Book of T. Livius.

Hen it feemed that Spain was eafed as much of war, as Italy charged therewith, by the voyage of Afdrabal thither: behold, all of a sudden there arole other troubles there equall to the former. And as for the Provinces of Spain at that time they were possessed between Romans & Carthaginians in this manner. Asdrubal C the lon of Gifgo, was retired with his power far within the country, even to the Ocean and Gades. But the coasts bordering upon our sea, and in manner all Spain bending coward the East, was held by Scipio and Subject to the Roman Empire. Hanno the new General being passed out of Affrick with a fresh army, and entred into the room of Afdruhal the Barchine, joyned with Mago: and when he had put in arms within a short time, a great number of men in Celiberia, whi h lieth in the mids between the two leas; Scipio sent forth against him; M. Sysanus made ten thousand foo, and five hundred horsemen. This Sylfamus made such speed by taking as long journies as pol-fibly he could (confidering how much hindred and troubled he was both by the roughness of the water, and also by the straights, environed with thick woods, and forrests, as most parts of Spain are) that not with standing all those difficulties, he prevented not only the messengers, but also the very fame, and rumour of his coming, and by the guidance, of certain fugitive revolts out of Celtiferia, he passed forward from thence to the enemy. By the same guides he had intelligence, and was for certain advertised (being now some ten miles from the enemy) that about the very way where he should march there were two camps: namely, on the left hand the new army a-boveful of Celtiberians to the number of more than nine thousand lay encamped and the Carthaginians on one right. As for this Leaguer, it was wel defended and fortified with corps de guards, which watch and ward both night and day, according to the good order and discipline of war. But the other was as much neglected, diffolute, loofe, and out of order, like as commonly barbarous people and raw fouldiers are, and fuch as fear the leis, by reason they are at home within their own country. S. Hams: thinking it good policy to fet upon them fift, gave commandment to much under their enfigns and colouis, and bear toward their left hand as much as they could for fer of being discovered in some place of other by the guards and Sentingles of the Carthághnians. And himself in person, having sent before certain vant-courriers and cipials, with his army advan ed apace directly toward his enemy, Now was he approached within three miles of them unespied, and not descried at all. For why ? a mountain country it was, full of roughs and crags, overpread and covered with woods and thickets. There in a hollow valley between and there-fore extention the purpole, he commanded his fouldiers to fit them down and take their refection. In this mean time the espials came back and verified the words of the fugitives aforesaid Then the Romans, after they had piled their packs, their truffes and baggage in the midt, armed themselves, and in order of battell set torward to fight. When they were come within a mile of the chemies, they were discovered by them, who began hiddenly to be attraid. Wage at the first outry and alarm, fet spurs to his horse, and rode a gallop out of his Camp to succour. Now there were in the army of, the Celiberians four thouland footmen targettiers, and two-lipindred horse. This Troop being in manner the flower and very firength of the whole army, and as it were a full and compleat legion he placed in the vanguard; all the reft, which were lightly armed, the belowed in the rereward for to fuccour and refcue. As he led them forth thus ordered and arranged they were not well islued, without the trench, but, the Romans began to large their javelius and arranged they were not well islued, without the trench, but, the Romans began to large their javelius and arranged they were not well islued, without the trench, but, the Romans began to large their javelius and darks against them. The Spaniards to avoid this volley of those from the enemies, couched the delegation of the control of the contro closeunder their shields, and defended themselves, and afterwards they role up at once to charge again upon them. But the Romans standing thick, as their manner is, received all their darts in G their targets, and then they closed man to man, and foot to foot, and began to fight at hand With their fwords. Howbeit, the ruggedness of the ground, as it nothing availed the swiftness of the Cekiberians (whose guises to run to and to in skirmish and keep no ground) so the same was not hurfull at all to the Romans who were uled to a let battell, and to frand to their fight conly the stright room, and the trees and shrubs growing between parted their ranks and files astinder, lo as they were forced to maintain skirmish either singly one to one or two to two at the most as the yhad been matched to cope together even. And look what thing hindered the enemies in their flight, the fame yielded them, as it were, bound hard and foot unto the Romans, for to be H their night, the jame yielded themas wel-near of the Celtiberians were flain; their light amed killed, Now when all their targettiers wel-near of the Celtiberians were flain; their light amed killed, Now when all the Carchaginians allo, who from the other camp ran to fuccour, were likewife dif-founders, and the Carchaginians allo, who from the other camp ran to fuccour, were likewife diftoudiers, and the Carthaginians anosities. So there were two thouland footmen, and new me districted different arraicd, diffeometred and hewn in pieces. So there were two thouland footmen, and not above, arrated, discommed and the fact began battell) fled with Mago and escaped. As for Hannothe and all the horsemen (who scarce began battell) fled with Mago and escaped. As for Hannothe and an the nontenent with them who came laft, and to the very end of the fray, wastaken other Generall, together with them who came laft, and to the very end of the fray, wastaken other General, or and all the Cavalry, with as many as remained of the old footmen followed after, and by the tenth day arrived in the Province of Gades, and came unto Afdrubal. The lowed after, and by the tenth way fouldiers, flipt into the next woods out of the way, and forom Celtiberians, that were but new fouldiers, flipt into the next woods out of the way, and forom ence near name. This fortunate victory hapned in 60 good a time, not for much flifled the prefent war in the ve. 1 ry birth, as it cut off the matter and maintenance of future troubles, in case the enemies had been let alone, and infered to follicit and ftir other nations to take armes, like as they railed the Celtherians already. Whereupon, Scipiò having highly commended Syllamis, and conceived great hope withall to dispatch quite, and make an end of the wars, in case himself lingred not the mathematical the second state of the wars. ter, and madelong ftay; purfued the remnant behind, and fet forward into the utmost Province of Spin against Afdrubal. But Afdrubal, who happed then to lye encamped in Baijcaforto keep his Allies in obedience and faithfull alleageance, all on a fudden diflodged, pluettiup flankeep ms Ames in and more like one that fled than marched, led his army farther into the country, dards, and away; and more like one that fled than marched, led his army farther into the country, even as far as the Ocean, and to Gades, But supposing that solong as he kept his forces all together, himfelf was the only mark which the enemy would shoot at, before that he cur over the K fraights of Gibrattar to Gades, he brake up his whole army, and fent them away here and there to their severall Cities, bothto save themselves within the walls, and to defend the walls by some of arms. Scipio, to foon as he perceived that the war was thus divided into fundry parts, and that to lead about his forces from City to City, was rather a long and tedious peece of work, than either difficult or much availeable, retired back. But because he would not leave that country clear in the hands of the enemies, he fent his brother L. Scipio with 10000 foot, and 1000 horse men, to affail the mightieft and wealthieft Ciry in those parts, which the baroarous people all Oringis. This City is feated in the confines of the Meleff (a nation meer Spaniards) the foil fruitiall, and the inhabitants therefind filver mines, This was the fortrels of Afdrubit, and his place of fafe retreat, when he made outroads all abroad into the midland countries of the ming and spoiled the people. Lucim Scipio having pitched his Camp under the faid City: before thithe entrenched and blocked the town, fent certain to the gates, who by parling near at hand, might feel and found the dispositions of the Citizens, and perswade with them to make triall of the Romans friendly alliance, rather than their forcible violence. But perceiving by their aniwers of mind at all nor inclination to peace, he can a trench, and raifed a double tampiar about the town; and divided his army into three parts, to the end that one of them fliohid ever follow the affails, whiles the other twain took reft and eafe, And when the first troop and regiment of them began to give a camilado, there followed a ferce, cruell, and doubtfull skirmifh. For they could not eafily either come under the walls, or bring scaling ladders to set to, by reason of the shorthat light upon them. And such as already had reared up ladders to the wall, some of them were pushed off M with certain forks provided for that purpole, others were caught hold of with iron hooks from above, and were in danger to be hung up in the air, hoifed aloft, and fetcht over the walls, &apio feeing that the conflict was unequal, by reason of the small number of assailants, and that the enemies had the advantage besides, in that they fought from the wall job : caused that first regment to retire, and with the other twain at once gave a fresh assault to the town. This stroke is great a fearinto them who were already wearied with fighting, that not only the townsmen inddenly abandoned the walls and fled, but also the Carthaginian garrison souldiers, for sea lest the City was betraied, for look also their stations and places of guard, and gathered themselves into one place. But then the townsmen were affraid, lest if the enemies put themselves within the City, they should be massacred every where as they came in their way, without respect and difference who were Carthaginians, or who were Spaniards. Whereupon they fet one gate open on a hidden, and in great numbers ran out of the town, bearing their targets before them, a gaileff the darts that were shot afar off, and shewing aloft their naked right hands, in tokenthat they had laid afide their fwords. But whether the enemy could not well difcern them folit off, or whether they sufpected some crafty and deceitfull practice, I wot not, but they fell upon their that fled and yielded unto them, and flew them downright, as well as if they had affironted them in the face of a bartell, and at the famegate entred the City with bloudy banners. In other p.ms. likewife they fell to hewing down the gates with axes, and to break them open with crows of Iron, And as every horfeman got into the City, he tode amain according to the direction giren Sy the Generall) into the market place, to be possessed thereof. And to these horsemen were al- o fighed the Triarii for aid and affiftance. The Legionary souldiers besides ran over all the other parts of the City, poiling and killing all that ever they met, save such as defended themselves with their armour. All the Carthaginians were taken priloners and committed to ward, likewife of townsmen about three hundred, such as had shut the gates; but more all the reft the town was rendred again, and each man had his own goods delivered and reftored unto him. There were Lain'at the affailt of that City, of enemies almost two thousand ! bift of Romans not above

A fourflore and ten. As by the winning of the town, they that were imployed there took great joy and contentment : fo in their return to their Generall himself, and the rest of the main army, they madea goodly shew as they marched with a mighty multitude of prisoners led before them. Scipio having praised his brother in the most honourable terms that he could devise, and namely, for this exploit of forcing Orinx, making him equall in glory to himself for the conquest of Carthage: because winter drew on, that he could neither give the attempt upon Gades, nor yet follow at once mon the army of Afdralal. so disperied as it was in fundry parts over the Province, conducted his forces back again into the Province of Spain, that lieth on this fide Iberus: and when he had dimiffed his legions into their feverall (fanding camps to winter in, and fent his brother L. Scipio to Rome, together with Hanno the Generall of the enemies, and other Gentlemen prisoners, he B withdrew himfelf to Taracon.

In the same year the Roman Armado being set out under the conduct of the Admirall M. Vilerius Lavinus the Pro-Conful, made a voyage from Sicily into Affrick, and foreiged all over the Territories of Mica and Carthage, infomuch as they drave booties out of the very utmost Confines of the Carthaginians, and even about the walls of Wica. As they failed back for Sicily, they were encountred by the Carthaginian fleet, confuting of seventy long thips of war, whereof eventeen were boorded and taken, four funk in the deep fea, the rest were put to slight and diperfed. Thus the Roman Captain Valerius, after victories atchieved both by fea and land, returned with rich prizes of all forts to Lilybaum: and hereupon by reason that the seas were open and cleared of the enemies ships, great store and abundance of grain was brought to

In the beginning of that summer wherein these things hapned, P. Sulpitius the Pro-Consul, and King Attalus, after they had wintred in Agina, as is abovefaid, with a joint navy paffed over from thence into the Island Lemnos. The Romans were twenty five Galliaces of five ranks of oars, and the King had thirty five. Philip for his part because he would be ready at all assaies to meet with the enemy either by land or fe ., went himself in person down to the sea-side, as far as Demerias, and made proclamation, that all his forces should by a certain day meet together at Langla. Upon the fame that went of the Kings coming, there repaired fundry Embaffies from the confederate States of all parts unto Demetrias. For the Ætolians having taken heart unto them, as well for the fociety with the Romans, as upon the coming of Attalus, wasted and spoin led their borderers. And not only the Acarnanians and Bocotians, and they that inhabit Euboca, werein great fear, but also the Achaens; whom over and besides the war from the Ætolians, Machanidas also the Lacedamonian tyrant terrified, who encamped himself not far from the confines of the Argives. All these States made report what perils were like to ensue both by sea and land to their leverall Cities, and belought the King his aid. Moreover there came unto him out of his own Realm no good tidings of peace and quietness, for that Scerdiletus and Pleuratus were gone out and rebelled: and of the nations of Thrace, the Medicipecially were ready to invade the frontiers adjoyning upon Macedony, in case the King should fortune to be busied and occupied otherwise in any long wars. The Bootians likewise themselves, and other nations inhabiting the more inland parts of Greece, had given intelligence, that the passages of the forrest E Thermopola, where as the narrow gullet of the streights yieldeth small passage, were stopped up by the Ætolians with a trench and pallilado, that it might give no access at all unto Philip, for to come and defend the Cities of the Allies. Thus many troubles coming full and thick one upon another, had been able to have rouzed and awakened even a fleepy and flow Captain, and made him to look about him. These Embassadors he dispatched and sent away, promising every one of them help and succour, as time and occasion would permit: and willing them each one for the present to provide those things that were most urgent and important. Then he sent a garrison unto that City from whence new came, that Attalus having passed with a seet from Lemnos, had wasted and forraged all the territory about it. And he sent Polyphantes with a small power into Baotia, and Menippus likewise, one of his own Castains and Cavaliers, unto Chal-Fou, with a thousand targettiers, called Peleati, (now the Peleate certain small bucklers or targets, nothing unlike unto the Spanish Cetre) unto whom were joyned five hundred Emians, that they might be able to guard all the parts of the Island : himself in person went to Scotusa, and there he appointed the Rendezvouz that all the forces of the Macadonians should be brought thither from Lariffa. News came unto him there that the Ætolians had summoned and pro- Larizzogor chimed a generall Diet or Councill at Heraclea, and that King Attalus would repaire thither Large to consult about the managing of the whole war. And with an intent by his sudden coming to trouble this solemn assembly and meeting of the States, he took great journeys in his march, and led his army toward Heraclea: but the Councill was newly diffolved when hearrived thither. Howbeit, he destroyed all the standing corn, which was near-hand ripe, Gipecially in the vale along the Gulph of the Ænians, and so reduced his army back again to Scotefa: and there leaving his whole power, he retired himself to Demetrias, attended only with his royall guard. And because he might from thence be ready to meet with all sudden stirs and invations of the enemies, he tent out men of purpose into Phocis, * Eulaa, and * Pepa- * Nigropmite off. And himself fet up one watch tower upon Cissas (amountain, the top whereof is of an or Saraquino, Castaline, Castali exceeding height) that upon the fignall of the beacons on fire from afar, he might in the minute Caffaldae of an hour have intelligence, to foon as the enemies went about any trouble whatfeever. But H ot an nour nave intenigence, in Assau, passed the seastrom Peparethus to Nices, and from thence to Roman Generall, and King Assau, passed the seastrom Peparethus to Nices, and from thence failed with their Armado to Entern, unto the City Oceans, which as a man beareth his course from the gulph of Demetrias to Chalcis and Enripms, is the first City of Euboa that shewethis from the gupti of Deministration of the fer upon the let hand. And thus it was agreed between Attalus and Sulpitius, that the Romans feet upon the let hand. And thus it was agreed between Attalus and Sulpitius, that the Romans felt upon the lett nand. And thus to the said the King with his forces on the land. Four daies after the fleet was arrived they presented themselves before the City to affair it. For, that time better the fleet was arrived they presented themselves before the City to affair it. ter the neer was afficed that and conference with Plator, who was appointed by Philip gover-tween was ipent in fecret talk and conference with Plator, tween was ipent in introduction and City had within it two Citadels, the one commanding the feath nor and Provolt of the City. The City had within it two Citadels, the one commanding the feath the other fituate in the very heart and midft of the town. From thence there is a way under the ground that leadeth to the fearat the end whereof there frood a fabrick or tower five frories high, I ground that leaded had place of defence. There at first began a most sharp and cruell conflict, by a inguist outward and pract will furnished with all kind of thot and artillery: and likewife from reason that the turret was well furnished with all kind of thot and artillery: and likewife from out of the ships there was planted much ordnance, and many engins bent to impeach and assuit out of the lame. Now when every mans mind was amuzed, and eye fixed upon this hot and eager fight, the same. Now when every man and the gate of the other Citadell that flood over the fea, and so in the turning of an hand it was surprized and won. The townsmep being expelled and chaled from thence, retired and betook themiclyes into the middle of the City pure the other fortrefs. But certainfouldiers were fet of purpose there to shutthe gate upon them: and so being excluded they were killed and taken priloners in the midft between. The garrion of the Macdonians flood round together under the Castle wall, and neither sled openly amain, nor yet began to fight, as if they meant to flick to it unto the end, For whom Plater obtained pard on of Sugitim, and having embarked them, brought them to Demetrium of Phthiotis, and there fet thema-

shore, and himself returned to Attalus. Sulpirius bearing himfell bold for this so good and speedy success, immediatly failed with his victorious Armado against Chaleis. Where the event in the end answered nothing unto his hope and expectation. The fea lying broad and large on both hamus, gethereth in that place to a natrow room, to as at the first hight it maketh a flew of a double peer or haven opening upon twodivers mouths, but in very truth, there is not lightly to be found a worse harbour, and a more dangerous rode for thips. For not only for the exceeding high hils on both tides of the main, the winds arise suddenly and blow blusterous. but also the very straight it self of Euripus ebbethact. and floweth feven times in the day, as the voice goeth, at certain fet and ordinary hours; but without all order, as the winds drive, the fea turneth and rolleth hither and thither, working up and down, and like a flowing tream runneth torcibly and with great violence, as it were, down a fteep hill: so as neither night norday the ships there riding have any rest and repose. As the Roman Armado was thus engaged within fo dangerous a rode: fo the town of the one partwas en ironed with the sea and on the land-side surely fortified; besides the desence of a strong garrifon there, and the affored loyalty of the Captains and principall heads and rulers; whereby it was chiefly guarded, which at Oceans was but vain, fickle, and unftedfaft; by means whereofit was renable and impregnable. The Roman Generall in this case, considering how he had begun a rash enterprise and seeing many difficulties on every hand, wrought wifely yet in this one point, M that he foon gave over, because he would spend no time in vain, and passed over with his fleet from thence to Cynns of Locris (a town of Merchandie belonging to the City of Opus, fituate a mile from the fea.) Philip had warning by the beacons on fire that appeared from Orean: but by the fraud of Plater, the other were with the latest fet a burning from the watch-tower abore faid. And orannuch as he was not ftrong enough at lea, he could not with his navy have ele accels into the Island, So that service was delaied and altogether neglected, But he bestirred himfelf quickly to the fuccour of Chalcis, to foon as ever he espice the fire from the beacon, Forsibeit Chaleis it felf be a City of the same Island, yet it is divided nom the Continent by so narrow an arm of the sea that there is no more but a bridge between it and the land: and on that side it hath more easte accels than by water. Philip having differed the garrison there, cast down the N fort and discomfitted the Etolians who kept the straight passage of Thermopple, came from Disetries to Scott of from whence he departed at the third watch; and when he had driven and chiled the enemies in great fear to Heracles, himself in one day reached to Elatis in Phocis, a journey above 60 miles. The very fame day in manner the City of Opustis was taken by K. Attalus and put to the ranfack. The whole pillage thereof, Sulpitius had granted to the King, in regard that Orism few daies before was spoiled and rifled by the Roman founders, and the Kings men hadro there with them. Now was the Roman Armado retired to Oreum: and A tales not ware of Philip his coming, spent time in exacting monies from the chief and principall Citizens. But so sudden and unexpected was this accident of his approach, that had not certain Cretenians by good hap gone forth a forraging far from the City. and descried the march of the enemies a great way off. O he might have been overtaken and surprized. Attalus unarmed and out of order as he was made haste & ran amain to the sea-side for to recover the ships. And even as he and his men were looing from the land and lanching into the fea, Philip came, and from the very shore put the manuels and failers in great fear. From thence he returned to Opus, crying out upon God and man, and blaming his ill luck, that he had miffed to narrowly the opportunity of to great an exploit, and lerit go, as it were, fnatched out of his very eye. In the fit of anger he reproved and rebuked

the Opuntians, for that being able to hold out the fiege untill his coming, fo foon as they faw the enemy they presently had yielded themselves in a manner voluntary into his hands. When he had fet things in order at Opus and thereabout he took his journey to Torone. Attalus at the first reried himself to Oreum: but upon the news arrived, how Prusias the King of Buthynia had invaded the frontiers of his kingdom, he left the Roman affairs and the Ætolian war, and from thence filed over directly into Afia, Sulpitius also retired his navy unto Agina, from whence in the beginning of the spring he had departed and taken his voyage. And Philip forced and won Torone, with as small ado as Attalus before had taken Opus. That forelaid City Torone was inhabited by certain that were fled and driven out of Thebes in Phibiotis. For when the City was taken by Philip and they fled for protection unto the Ætolians, (to whom they recommended and comgmitted themselves) the Exolians gave unto them that place to seat themselves in, being a City wa-Red and in manner defolate by the former war of Philip. Then Philip having recovered Torone again, as is aforefaid, departed from thence, and won Tritonum and Drymas, two small and base towns of no account in Doris. From whence he came to Elais, where he had given commandment, that the Embassadors of Prolomens and the Rhodians, should give attendance until his coming. Where, as they were treating about the making an end of the Ætolian war (toralmuch as those Embassadors to the same effect, had lately presented themselves at Heraclea, in the Councill and assembly of the Romans and Ætolians stidings came, that Machanidas purposed and determined to fet upon the Eleans, as they were preparing to exhibit the folemn Olympian games, Philip supposing it good to prevent that, courteously answered the Embassadors and gave them their C dispatch: laying that as himself was not the cause of that war so he would not hinder and stay the conclusion of peace upon any equal and reasonable conditions. And so with a power lightly appointed he marched through Bestiato Megara; and from thence went down to Corinth: where having furnished himself with victuals, he marched forward to Phlios & Phaneus. And being now come as far as to Erea, and hearing therethat Machanidas upon the rumour of his coming for fear was fled back to Lacedamon, he returned to Legium, unto the generall Diet and Council of the Achai: Supposing withall, that he should find there the Punick armado, which he had sent for to comethither, because he might be able to do somewhat also by sea. But some sew daies before the Carthaginians had failed over into Phocaa, and from thence were gone to the havens of the Acarnanians, fo foon as they heard once, that Attalus and the Romans were departed from Orenum, fearing that they would make our after them, and left they should be overtaken and surprised within Rhium, which is the very mouth of the Corinthiangulph. Philip verily grieved hereat, and was wonderfully troubled in mind, feeing what hafte foever he made himself in all his emprises, yethecame too short and effected nothing in due time; as if fortune in taking all things out of his very eye-fight, had deluded, disappointed, and mocked all his speediness and expedition. How best, in that folemn Diet and affembly, he diffembled his grief, bit in his passionate affections, and thus with an haughty mind he spake and said, "That he called both God and man to witness, that he "had forlet no opportunity of time nor vantage of place, but when and wherefoever he heard but "any inckling of the enemy, and the least rustling of armour, thither he had made all haste that "possibly he might: but he could hardly deviseand conceive, whether himself were more ventu-E" rous in feeking war, than the enemy nimble and quick in avoiding the fame. So Attalus at Opus, "To Sulpitius at Chalcis, and to the other day Machanidas escaped out of his hands and got a-"way But forely (quoth he) his running away will not alwaies proteer and speed well: neither is "that to be counted a dangerous war, wherein a man may be fure (if he but meet his enemy once) "to have the upper hand. That which is the principall point of all, thus much have I got yet at "the enemies hands, that they confess thereby, how they are not able to make their parts good "with us and I doubt not, but shortly I shall atchieve the victory of them, and the event and for-"tune of their fighting with me, shall be no better than their present hope. The Kings allies were glad to hear him speak thus. Then he retired unto the Achaans, Erea, and Triphylia, and delivered again Aliphera unto the Megalopolitans; for that they proved by good evidence, that it be-Flonged by right to their territory and confines. Thus having received of the Achaans certain ships, to wit, three Galliaces or Carvels of four banks of oars, and as many gallies of two ranks, from thence he cut over to Anticyra. And then with seven Carvels of sive ranks of oars, and more than twenty barks befides, which he had fent into the gulph of Corinth to joyn with the Carthaginian navy, he made fail to Erythre in Etolia, near unto Empalium, and there disbarked and landed his men. But the Æxolians were advertised aforehand of his arrival and coming ashore: for all the people that inhabited either the country towns and villages, or the Castles near to Potidenie and Apollonia, were fled into the mountains and woods. As for the cattell, which in that hurry and haste that they made could not be driven away with them, those they preyed upon and brought them to the ships, With these and all the rest of the booty he sent Nicias the Prator of 6 the Acharans to Agium, and fent forward to Corinth: and from thence he commanded that the land forces should be conducted and march by land through Bassia: whiles himself failing from Cenebras along the coast of Attica, above the point or cape of Sunium, passed even through the midft of his enemies armados, and arrived at Chalcis. Then after he had commended the Citizens there for their fidelity and vertue, in that neither fear nor hope was able to change and turn their resolute minds, and exhorted them for the time to come, to continue stedsast in their alliance and allegeance, if they made more reckoning of their own fortune, and loved it better than the condition

dition of the Oritans and the Opuniis he failed from Chaleis to Oreum, And when he had commit H atton of the Ortans and the opposition of the City, unto those principal Citizens, who ted the government of the State, and the guard of the City, unto those principal Citizens, who ted the government of the State, and the guarantee government of the City was lolly, rather than to yield themselves unto the Romans, himself passed over from Enhan unto Demetrias, from whence at the first hetook his voyage to the aid passed over from Linear and Allies. After all this, having appointed and let out at Caffandras and incour or his triends and hines. All the state of the property of the writing has to finish out the keels for an hundred long ships of war, and taken up a number of the writing has to finish out the keets for an numered forg in 1850 Mars as sownin quiet, both because Artalus was departed from reit of the worksteeing that all Greece was now in quiet, both because Artalus was departed from thence, and also for that himself had in good time incoured his althes and confederats, who were in some trouble and distress, he returned back again into his own Realm, for to make war upon

ne Darganians. In the latter end of that lummer, wherein these affairs thus passed in Greeces, when Q. Fabius I the Dardanians. Maximus the father being fent as Embassador from M. Levius the Consul unto the Senat at Rome, had brought word and made report, That the Comill judged L. Porcius with his legions to beful nad propagative the Province of France, and that himself might well be spared; and depart from thence, and the Consular army withdrawn out of those parts: the Lords of the Senar gave order and de and the Comman army M. Levins, but C. Claudius also his Collegue, should return to the City. This difference only between the one and the other appeared in the decree, in that they gare direction, that the army of M. Livius should be brought home, but the Legions of Nevo should remain fill in the province, and be opposed against Annibal. The Confuls by entercourse of their letters passing between, agreed thus together, That like as they had with one mind and confin made war and managed the affairs, so, albeit they were in divers parts far alunder, yet they k should meet in one place, and at one time make repair to the City of Rome; and that whether of them twaincame fift to Prenefte, he should there attend the coming of his Collegue. And it fortuned fo, that they arrived both upon one and the same day at Presuffe. From whence they fent an edict before, that the third day after the Senat should generally assemble together in the Temple of Bellona: and so they were met upon the way with a multitude of people, who accompanied them as they returned into the City. And they were not content all of them in generallto talute them and welcome them home, but every man was defirous particularly to take the Confus by their victorius right hands fome with congratulations, wishing them joy, others with thankgiving, acknowledging that by their good means and vertue the Commonweal was preferred and fet upright. Now when they had related in the Senat house (as the manner was of all Gene L fals) whar acts they had atchieved, and withall demanded, that for their valiant and faithful fervice to the Commonweal, first, due honour should be rendred to the almighty gods, and the they themselves allowed to enter the City in triumph: the I.I. of the Senar made aniwer, That they for their parts were ready and willing to consider first and principally of the ments and goodness of the gods, and next and immedially of the good deferts of the Confuls: and as they decreed divine processions and supplications in the name of them both, so they granted triumph, as well to the one as to the other. But the Confuls, because they would not divide their triumph (fince that they had managed the wars with one accord and common confent) thus agreed between themselves, That for aimuch as the battell was fought within the Province of M. Livius, and the very day of the field fought, ir fortuned to be his turn to take the fign of birds, and to have M the entire rule and belides, the army of Livins was brought back and came to Rome already, but that other of Nero could not be removed out of the Province: therefore M. Livius should ride in a chariot drawn with four fleeds into the City, with his fouldiers following after and C. Claudius presently come after mounted on horieback without his fouldiers. Thus the triumph was communicate to the one and the other, and encreased the glory of them both; but especially of him, who the more that he exceeded his Collegue in defert, the more he yielded and gave place umo him in honour. " Lo faid every man, be there on horseback travelled in fix daies space the whole "length of It. If from one end to the other, and tought the very fame day with banner diplated " against Afdribatin Gaul, when as Annibal thought verily be lay encamped against him within "army in Apulia, See how one and the same Consul, in the desence of the one part of Italy and N "the other, against two Caprains my, against two noble Generals of two agmies, in one placem-"ployed his advice and counseil, and in another opposed his body and force of arms. Behold (by "they) the very bare name of Nero was sufficient to keep Annibal within his camp; and what was "it elle, that difcomfited and defeated Afarubal, but even his only coming? Let the other Confinal percecof "ful therefore be fet up on high, and rid in a chariot drawn with as many horfes as hewill; all " while that the true triumph indeed passeth through the City upon one horse only, Nay, if New " went but on foot, he would be memorable for ever hereafter, as well for the refulall of glory in fourth part of "that triumph, as for the winning of honour in that war. With these and such like speechesthey Denoting ton entertained Nero asthey beheld him, and so accompanied him even to the very Capitoll. They brought into the Treature-house of the City in coin thirty hundred thousand Seffertii, and 0 hiliand is of 80000 Affes, Among the fouldiers, M. Living divided fix and fifty Affes to them spiece, And. English mo. Claudist promited as much to his fouldiers that were abient upon his return to the army. This mey three half was noted and observed in the triumph, that the fouldiers uttered more ditties and rimes full of proce farthing pleasant conceits and jeffs (as their manner was) upon C. Claudius than their own Contul and that the gentlemen and horsemen highly extolled and magnified above all the rest L.Vetwin, and Q. Ceeiliar the two Lieutenants, and exhorted the Commons to create them Confuls against the

Now the time drew near of election of new Magistrates; and when it was thought good by the Senat, that a Dictator should call that solemn attembly for the said election; C. Claudius the Contain nominated for Diffrator his Collegue, M. Leving, And Leving named Q. Co. 1 ar General of the horizonen. So there, were restated Containing, M. When thele elections was finished, the Dictarorhaving refigned up his office and difinished the army, by vertue of an act of the Senat took his journey into the Province of Tufcany to fit in commillion and make enquiry, what States either of the Tulcans or Umbrians intended and plotted to revoit from the Romans, and to turn to Afdrabal at his coming into those parts: and who they were that had affished him either with auxiliary fouldiers, or with victuals, or with any aid and help what foever. And these were the acts for that year, as well at home as abroad in the

The eight and twentieth Book of T. Livius.

The great Roman Games were wholly renned and fet out again three times by the Ediles of the chair (n. Servitus Gapia, and Serv. Cornelius Lentulus, Likewife the passines and plaies, called Plebeis, were once fully requied and exhibited again by M. Sempronius Matho, and Q. Manlins Thurmus Asi es of the Commons,

In the thiutagoth year of the second Punick war, when L. Veturius Philo, and Q. Cecilius Metely las were Consuls, both of them were appointed by the Senat to make war upon Annibal in the Province of the Brutis, Which done, the Prators cast lots: And to M. Cecilius Metellus fell the intidiction of the Civizen: to Q. Manting, of the forreiners, C. Servelius, his lot was to govern Sicily, and T. Chiudius Sardinia, As for the armies, they were divided in this manner-one of the Coninshad the conduct of that which was updes G Claudius the Confut of sits year before, The other Confut had the leading of that namely, two full legions) which G. Claudius the Pro-Pretor before D commanded, M. Livius as Pro-Comill, whole government, was prorogued for another year, received the charge of two legions of evoluntaries in Hitraria, at the hand of Ca Terentias the Pro-Prztor And Q. Manline was appointed by a decree of the Sanat to deliver over his jurisdiction to his Collegue, and to take the charge of Gallia with the lorges there i whate of U. Portion the Pro-Prator was Captain; and he had incommission to waste the lands of those Gauls who were revolted to the Carthaginians upon the coming of Afdrubalic Servilius Was allighed with the power of the two Cannian legions to defend Sicily, like as P. Manlins had before. Out of Sardinia the old army was withdrawn, which was under the governance of A. Hollidge: and the Confuls enrolled one new legion for T. Claudius to fail over with Quintus Claudius, and C. Hoft lins Tubilus, had both of them their commissions newly sealed for one year longer, the one to govern Tar n-E tum, and the other to rule Capua. Makalerius the Pro-Conful, who also was Admiral for the seacoast and river along Sicily, was commanded to give up thirty of his fail unto C. Scrailius, and withall the reft of the Navy to return to the City of Robe.

As the City was in sufpence and food doubtfull for the variable event of so great a war, attributing the causes of all, weal and woe, of prosperity and advertity to the gods a behold many prodigious tokens were reported to have hapned. Namely, That in Tarracina the Temple of Jupiter, and at Sarvicum the Chappel of the goddels Marura, were blatted with lightning from heaven, And the inhabitants of Sarricum were no less terrified with two lergents that were crept into the templeof Jupiter at the very doors. From Antium there was word brought, that the harvest folk as they were reaping spied certain ears of corn bloudy. At Care there was a sow that farrowed a pig with two heads, and an eaw yeared a lamb both male and female. It was reported alfo, that at Albathere were two funs feen: and at Fregella by night the day-light appeared. Also in the territory of Rome, by report, an Oxe spake: and the altar of Nepsune within the Cirke Flaminia brake out into much sweat: and the Temples of Ceres, Salus, and Quirinus were blasted and smitten from heaven. The Confuls were commanded to expiate and purge these fearfull fights with sacrificing of greater beafts and to make supplication one day. Which was done according to the degree of the senar. But above all the wondrous figns, either reported from abroad, or feen at home, the minds of men were put in fear, for the going out of the fire in the Chappell of Vefta, For which cause the Vestall Viggin who had the charge that night to look unto it, was by the commandment of P. Lieinius the Bishop well and throughly sourged. And albeit this hapned by humane negligence, and that the gods portended nothing thereby, yet it was thought good that an expiationthereof should be made with greater sacrifices, and a solemn supplication held in the Chappel

Before that the Confuls went forth to the wars, they were put in mind by the Senat to take regard and order for the Commons, and to procure their reducing again into the country, and placing them in their lands, and farms. For feeing that by Gods goodness the war was removed far from Rome and Latium, the country towns might be without fear of danger inhabited and fre-Quented again: neither wasit a meet thing, that they should have more care to inhabit Sigily than

Italy. But the matter was not easily to be compassed and effected by the people, for that many of the free-holders were confumed up in the wars: and great fearcity there was of servants and huses to till the ground - besides, the cattell was driven away in booties, and the manor house were either ruinate or burned. Howbeit, a great fort were compelled by the authority of the Consuls to repaire again into their country habitations. The motion hereof was fish cocasioned by the Embassadors of Placentia and Cremona; who made complaint, that their territories were much Embassadors of Placentia and Cremona; who made complaint, that their territories were med ammissed and wasted by the incursions and rodes of the Gauls their next neighbours bordering upon them: and that many of their own natural inhabitants were fled and gone away, so as their upon them: and that many of their own natural inhabitants were fled and gone away, so as their proposed of the control of the contro

Q. Cecilius the Col, received the army of Cl, Nero: and L. Veturius of Q. Claudius the Pro-Piztor, and made up the full number of all the companies with those new fouldiers whom he himfelf had enrolled. The Confuls led their army into the territory of Confentia, and having forraged and spoiled here and there, and being heavily laden with good booties, they were in a narrow and fireight passage much troubled by the Brutit and the Numidian archers : infomuch as not only their prizes: were in danger to be loft, but they themselves that were armed in some jeopardy. Howbeit, the alarm was greater than the skirmish, and the booty being fent before, the legionsefcaped fafe into places of fecurity. And fo from thence they went into the Lucans country. All that K nation without any fight returned under the obedience of the Roman Empire. With Annibal that year was nothing done: for neither he himself made offer of war, upon the fresh hurt and loss received as well in publike as private, nor the Romans provoked him as long as he was quier, For they were all of this judgment, that there was such metall and valour in that one commander, although all things else about him went to wrack, that they held it no good policy to provoke him, and wake a sleeping dog. And verily I wot not what to make of him; whether he were more to be wondred at in advertity than in professive. For why? warring as he did in his enemies land for the space of thirteen years to far from home, in much variety of fortune, with an army not confisting of naturall Citizens and subjects, but mingled of a confused riff-raff-and medley of all nations; having neither the same laws, nor manners; and customes, nor language; diffe- L ring in falhions, in habit, in apparell, in armour, in rires, in religion, nor ferving, as it werethe fame gods: he had to knit and united them in one link and freight band, that they mutined mither among themselves, nor against their Generall, notwithlanding oftentimes there wanted money for pay, and victuals in their enemies country : for defailt whereof, in the former Punick war, many outrages were committed both among Captains and fouldiers. But when Afdrabal the Captain together with his army was defeated and overthrown, in whom they repoted all their hopes of victory, and when they were fain to quart, as it were, all train befides, andtoreire themselves into an angle and corner of Brutium; who would not think it a marvellous matter, that there was no ftir nor commotion in his Camp? confidering that over and besides all other difficulties, he had no means nor hope else to maintain his army, but out of the Brutianscoun-M try; And say, that it were all wholly tilled, sowed, and well husbanded, yet a small thing it was to find and feed so huge an host. Moreover, a great part of their youth was fer away from the tillage of the fields and grounds, and wholy employed in warfare: to fay nothing of the natural guile and corrupt usage of that nation, which in time of war was wont to live and maintain the same by robbing and thieving. Neither had he any succour at all sent from home out of Canhage whiles they all were fludious and carefull only to keep Spain, as if all had gone well with them

In Stain, the fortune was in some respect all one and the same, in other farunlike and different the same, in regard that the Carthaginians being defeated in a sought field, and having lottheir Captains, were drivented the utmost coast of Spains, even as far as the Ocean sea: different, in that N Spains is a country more apt and commodious to the reparation of new war, not only than sub, but also than any land in the world, as well for the site of the region, as for the nature of the people. For although it were the first nation of all the main and continent, that the Romass went sittle in hand withall to reduce into the nature of a Province; yet it was the last of all others that was subdued, and but lately if our daies even under the condect and happy fortune of Angels wars (next after the Barchin house) returned from Gades; and hoping by the help of Mage the son of Amilear, to wage war aftest, took musters throughout the farther part of Spains, and amed to the number of first thousand soot, and 4500 horse. And as for the Cavalry, all writers in manner do agree: but for the Infantry, some write, there were 70000 brought unto the City silpid. There upon the open plains sate these two Carthaginian Captains down, because they wouldnot seem to fall off and resulte battell.

Scipio, when news came unto him of to putifiant an army levied, supposed that neither with the Roman legions he was sufficient to match such a multitude, unless he opposed the aids of the Barbarous nations, if it were no more but for shew and outward appearance more yet was to repole such affured consideric in them, as in the sundamental strength of his army, that in case they

A fould give him the illip when the time came, (the only occasion of the overthrow of his father and nucle) they might do much hurt to the main chance and totall fum of all, And therefore he and unter splanns before unto Colcius, (a Lord over the fignory of eight and twenty towns) for to receive ofhim those horse and foot which he had promised to sevy in the winter time. Himself departed from Taracon, and gathered fome small aids of his allies that inhabit along the way as he marched, and fo came to Caffulo. Thither Syllanas brought also certain auxiliaries to the number of three and foot, and five hundred horse. From thence he went forward to the City Batula, being in all of Citizens and Allies, with footmen & horiemen together, one with another 4500c ftrong. from Asthey were pitching their tents and encamping, Mago and Mafaniffe, with all their Ca-B valry fet upon them: and no doubt, had troubled them mightily as they were making their defen, es, but that certain troops of horsemen hidden behind an Hill, whom Scipe of thy for the purpolehad there bestowed, juddenly at unawates ran upon them and recharged them as they were loolely ridden forward without order and array. There had not well begun skirmish with them, but they discomitted the forwardelt of them, and fuch especially as engaged themselves near to the trench, to impeach and annoy the pioneers and labouters at work: but with the rest that kept to their colours, and went orderly in their ranks, the fight was longer, and for a good while continued doubtivil. Bur when the iquadrons which thood ready appointed in their guards and stations, were fift brought forth; aid after them, the fouldiers also from their work and fortifications werewilled to take arms; and fill more and more continually came fresh and in heart, in place C of those that were wearied, so as now from all parts of the Camp there was gathered together a full power, and ran to the battel, then the Carthaginians and Numidians turned their backs plain and fled, And at the first they went away by troops and companies keeping their order and array fiil, and not disbanded for hatte or fear. But afterwards, when the Romans began once mote eagerly to play upon the hindmost of them, so as now their furious violence could no longer be refiled then without all regard of ranks or files they forgot their array, and ran on all hands by heaps, feeking every man the next way he could to eleape. And albeit by this skirmish, the Romans weremoieen ouraged a good deal, and the enemies hearts much danted: yet for certain daies enfing therenever ceafed excursions and bickerings maintained by the horsemen & those that were lightly armed. Now when by their small scufflings they had made sufficient triall on both sides of D therefrength, Aldreb at first led forth his forces into the field, & then the Romans like wife came forward ready to receive them. But when both armies flood without their Camp, arranged in batter array & neither of them gave the charge: when the day drew toward fun-letting, Afdrubal first refued with his men into the Camp, and after him the Roman General likewise. Thus continued they for certain daies together. Afdrubal was evermore the first that came abroad, and the first again that sounded the retreat to his souldiers, wearied with long standing. But of neither side they made out to skirmish, or discharged any shot, or gave alarms, and set up a cry. Of the one part the Romans, on the other the Carthaginians, together with the Africans flood in the main battel: and the allies of either fide kept the wings, and those were Spaniards, as well in the one army as the other, But in the front of the Carthaginian battel were the Elephants placed, who afar off made a E shew as if they had been Castles. And throughout both armies this word went for current, that when the time came, they would so fight as they stood day by day arranged : namely, that the main battels of the Romans and Carthaginians, between whom was the quarrel & occasion of the wat, with like courage of heart and force of arms would en ounter and cope together, Scipio perceiving this once to go for good, & to be flifly fetled in their opinions, altered all on fet purpole against the day that he minded indeed to give battel. And over-night he gave a watch-word and tokenthroughout the camp, that both horse and man should take their dinner before day, and that the horsemen in arms ready appointed should hold their horses sadled and bridled, Now beforcit was broad day light he fent out all the Cavalry together with the light armour, to charge monthe Corps de guard and standing watch of the enemies. And himself straight after advanced forward with the whole strength of the legions armed at all pieces. And clean contrary to the conceived opinion and perswahon both of his own men, and also of his enemies he strengthened the wings with Romans, and marshalled the main battell with the allies. Asdrubal railed with theclamour and shour of the horsemen, leapt torth of his pavilion, and perceiving a tumultuous alarm and tearfull fir of his own men before the rampiar and trench, and feeing afar off the glitteing enfighs of the Legions, and all the plains over-spread with enemies, presently made forth allhis Cavairy against the foresaid horsemen. Himself with the battell of foo men issueth out of the Camp, and made no change nor alteration at all in the marshalling of the battaillons, otherwife than he used the dries past. The horsemen continued the fight a long time doubtfully: neither could it be determined by it felf, because evermore, as any of them were put back (which happed on both parts in manner by turns) they retired lately into the batteli of footmen. Now when as the battels were not past half a mile afunder one from another. Soipio founded the retreat, and opened his ranks; and received alithe horiemen and light armed foundiers within the middle ward; and having divided them in two regiments, he bestowed them for succours and furplies behind the wings. Now when the time was come to joyn in skitmish, he commanded the Spaniards (and those were the main battell) to take fure footing and so steel dily together: fair and foftly himself out of the fight wing (for, that point he commanded) dispatched a messenger to Sydanus & Martins, willing them to firetch out that wing on the left hand, like as they faw

him to draw it at length on the right : with direction also unto them, that they together with the n light horiemen and light appointed footmen should encounter and close with the enemy, before that both battels might meet and joyn together. Thus having enlarged out at full their wines, they with three iquadrons of footmen, and as many cornets of horiemen, together with the light armed skirmishers, advanced with full pace directly afront the enemies whiles the rest followed fidewaies across. Now there was a void piece of ground in the midst between, by reason that the Spaniards enrights went but flowly forward: and the wings had been in conflict already, when the flower and strength of the enemies battell, consisting of old beaten Carthaginians and Affrican fouldiers, were not yet come within the darts shor, neither durst they put in to succourthem than were in fight, for fear they should open the main battell for the enemy that came directly against them. Their wings were much diffressed in the fight on every side : For the horiemen, the light atmed fouldiers, and the skirmishers, having wheeled about and fet a compass to environ them tan upon them on their flanks. The cohorts of footmen charged upon them afront, and all to break of their wings from the body of the battell. And as now in every respect the fight was unequal, to the rabble of camp-followers, Balear Islanders, and raw untrained Spaniards, opposed against the approved Roman and Latine fouldiers, pulled down afide. The day went on ftill, and Afdrubalhis army began to faint : and no marvell, for they were surprised and taken on a sudden, betimes in the morning. & were forced in hafte to enter into the field & go to battel before they had refreshed and firengthened their bodies. And to that purpose Scipio had drawn the day on length, & triffed out the time, that the battel might be late. For it was the leventh hour or one a clock after poor before the enfign of footmen charged upon the fide points. And a good deal later it was erethe K main battels fought and joyned together: fo that the heat of the noon fun, the pain of long flanding in armor, and hunger and thirst came all together to enfeeble and spend their bodies, before that they came to hand-ftrokes and to buckle with their enemies: which was the cause that they flood leaning and resting themselves upon their shields. And over and besides all other troubles, the Elephants also affrighted and madded with this tumultuous and disordered manner of fight of horiemen, skirmifhers, and light armed fouldiers together, ran from the wings, upon the mainbattel. The Captains therefore themselves, being thus tainted, as well in courage of heart, as in hodi. ly firength, gave ground and retreated. How beit they fill kept their arraies, as if the whole battel had retired whole and found by the commandment of their General. But when the winners and conquerers on the other part were fo much more forward to charge upon them more holy on L every fide, because they saw them to lose their ground and shrink back, so as their violence could not well be endured; then albeit Astrabal held them still together, and did what he could to star as the same of the same o their flight, crying oftentimes aloud unto them, that there were hills behind them, and places of fafe retreat, if they would retire in good fort, moderately, and in order; yet when they faw their enemies press so hard upon them, killing and hewing in pieces those that were next unto them. fear was above shame, and so immediatly they shewed their back parts, and ran away all at once as fast as they could. Yet at first, when they came to the root and foot of the hils they began to make a stand, and rally the souldiers again into order of battel, seeing the Romans to make some stay of advancing their ensigns up the hill. But afterwards, when they perceived them to come lustily forward, they began again to flie afresh, and so in sear were forced to take their Camp, M Neither was Scipio himselffar from their trench and rampier, but in that very brunt had been mafler thereof, but that immediatly upon the hot gleams of the fun, when he shineth in a watery sky full of black and rainy clouds, there powred down such a store of showers and tempelts, that hardly could he himself after his victory recover his own camp. And some there were also that made it a scruple and matter of conscience to attempt any more for that day, The Carthaginians, although they had great reason to repose themselves, and take their necessary rest, so wearied as they were with travell, and fore wounded, especially seeing the night was come, and the slowly rain continued: yet, because their sear and present danger wherein they stood gave them notime to loyter and flack their business, against the next morning that the enemies should early assail their Camp, they gathered up stones from out of the vallies near about them, and pilingthem N one upon another, amended the heighth of their rampier, purpoling to defend themselves by the strength of their fence, seeing small help and remedy in sorce of arms. But the falling away of their Confederats was the cause that their departure and flight from thence, seemed more sale than their abode there would have been. This revolt was begun by Altanes, a great Lord of the Turdetans: for he with a great power of his followers and retainers fled from the Carthaginians to the adverle part. Whereupon two firong walled towns, together with their garrisons, were vielded by the Captains unto Scipio. Afdrubal therefore, fearing least this mischief might spreadirther, now that their minds were once fer upon rebellion, dislodged about the midnight following, and removed. Scipio to toon as he was advertised at the break of the day, by those that kept flanding watch in their stations, that the enemies were gone; having tent his hortemen before O commanded the standards and ensigns to be advanced, and led to speedy a march, toat if they had gone straight forward and sollowed their tracks directly they had no doubt overtaken them: but believing certain guides, that there was a shorter way to the river Baris. they were added to charge upon them as they passed over. But Astrabal seeing the passage of the riverstopped against him turned to the Ocean: and even at the first they departed in great halte, as if they fled, which was the cause that they got the start of the Roman legionary footmen, and won a good fixe of ground before them. But the horiemen, and light appointed footmen, plaied one while part by this means with charging and recharging they weatied them and staied their march; And when as upon many of their troubles by the way, their enfigns were fain to fland, and forced to maintain skirmish, some time with the horsemeniand for times with the light javelottiers and auxiliary footmen behold the legions also came orange and overtook them. Then there was not fo much fighting and refiftance, as maffacte and faughter of them: down they went with them and killed them like sheep, solong, until their Reader himself began to flie, and escaped into the next mountains, together with 7000 half naked and unartited. All the rest were either slain or taken priloners. Then the Carthaginians began to 8 encamp and fortifie in all hafte and tumultuous fort upon the highest mount they could find: from whence (by reasonthat the enemies had affaied in vain to get up the hill, having so difficult an aren'they had not formuch ado to defend themselves. But, the place being bare and naked, and distintified of all commodities for their reliefe, they were not able to hold out the sege for afewdies. And thereupon the fouldiers fell apace to for lake their own Captain, and to go to the clemy. So that at the length the General himself in the night season abandoned his army, and having got thipping (for the fea was nor far off) he embarked and fled to Gades, Scipto being advertized that the Captain of his enemies was fled, left with Syllanus ten thouland footmen, and a thousand horsemen to continue the fiege of the Camp, Himself in person with the rest of his force within seventy daies returned to Taracon, for to examine and hear incontinently upon his Canvell the causes of the Princes and States: that upon the true estimate of their deserts they might be rewarded or chastiled accordingly

After his departure, Majanifa having had secret conference with Syllanus, about inducing his people allo to be pliable and to hearken unto a change, passed over into Affrick with some imale retine, At which present time verily the occasion of his sudden alteration was not to evident and apparant, as afterwards his most constant truth and fast alleageance observed unto his dying day was a good proof and argument, that even then he entred not into this defignment and action, without good and important cause. Then Mago, in those ships that Aldrub. I had sent back, palled over to Gades. The remnant, thus fortorn of their Captains, tome by way of voluntary yielding and ranging themselves to the adverse part, others by flight, were scattered among the next Cities, and no troop remained of them behind of any mark and reckoning to ipeak of, either for number or Brength. In this manner and by these means especially were the Carthaginians drivers all out of Spain, by the conduct and happy fortune of P. Seipio, in the thirteenth year of the war, and in the fixth of Scipio his government in that Province and command of the army. And not long diet Syllange returned to Taracon unito Scripio, and brought word that the war in Spain was fully aded. And L. Scripio was feit with many noble perious captives; as a messenger to carry tidings to some of the conquest of Spain. And when all order took fol contentment and infinite joy at the news, and abroad in all places highly magnified the glory of this service, he alone who was the man that did the deed (as one who had an infatiable defire of vertue and true honour) made but finall reckoning of the recovery and winning of Spain, in comparison of those matters E that he hoped for, and conceived in that thigh and magnanimous spirit of his, which he carried with him, For now he cast in mind and aimed at the conquest of Affrick and great Carthage: and therewith, to make perfect and confummate that glorious war to his own immortall honour and renown. And therfore supposing it was now a good time to begin the way to those high exploits, atid to lay plots, to prepare aforehand, yea, and to win unto him the hearts of the Princes and nations, he determined first of all other to found and assay King Syphax. This Syphax was King of the Majajili, a people bordering upon the Moors, and abutting upon that part of Spain effecially where new Carehage is fituate. At the fame time the King was in league with the Carthaginalis: which Scipio supposing that he would observe no more surely and precisely, than commonly the Barbarians tile, (whole fidelity dependent upon Fortune) ferit C. Lelius with rich gilisand prefents, as an Otator to rreat with him. The barbarous Prince was glad hereof, both becaule the Romans then prospered every where; and also the Carthaginians in Italy lived by the loss and in Spain went down to the ground, where they had nothing lett and thereupon he condescended to entertain the friendship of the Romans. But for the confirmation of this amity, he neither would give not take affurance, but only in the personal presence of the Roman Genetallhimfelf. So Latius having obtained the Kings royall word and warrant that Scipio might come with high with fale conduct and fecurity, returned unto Scipio. Now for him that aspired to the compute of Affrick it was a marrier of great confequence and importance in all respects to make hinder live of Syphat, the most mighty and pursuant King of all that Land, who had aforetime mide proof what the Carthaginians could do in war, and the confines and marches of whole kingdom lay ficly upon Spain, and but a finall arm of the lea between Scipio thinking it therefore to G be a matter worth the adventure with great hazard, (for otherwise it might not be) leaving for the delence and guard of Spain L. Marrius at Taracon, and M. Syllanus at new Carthage, (whether he had travelled by land from Taracon, and taken great journies) himself and Lalins together, loofed from Carthage with two great Carvels of five batiks of bars, and palled over into Affrick, through the calm and ftill fea, most of all rowing, and otherwhile also making fail with a gentle

Haply it to fell out that the very fame time Afdrubal, driven out of Spain, was entred the haven with seven gallies of three course of oars, and rid at anchor near unto the shore for to be set H a land. When he had a kenning of the two Carvels aforefaid, which albeit no man doubted but they were enemies, and might have been boorded by them being more in number, before they could gain the rode; yet hereupon enfued nothing elle but a tumult and hurry among the mariners and fouldiers together, in vain preparation of their ships and their armour. For the wind being somewhat big and high drave the Carvels with full fail out of the main sea into the haven before that the Carthaginians had any time to weigh anchor: neither durst any of them proceed to further dealing within the Kings Rode. So Afdrubal first fet a shore, and within a while Scipio and Lalim landed, and went all to the Court. Syphax took this for a great honour done unto him (as indeed it was no leis) that there were come to him at that time, and in one day two Generall Captains of two most mighty and puissant States, to lue for peace and amity with him, Heinri-I ted both of them friendly, and gave them entertainment: and fince it was their fortune to enter under one roof and the same house for to be lodged in, he endeavoured to draw them to a parley, and to make an end of all quarrels, grudges, and controversies between them. But Scipio denied flatly, that either there was any private malice or hatred between him and Afdraid, that should " need an end with conference and speech : and as for State-matters, he might not treat with a or professed enemy as touching them, without express warrant and commission from the Senate. But when the King laboured greatly with him, that he would find in his heart and not think much to bear Afdrubal company at meat and meal (because he would not seem to exclude either of them from his boord, he yielded thereunto, and was content, So they supped both twain together with the King, and Scipio and Afdrubal late both at one table in one mels, and upon one bed, for K fo it was the Kings pleasure. But so courteously Scipio behaved himself (as he was a man that naturally knew how to carry himself with a grace and dexterity in all things, and in every place wherefoever hecame) that by his fair language and eloquent speech, he won not only the favour of the barbarous Prince Syphax (who before was not acquainted with the Roman fashions) but also the good will and love of Asarabal, a most malicious and mortall enemy: who seemed to have him in more admiration upon this one meeting and communication in presence personals, than for all his feats of arms atchieved in war, and made no doubt but reckoned fully that King Syphax and his Realm would presently be at the devotion of the Empire of Rome. Such a hogular gift had that man to win love and favour. And therefore the Carthaginians were not to minh to leek how Spain was loft, as to confider and think how they might keep and hold Affrid. For I thus they conceived, That this noble Knight and worthy Roman Captain was not come thither wandring at a venture, nor as a traveller to see countries, and to solace himself with walking along the pleasant and delectable coasts, leaving the Province which he had newly subdued, seaving his armies which he commanded, failing thus with two ships only into Affrick, and committing himfelf unto an enemy country, and into a Kings hands, of whose fidelity and protection he bad no experience: but no doubt upon some great hopes to compaisthe conquest of Affrick. And this was it that long fine Scipio had in fecret purpole and delignment, this was it that openly hefiteted and stormed at, namely that he warred not himself as well in Spain, as Annibal in Italy, Well, Se po having concluded a league with Syphax, departed out of Affinick; and notwithstandinghe was toffed upon the fea with variable winds, and those for the most part boisterous and raging yetup M on the fourth day he arrived at New Carthage.

As Spain generally was at peace and rest for any Carthaginian war, so it was well known that certain particular States, in regard that they were touched with the guilt of trespasses committed, were quiet for fear, rather than for any loyalt alleageance. Of which the most notorious, as well for their own greatness and power, as for their fault and transgression, were Illiturgum and Castulo. The Castulonians had been Roman Confederates in time of prosperity, were revolted unto the Carthaginians, upon the defeat of the two Scipios and their armies. The Illiturgians beides their revolt and rebellion, added this wickedness, in that they betraied and murdered the Romans who fled unto them for succour after that overthrow. These two nations, it Scipio at his first coming had proceeded in rigour to revenge (whiles the States of the country stood in [16]. N pense)he should have regarded their desert more than his own good and commodity. But when all troubles were composed and reduced to quietness, he thought it then a convenient timetopunish and chastise them accordingly. And therefore he called L. Martin from Taracon, wath ? third part of his forces, and fent him to affail Ceftulo. Himself with the rest of the armymanhed toward Illiangum, and within five daies presented himself before it. The gates he found shuragainst him, and all preparation and furniture for defence and to withstand the assault. For their conscience bare them witness what they had deserved, and there needed no other desiance of intimation of war against them than the privity of their wicked fact. Hereupon Scipio took occasion on to exhort his fouldiers, and began in this wife. "The very Spaniards themselves, quoth be by " futting their gates declare plainly what they justly are to fear: and therefore ye ought towa?
" with them in more hossile malice and deadly hatred than with the Catthaginians. For with "them the quarrel was maintained, as it were, without anger and rankor, only for foveraighty and " glory: but of these men ye are to take vengeance for their disloyall treachery, for their (niely) "and wicked villany. And now the time is come, to revenge not only the unworthy death of "your fellow fouldiers, but also the like falshood prepared for your selves, in case your haphid been to have fled for refuge thither at any time : yea, and to flew exemplary juffice, to teach all

A pollerity, that no man hereafter be to heady as to wrong any Citizen or fouldier of Rome, in what poor elate to ever ne be, without feat of condign punishment. Upon this exhortation and form-fortable words of the Generall, they bestirred themselves and divided the scaling ladders whought choile men out of every company. And having to parted the army between them; that Ballow the Lieutenant had the conduct of the one half, they gave affault with great terrour unto the Orly in in two places at once. But neither any one generall captain, nor many principall Ciffz ensencoursed and heartned the townsmen manfully to defend their City, but only their own tearful & finfull conicience: for they will well and remembred, yea, and put one another in mind, that it was their punishment and not victory that the Romans lought for. And as for themselves, since they were soloin their lives, this was the only point that they were to confider upon, namely, where B they were nell to die, whether in fight and in the field where the fortune of battall was common. and offentimes lifted up the conquered, and put down the conqueror) or after their City burnt and taled, to yeeld up breath in the fight of their wives and children taken exprives amid the torment of whipping and hard irons, when they had endured all villanies and indignities. Whereapon potoply the terriceable youth for war, not only men I fay, but women also and children, erenabove the bodily strength of that age, of courage of that fex, were ready and presented themselves to defend the wals. Some brought weapons to the defendants, offices carried stones up to the well muto them that were fortifying and repairing the breaches. For why? they flood not upon their liberty, alone, which whetterh the stomacks of valuant & magnanimous men only, but they clet befores heir eies alle xuremities of torture and punishment, yea, and the shamefullest death that that could us deviled wand their hearts were incented to undergo all pains and peril, by littiving svietogether, and seeing one another to hazard themselves. In so much asthey stood to it, and fought agenolately, that even that noble army which had subdued all Spain, took the repulle often times an shaihands of the youth of one City, was driven from the wals, and finally to their honor received louic foil in fight and began to test. Seipie feeing that, and doubting left upon to many bools feeting the the defention might take heart and his own fouldiers be takened, thought good to enter himself personallycanto the action, and to take pare in that dangerous service. Having rebulk districtore his men for their cowardile, he commanded the ludders to be brought and fer to, threwaps that himself would scale the wals, if the rest made halting and thur drow back. With Dibility made somere ado, but approached under the wals in great peril of his perion. Whereith on the indicates respecting the dangerous state of their General, and fearing greatly of his behalf, see any places at the control of their General and fearing greatly of his behalf, see any places at the control of the fill wife. so therein ale plied the affault and gave not over. Then at last the rownfmen, for all their relouse gellimes, were corridone; the defendants overthrown and beaten from their flanding, and the walk polled lead up the griemies. The caltle also on that side which was thought impregnable. was in the hornitand rumnit taken. For there were certain Africans ferling then among the Romans (fled before the enemy) who whiles the townsmen were wholy turned to desend thoughtes that leemed to be exposed unto danger, and the Romans climbing and entring where they could apied one part of the City much higher then the reft ; which because it was compassed E the with an exceeding high rock, was neither fortified otherwife with bulwarks, nor minned with professed antennal and being men (as they all are) light and agill of body, and himble by resign as much practice and exercite; they climed up the rock where they could meet with a ny sugression bear our unequally from the reft, and to yeeld them hold and footing : but when they came to a plamb upright freep place, and where the cliff was even and imooth, they failined centain great from fpikes and nailes, which they caried about with them of purpole, and frack them aprety diffrance atunder, like greeces and frairs to climb upon and ever the formost pluckt him up by the hand that followed mext, and the hindmost heaved up those that went before them, untill they were gotten up to the top; and then they ran down with an outery fitto the City, which was already won by the Romans. Then it was well feen that they forced this City from very de-Epiteons anger and deep hatred. There was no thought of taking any priloners alive, there was nonedbattonce minded any pillage, norwithftanding all lay open unto them for to be ranjacked and rifled. But down they went with the anarmed as well as the armed, killed men and women one with another; nay, their cruell mood was such, as they spared not the sucking babes. Then they jet fire on their houses; and what the fire laved they rafed and pulled down; to cancred a mind they had, and to bent they were, to leave no monument and token of flich a City, and atterly to sholith and root out the memoriall of thote enemies.

The eight and twentieth Book of T. Livius.

Allershis, Scipic led his army against Coffulo. This City was defended not only by Spaniards who thinks, were repaired out of others parts, but also by the reliques of the Carthaginian army which were feattred abroad in their flight) and thither fled. But ere Sciple was come before the G townshey had heard the newes of the world calamity and defirm tion of the Hiturgians; by reafon whereof they were all terrified and in delpaire of themselves; and as it falleth out it finch was tier, eleanics and deferts every man fought means to flife for himlelf the belt he could, without regard of his neighbour. And at first they began to have a feeret jelousie and inspition one of another hus a ter wards they brake out to open diffention a informach as the Carthaginians and Spahards divided themielves, and parted afunder. Cordubellis openly adviced the Spaniards, and buwaded with them, to yeeld. Himiles was the Captain over the Auxiliary Carthaginians, I proprieta de la constanção B 66

whom Cordibolise (upon promite fecrety before made and protection granted) betraied, together with the whole City befides, into the Romans hands. This victory was purised with left cutlety: for neither was the offence on their behalt committed to believe; and the best and choice of the Romans was well cooled and allaied, by reason of their voluntary furrender. From these was Marrine lent against others of the barbasons people, to reduce unto subjection and obedience, as many as yet were not fully lubdued.

Stiple returned to new Carthage to pay his vowes unto the gods, and to exhibit and fet out a spect cle of sword-plaines at sharp, which he had prepared for the honor of his father and mode dece led. This paltings and tolemn thew was not performed by those kind of men, out of which mafters of fence ate ordinarily to make choice, namely, such as were picked out of bondflaves and freed men, that use to make sale of their bloud for mony, but all those that he imploied in combat, were such as officed themselves and their service woluntary and without hire. For some were fent unto him from the LL of the country, to make thew & proof of the valour ingraffed namedly in that nation; others of their own accord professed to fight, for the love of the General himfelf, and to thew him pleasure : and tome there were again, who upon emulation of glory were drawn to m. ke challenge, whiles others that were defyed refused not, but strove to get the withing.

There were also divers that determined those controverses by the tword, which by arguing & pleading they cuber were not able or not willing to end : having agreed among themselves that the matter in fuit fhould fall to him that chanced to have the upper hand. And those were no mean perions of bale degree and parentage, but of noble defeent and famous houses : as namely, mean persons or one page any parties of germans by the father fide; who differing and being of Corbis and Orfine, two * [brethren] coulin germans by the father fide; who differing and being the control of the contro at v. riance, about a principality of a City and State which they call Ibes, made profession to the the title at the utterance by dint of (word. Carbis was the elder of the twain; but Orfica his ta ther had been the laft Prince before, and received that Seignory after the death of his elderbother, And when Seigle was very defirous to debate and decide the matter with words, and to popule, their anger and mood, they both made antiwer and faid, that they had denied to the canmon kinsfolk of cither party, and that they would have no other god nor man to be their judge but only Mars. Both of them were fierca ; the elder prejuming of his fleength of body, the yonger bearing him jeff upon the flour of his fresh youth, withing rather to die both twinin fight, then the one mose subject to the dominion of the other. In conclusion when by no means possible they could be reglaimed from this furious rage of theirs, they became a goodly fleward pageant to the whole army, and a fingular example to prove what a milchievous malady among mortal men, the love of lordship is, and the defire of foversignty. The elder, through predilect his weapons and cumping flight, foon overcame the foolbardinesse and inconsiderat flercenes of the youger. After this paltime of the fword-fight, followed the funerall games and plaies which were fet south magnificently, according as gither the wealth of the province, or the furniture of the art

my might afford.
In this mean time, the Licutenants plied and sped their business nevertheless, secondagio pipillions : for Martin having palled the river Ratis (which the pealants of that comtry called Circine) received two most rich and worthy Cities, surrendred into their hands by compolition, without any Mault. Now, there was another Citymalled Aftapa, which everfided with the Carthaginians : and yet it deferved not to much anger and indignation in that regard, asfor that (letting slide the necessities that follow war) it ever bare a spiteful butred against the Romans : neither was the town either for natural! fitu tion fo ftrongly fe ted, or by manthand for furely fortified, that the inhabitants therein should take more heart, or presume the rather to be let fty and hold. But the natural disposition of the people delighting in robberies, moved them to mile rodes and invade the territory of the allies of the people of Rome ordering upon them: and w catch and take prilong is any louldiers, foullions, lackies, and followers of the camp, or merchini of the Romans, whom they could light upon ranging abroad. Yea, and when there hapned agree company of them together, to passe through their muches and confines, (for in no wife might a ? sew travel in inferty), they were furprised by an ambushment laid for them, and being environed if N a place of disduantage, were than every man. When the army was come before this town of table it, the rowning a guilty conference for offences committed, thought a not the later. felt courie for themselves, to yeeld and give up the place to the enemies whom they had formed provoked against them, and seeing no hope at all to sweetheir lives, cither by the strength of their wals, or force of arms, they relolved to execute upon themselves, and those things that wanterest and decrest unto them; a foul, detestable, and cruell tack. They let out and appointed a compale or groups, within the market place, when they believed and laid-one heap the most precious copies that they had, Upon which they commended their wive, and children to fir, and the copy place about the heap bliers of wood, and ledd fagous appon, of mail young wige. And after this they give in charges of far, luft yell, fellows a rand that fo long as the batted continued doubthil of they give in charges of far, luft yell, fellows a rand that fo long as the batted continued doubthil of they give in the part of the continued doubthil of "then all the goods, in the world t but in cale they perceived their own fide to goe down and " have the worle, and the City at the point to be loft, they should then wor well and be affect " that all they whom they faw going forthto battell, would furely lote their lives in that very hight and aktimith. And here with they belonget them in the name of the gods both to last and infernall, to be mindfull of their liberty, which that day was to take an ead,

A " either by honourable death or shamefull fervitude : and to suffer nothing to remain, upon which "the enemy in his furious anger might excercise his cruelty: & confidering they had both fire and "Iword in their hands to do the deed, to let thole friendly and faithful hands confume and dispatch "the things which were fare to be loft and perifh, rather then the proud enemies infult over them uand mak a form of them. To these exhotations they adjoyned a fearfull and horrible curle, to as many as either for hope of life, or upon timorousuels of heart & fear of death, should alter their mind and refolution. Whereupon all at once they rushed out of the gates fet wide open, and with a mighty tumult and shout, made a fally. Now there was no set guard and station of any force oppoled to refilt them, because the enemies feared nothing lesse, then that they durit once iffue forth of the gates. Some few toops of horse and the light armour, of a suddain were sent out of the B camp to make head, and they encount ed them. Between whom there was a skirmish hotter and sharper in regard of courage and violence, then ordered by any skill and good government. And therefore the horimen were discomfitted, that first presented themselves against the enemy, yea,& put the light armed footmen also in great fear. And furely they had proceeded to have tought even under the very rampiar, but that the main (trength of the legions, who had but very small time to be marshalled and arranged, put themselves in array and came into the field. And yet for all that, they were diffressed for a while about the ensigns, by reason that they ran as blind mad men in their furious fit & as bold as witheffe fools for want of fence, even upon the fword and their own deaths. But afterwards, the old experienced fouldiers, having flifly flood out against the first rash brune and violent thock of the enemies, yes, and killed the formost, bridled and stated the rage of those C that feconded them: and when they affajed with in a while after, to enter forward themfelves & break in upon them, & law none of them to give one toot of ground, but every one resolute to die in the very place where he ftood, they opened their battell in the mids (a thing that they might eafily do, confidering the auditude of the fouldiers) compafied and environed the wings of their enemies, who fighting round in a ring, unto the last man were flain every one. Thus were they that were in aims and or ade refiltance manipully dealt withall by their enemics according to the rigor of war, and in the angry mood of fouldiers; and fuch was their end. But within the City there was topler work, and a more cruell butchery and flaughter committed, when the feeble unarmed and naked multitude of women and children were murdred by their own neighbours and citizens, who having let the forelaid pile of wood on fire, fell to maffacre them, and flung their bodies when D they were but half dead, into the light fire under them; fo as their streams of bloud gushing out of their venus, were ready to quench the flame beginning to break forth. And in the end, when they themselves were even wearied with the pittifull flaughter, of their own friends, they cast themicives armour and all into the migs of the faid fire. When this matirace was done and ended. the Romans entred the City with victory. And at the first fight of this monstrous object, they wondied for a while and stood astonied. But afterwards when they saw the gold and silver glittering within the heap among others goods, they were ready and defirous (as the nature of man is greedy of fuch things) to rake and pull the fame out of the fire : out some of them were caught with the flaine and burnt; others flashed and balf singed with the hot steam of the vapour and breath issuing from the light fire, such (I mean) as were formost, & could not retire themselves back, by resion of their exceeding presse behind, that thrust them still forward. Thus Astapa was destroied by fire and fword, and yeelded no pillage to the enemies. And wen Martine had all the rest of the country yeeled unto him for fear of force, he led back his victorious army to Carthage unio Scipio.

About the very same time there came from Gades certain fugitive renegates, promiting to betray the garrison of the Carthaginians lying there, and likewife the captain of the garrison, together with the navy. Now had Mago rested there after his flight, and having gathered together the ships in the Ocean, levied and raifed certain aids, as well peyond the narrow leas along the coalt of Africk, as also out of the parts of Spain next adjoyning unto him, and all by the means of captain Hanno. When as between the Romans and those fugitives, there had passed faithfull promile and security to and fro, both Martine was sent thither with certain squadrons and compames lightly appointed; and also Lelim with 7 Triremes [of three banks of oars] and one great galiace of five, for to war joyntly together by common counsell, as well by sea as land. Scipio limidifiley fick of a grievous malady, but much worfe by report then it was, by reason that every one as men commonly have a defire & delight, to fofter & multiply rumours for the nonce) made ever fomewhat of his own head, and put into the rest of the news that he heard : which brought the province out of frame and caused great disorder, especially in the most remote parts thereof: what y is was well feen, what a world of troubles would have enfued upon fome calamity indeed, when avain rumour only, was able to raife fuch florms and tempelts. For neither the Allies continned locall in their alleageance, northe army dutifull in their wonted obedience. Mandonius & Indibilis, who made full account of the whole kingdome of Spain, now that the Carthaginians were driven our and expelled, feeing nothing answerable to their hope and expectation, and themfelves disappointed of their defignments, raised peasants and inhabitants of their own countries (and thole were the Lacetans) & follicited the youth of the Celtiberians : the country also of the Spelletus and Sedetans, that were confederat States with the people of Rome, they wasted in all mennet of holfdity. Besides, there arose a civil mutiny and differtion within the camp at Su-60; where there lay eight thousand fouldiers; as a guard and garrison for all the nation that induit on this fide Iberm. Whole heads were let awork, and began to be buffe not at that time

when doubtful & suspicious rumours were spread of their General, how he was in danger of death. H but long before, upon a licentions course of life that they had taken to, and so much the rather, for that now in time of peace they were held in, more ftreightly and neerly, who before were uled in their enemies land, during the wars, to break out in more loofe manner, and to live upon rapine and robberie. At the first they began to mutter and whisper secretly these and such like speeches: If there be war ftill in the province of Spain, what do we here among peaceable people? And if the war be ended, and the time of the commission come out and expired, why are we not had again back into Italy? Then they proceed to demand their pay very malapertly, and more faucily than might stand with the duty and modelty of fouldiers : yea, and the Sentinels and corps de quard would not flick to give reproachfull terms and tanting words to the Tribunes or Marshals, when they went the round : and fome of them made no bones to enter by night into the peaceable territory about them, for to fetch in booties and prizes; untill at length openly at noon day, they departed from their colours without pasport and licence. All things they did as transported away with lust and self-will of souldiers, not guided by the order and discipline of warfare, nor directed by the commandment of their captains and rulers. Nevertheleffe, there was retained fill a form of Roman camp among them : and that upon this only hope that the fouldiers had of the Tribunes aforefaid: whom they supposed in time would come to the bent of their bow, enter into the fame furious courfes, and have their hand in the mutinies, and follow them in their rebellion; and therfore they were well content with them to fit judicially in Marshall court, intheuinall place of Principai, to minister law and execute justice : also to call for the watchword and fignell of them, yea, and orderly to go to their watch and ward in their course and due times. And K whereas in very deed they had cast off all reverence and obedience of government, yet they would feem to shew a kind of loiall and dutiful diligence; in that (for sooth) they would be commanders of themselves, and keep some order without constraint. But in the end the mutiny broke out into open fedition : namely, when they perceived once, that Tribunes milliked and reproved their doings and endeavoured to crofie their defignes, yes, and defied fatly and openly to takput with them in their follies and furious outrages. Whereupon they diffeized the Tribunes of their judiciall places in the Principia, yea, and dispossessed them quite of all room in the camp, and by a generall conferred the foveraign rule on two common fouldiers, the captains of this their feditious commotion, Albim Galenul, and C. Aerius Vmber. Who not contented with the * Certain offi * markes and ornaments of the Tribunes, were to bold as to handle the rods and axes, eventhe L cers or ferge- very roiall enfigns of loveraignrule; never thinking how those knitches of rods, and axes flicking within them, which they caused to be born afore them to the fear of others, were ready to light upon them elves, to icourge their backs and fides, and to thop off their own heads not long after, The supposed death of Scipio, whereupon they vainly built, was it that blinded their wits and minds : upon the rumour whereof, being already notifed abroad, they had no doubt, but all Spata generally would beup in armes. In which garboil and hurliburly, they made reckoning that they might levy monies of the confederat States, and spoil and pill the Cities neer unto them. And amid these troubles, when all were in an uprore, and every man would venture to do every thing at his pleature, then they supposed their own deeds and actions would be lesse espied and marked. Now when as they looked every day still to hear fresh newes, not of his death only but also of his M funerals; and seeing there came none at all, but rather, that the former tidings were checked, and proved but a flying tale without head or foot, then they began to make femblance of enquiring atter, & feeking out the first authours who raised those false reports then they seemed to be angry also and offended withthem, to the end, that they forfooth might be thought rather to have beleeved things inconfideratly, than to have devised such a matter themselves purposely. These leaders and captains thus disappointed and abandoned, began now to dread and stand in horror of their own enligns of magistracy that were carried before them, and in stead of that imaginary rule which they usurped, they feared greatly, that the very edge indeed of the true and lawfull power of authoritie would be shortly turned upon them. As the sedition, was thus dashed, by occasion, that it was credibly and for certain reported, first, that Scipto was living; and within a while N after, that he was recovered and in health . there came leven Tribunes or Colonels, imfrom Scipio himself. At whose first arrivall at the camp, the souldiers grew more angrie and waspish then before . but anon upon fair words and speeches, wherewith the Colonels entertained those of their acquaintance, with whom they had communication, they were well contented and appealed. For first they went about to their pavilions from one to another, and afterwards to the Principia and the Pretorium, where they hapned to spie some knots of souldiers met to gether and talking one with another : and so spake unto them, as if they rather questioned with them what the cause should be of their anger and suddain commotion, then blamed them, or laid any action to their charge. The reason commonly pretended; was this, that their wages wis not duly paid at the day. Besides, they alledged, that whereas at the same time, when upon 0 the trecherons fact of the Illiumgitans, there followed the loffe and death of two Generals, and "the defeat of their two armies, they by their vertue had defended the Roman name and hoon nour, and like wife kept the province to their behoof, the Illiturgitans had indeed received condign punishment for their offence and trespatie, but there was none that had requited and it-"compensed them for their good fervice accordingly. Beleeve me (fay they again) your complaints are just and requests reasonable, and we will make relation thereof to the Lord General

se and glad we are in our hearts, that it is no worle, and that the case is no more incurable then it is

A" for God be thanked, P. Scipio and the common-weal, are both sufficient and also willing to make " you amends for all.

But Scipio, a man though used to the wars, yet altogether unacquainted with storms of souldiers mutalies, was much troubled in spirit and perplexed, for fear the army might exceed measure in rangereffing or himself pais his bounds in punishing; for the present he thought good to deal gently with them itill, as he had begun, and tent abroad the collectors about the Tributary Cities to gather up the revenues, thereby to put them in good hope of pay, and that with speed. And hereupon there went out an edict and proclamation, that they should repair to Carthage, there to call for their wages, either by companies apart one after another, or altogether in general, whether they would themfelves.

And now by this time, the fulden pacification of the Spaniards that were about to rebell, ftilled the ledition of the fouldiers quite, which of it felf began to cool and flake already. For Mandozum and Indib.lis, after it was exported that Scipio was alive and livelike, gave over their enterprile, and were retired again within their confines. So as now the fouldiers had neither Citizen not forteiner, to take part with them in their folly & furious rage. And when they had cast all about what courie to take and what this to make, they found no other evalion, but the most common retuge and retreat of all lewd counsels and bad designments, even to commit themselves either to the just wrath of their Generall, or elfe to his elemency and mercy, whereof they were not past all hope, and in utrer despair. For why ? he had not pardoned even the very enemies, with whom behad fought in cattell. And as for their mutiny, it was as yet without bloodshed, and no hurt C done : and a it telf was not cruel and outragious, to it had deferved no extream and rigorous punilhment : hus reasoned they and comforted themselves, as naturally men are too prompt and eloquent, to extenuate, to pallist and cloke their own faults, more I wor, then they should. This was their only doubt, whether they were better to go by cohorts and iquadrons, or all at once to command their pay. In the end they were of opinion, that the fafer way was to go all in one train. At the very fame time, whiles they among themselves laid their heads thus together in the camp, there was a councel held at new Carthage about them, and much dispute there was, and variety of opinions, whether they should proceed against the heads and Captains only of the feditious (who were in number not above five and thirty) or by cutting off the greater fort to punish this to odious example and prefident of a rebellion rather then a mutiny. But the milder fentence took D place, namely, that from whence the offence began, there the punishment should rest. And for the multitude, some chastisement and rebuke was sufficient for their correction. When the Councel was dimilled and broken up, to the end that it might be thought abroad that they fat about nothing electur this which they pretended, they published an edict throughout all the army in Carthat for an expedition or journey against Mandonius and Indibilis; and gave commandment to make provision of victuals for certain daies. And tho deeven Tribunes, who had before gone to Sucro for to appeale the mutiny there, were now tent to meet that army again and having five names speece given them of the principal authors of the forefaid tumult, they had a direction unto certain meet persons for the purpose, to shew them good countenance, to speak fair unto them, and courteoully to invite them home to their houses, and afford them kind and triendly enterteinment; and after they had made them good cheer and brought them to bed, to take them being fait afteen upon their liberall drinking of wine, and to bind them fure hand and foot Now when they were not far off from Carthage, they understood by those whom they met and encountred upon the way, that all the whole army, was the next day following to fet forth against the Lace ans : which tidings not only rid them of all fear, which fecretly surprifed and possessed their minds, but also made them exceeding glad and joyous, for that they supposed their General being now left alone with their forces, they might do with him what they would themselves, rather then be at his commandment and devotion. And about fun-letting they entred the City, and perceived the other army providing and making all ready for the voisge above named. Received they were and welcomed with gentle words, deviled and framed on purpole: namely, that the L. Generall took great joy and contentment for their coming, for that they were come to just before the fetting out of the other army : and so they went to repose and make much of themselves. And without any fir and tumult at all, the ringleaders of the fedition, were by the means of those Tribuns entertained and lodged in the houses of certain persons of good behavior and meet for that Pupole, and there apprehended and imprisoned. At the reliefe of the fourth watch, the carrages of that army, whose expedition was pretended, began to set forward on the journey : and somewhat before day the standards and ensigns advanced, but the whole army was deteined and staied at the gares, and certain warders ent to keep all the passages and wayes, that no man should go foith of the City. Then were those fouldiers who came the day before funimoned to an audience : and they ran boldly into the market place to the Tribunall of the General, (as if with their outcries and clamours they would have put him in tome fear and dread of them. And at one time both the Lord Generall himself in person accended up the Tribunall, and with all the armed fouldiers were brought again from the gate, and enclosed round about at their backs the marmed multitude gathered together to hear an Oration. Then were they danted, as lufty as they were before, and all their courage cooled: and (as they conteffed afterwards themselves) nothing terrified them to much, as the healthful ftrength and freih colour of the L. Generall beyond all their expectation, whom they thought verily to have found fick and crafte: yes, and his countenance and face so vigorous and couragious, as they never remembred to have seen him so H lusty in any battell before. For a while he tat still and said never a word, until he was advertised that the Captains of the mutiny were brought into the place and all things else in readines. Then after silence made by an Orez of the cryetz, in this wise he began and said.

" I would never have believed that I should have wanted words and proper language unto "mine own army : not because I have exercised my self at any time rather to make eloquent ec speeches then to manage valiant actions, but for that being alwaies from mine infancy almost " trained up in the camp, I have been acquainted with the natures and humours of louldiers, Bug "in what manner I should speak unto you, neither my wits will give me advice, nor my tongue of afford me utterance : you, I fay, whom I wor not to much as by what name to call. Should I "term you Citizens, who have revolted from your native country, or fouldiers, who have re-"nounced your Generall, refused to be under his command, his charge and government, and "made no conscience to break the oath of your alleageance? Last of all, should I give you the "name of enemies? Now furely, me thinks I agnile the bodies, the faces, the apparel and habit of "mine own natural Citizens: but contrariwise, I see plainly the deeds, the words, the intents and minds of arrant enemies. For what have ye wished and hoped for else, but the Ilergetes and the "Lacetanes have done the like? And yet I must needs say, that they had to follow for their cap-"tains in their outrage, Mandonius and Indibilis, two Princes of royall bloud: whereas you im-" posed the soveraign command & government upon V mber Atrius, & Calenus Albinus two bale " companions, Denie it now hardly if you wil, that you all either were in the action, or willing in "the intention. Verily I can eafily believe you in so disavowing, and namely, that all this proceed. ed from the folly of some brainfick fellows among you. For the trespasses committed are of that "quality and consequence, that if the whole army were therein culpable, the expiation & purging "therof could not be procured without great facrifices and exquisite punishment. Full against my "will I touch these points, as sores and gals that will not abide the rubbing : but unlessethey be " touched and handled too, they cannot possibly be cuted and healed. I assure you, for mineown or part, I thought verily, that when the Carthaginians were driven out of Spain, there was neither " place norperion throughout the whole province that had envied my life and health: fuch hath 66 been my cariage, and so have I demeaned my self not only with Allies, but also with enemies, But "fee, how much thave been deceived! even in mine own camp, the news of my death was not on-" ly received with joy, but expected also with a longing defire. I speak not this, that I would have " any man to imagin that I conceive, how all ingenerall are guilty of this fact (for if I were per-L " fwaded in my mind that my whole army wished my death, I would here die presently before "your eyes; for what good would my life do me, repined of my fouldiers and fellow Citizens?) "But the multitude of every people is like the seas in nature; which of themselves are unmoveable "and flir not:as the winds blow, as the gales go and come, to are they either calm or troubleone and inquiet: and even to the cause and source of all this fury and outrage, is in some sewheads and leaders. As for you we have caught the infection from them, and plaied the fools with them " for company, Surely I am thus periwaded of you this day, that ye know not yet to whatenor-"mous height of folly ye have proceeded; what mischievous act ye were entred into against mine " own perion; what you attempted against your native country, your wives and children; what "you enterprised against the gods and witnesses of your loyals oath; what ye have done against M "the facred auspices and happy tortune, under which ye have served in warfare; what ye have "committed against the custome & law of war, against the discipline of yout ancestors; & final-" ly, how prejudiciall and offensive your designes have been against the soveraign majesty of the "Roman empire. As for my felf, I am willing to fay nothing: content I am to think, that year-"ther gave credit to my death rashly and inconsideratly, then hearken therto willingly and gree-"dily. And it may be, that I have so behaved my self, that no wonder it is, if mine army bewes-"ry of me and of my government. But what harm hath your country deferved at your hands "which to betray, ye should complot with Mandonius & Indibilis? How hath the people of Rome "offended you, that you have deprived the Kn. Marshals and Colonels created by the vokes of "the people, of their lawfull rule and authority, and conferred the same upon privat persons? N "And being not therewith contented, to have and a knowledge them for your Colonels; you, even you the army of the Romans, have taken the knitches of rods belonging only to the Ge-"neral, and bestowed them upon those that never kept so much as a bondslave of their own to command. Albins and Atrins forfooth, fet up their pavilions in that chief place and State in the camp, where the foveraign magistrat ought to quarter: with them the trumpet founded: from them the fignall and watch-word was demanded they fat as judges in the Tribunal feat " of Scipio the Pro-conful: upon them the Lictors and Sergeants attended : for them they made way & voided the place, against they should go forth & march in their state: and before them "were the rods born, and the axes withall. When it raineth stones, when thunderholts are show when lightnings flash from heaven, when beasts bring forth strange uncouth, and monstrous of " young ones, contrary to the course of nature, you take them for prodigious figns and featful of tokens. Nay this is a monstrous fight and wonder in deed, which by no facrifices of beatis, by "no supplications and praiers, can be purged and expiat, without the bloud of them that have committed to hainous a fact. And albeit no wicked crime can be founded upon any reason, yet "would I gladly know of you(as in a case that indeed should not be once named and remembred)

A "what was in your mind? what imagined you? and what was your delignment? There was in times past a legion tent to Rhegiam, there to lie in garrison. Traiterously and villanously they "murdered the principal citizens there, and for ten years space possessed and kept that Wealthy "town to their own behoof. For this notorious and beafty fact the whole legion, even four "thousand men and no fewer, were in the market place of Rome beheaded every one. And e yet they at the first followed not for their captain * Arrine Vmber, one little better then a lan- * Arrine Vm. u der, skullian, and follower of the camp, a man of an unlucky and unfortunate name, but Decisis ber : alluding "Jubelium a Tribune or Kn. But tell me I pray you, intended ye to have made your continual re-"fidence, and to have dwelt at Sucrot where if I your General at my departure out of the province, "when my time and commission was expired, should have left you behind me, ye might have section out upon me, and called for vengeance to God and man in regard of hard measure and "wiong offered unto you, in that ye might not be permitted to return home to your wives and children. But alas, wife and children were clean excluded out of your mindt & ye thought no more "upon them, then of me or of your native country. and take in good part, and patiently to hear me to tell all that I can fay? But these matters it will H and take in good part, and part henceforth; ye shall be checked no more for them. Would Godye " could as foonforget them, as I will put them out of my remembrance. And therefore as touching wou all in generall, if ye repent and be displeased with your selves for your fault and folly, I shall be content and think you punished to the ful. But as for Albim Calenm and Arrim Imber, with e the rest of the authors of this cursed and detestable mutiny, they shall make amends for their "trespasse and transgression, even with their heart-bloud; and they shall surely die for it. The of fpectacle of their exemplary punishment ought not to feem unto you grievous and odious, but "rather a pleafant and delectable fight, if ye have any grace in you, and be come again to you right wits. For their intent was to hart and do mifehief to no man alive, more then to your felves,

He had fearce made an end of his speech, when all at once, according to the order given before. I hand, there was prefented to their eies and ears a terrible and fearful object on all fides. For the army which had environed the affembly round about clattered their fwords & bucklers together. The common crier was heard to cite by name all thole that were condemned there, in the prefence of the whole audience. Stripped they were naked, and haled forth in the mids of themall, and every thing brought out at once for to accomplish the execution. Thus were they bound to the ftake, whipped with rods, and their heads chopped off. So benumned they were all and affonied for tear, that were prefent at the fight thereof, that there was not heard amongst them all one shrewd & hard word, in milliking the rigor of the punishment, no, nor so much as one grone or fecret figh. Then their bodies were al drawn at one fide, the place was made clean, & purged & al the fouldiers were called by name & before the Colonels & Kn. Marshals, sware alleageance, and K to be true fouldiers unto Scipio. And every one according as he answered to his name, had his wages truly paid. This was the iffue and final end of the fouldiers mutiny, which began at Sucre.

At the same time, Captain Hanne lent by Mago from Gades with a small power of African, follicited the Spaniards about the river Batis, for mony, to rebel and put in arms upon a four thoufand able men. But afterwards he was forced by L. Martins to quit his camp, and having loft the greatest part of his men in the very tumult of taking the camp, yea, and some in the flight, whom the horimen purioed in chair and flew as they ran stragling, himself with few others escapedaway. Whiles these things hapned about the river Batis, Lalius in the mean time having pulled through the streights into the main Ocean, arrived with his navy at Carteia. This is a City standing on the fea coast bounding upon the Ocean, even in the mouth of the river, where it first own L eth from the threights into the broad tea. Now there was some hope (as hath-been aforesaid)to gain the City of Gades without any affault, by treaton, for as much as there came fome into the Roman camp, that of themselves made offer and promite thereof. But the treason brake forthtoo foon and was revealed before it was ripe, the confpirators were all apprehended and fently Magounto Adherbal the Pretor, for to be conveied to Carthage. And Adherbal having embited those traitors in a Caravel or Gallion of five banks of oars, and sent her afore, becauseshe was flower of fail than those of three banks; himself with eight three-banked gallies, followed aprety way after. The faid Caravel of five course of oars, was not so soon entred the straights, but Scrpie also being embarked in another Caravel of the same fort, made out of the haven of Carteia with feven Gallies of three ranks of oars and invested Adberbal and the foresaid Gallies fup. M poling verily that the enemies Caravel being taken tardy in the very current, was not able against the tide to reire. Anherbal being thus surprised on the suddain, for a while stood in fear and doubt what to do; whether he had best to follow on after his own Caravell, or turn the prows and beaks of his gallies, and make head against the enemy. Thus whiles he stood at a bay lingting, he loft the opportunity of shifting and avoiding a battell: for now they were come within the dark that, and the enemies on every fide were ready to charge. And the current was to ftrong that they were not able to rule and manage their ships as they would. But the manner of fight warnthing at all like to a fea-battell, for as much as they could do nothing to their mind, nothing by skil and dexterity, nothing by counsel and advice. The nature onely of the narrow sea, the violence of the current was all in all, and ruled the conflict, driving the thips one against another, as well up. N on their own fellows as upon their enemies : not with standing they rowed and laboured what they could to the contrary. So as one while ye should see a ship that sled and sended away, whirled about back again with a witnesse by the waves, upon those that had her in chale a and likewise another that feemed to follow and puriue after her enemie, if the hapned once into a contrary course of billowes, to turn top and tail, and seem to flie. And in the very conflict it to fell out, that when as one vessell ran with her beak head full butt upon another, the was forced by waves to turn her side, and receive in her flank the push of her enemies. And contrariwise, when as one by with her flank opposite to the enemie, suddainly all at once she should wind and while agin upon her prow. As the gallies fought thus doubtfully together, hap hazard, at the pleasure and will of Fortune; the Roman Caravell (were it becaute of her weight the was able to stand more 0 fleady against the furging billows, or by reason that the bad more ranks of pars that cut the wire, and to was more easily ruled) chanced to fink two of the imalier gallies of the enemies ; and running fast by one with a forcible violence wiped away clean all the oars of one fide, and hid no doubt ipoiled and marred all the rest that she would have invested and charged upon buttet Adherbal, with the other five made fail, and got over into Africk; Lalim having sailed back to Carteia With victory, and heard what had been done at Gades, namely, how and completed betraying the Hand was disclosed, the conspirators sent bound unto Carthage, and consequently all their hope frultrate and turned to nothing upon which they came to Gades; dispatched mesfengers to L. Martine, giving him to understand, that unlesse they meant still to lie before Gades, triffing away the time and doing no good, the belt way was to return unto Scipio the lord Generill: and so with the content of Martins both of them within few daies repaired to Carthage. Up. on whole departure Mago had not onely a time to breath himself being frighted as he was with a double fear both by land & fea , but also hearing that the Hergetes were revolted, conceived some hope to recover Spain again, and addressed his courriers to the Senat at Carthage: who by relating not only the civil mutiny that arose in the Roman camp, but also the rebellion of the confederats (and all by way of amplification and enforcing every thing to the highest degree) should encourage and exhort them to fends aids for to regain the dominion of Spans, left unto them by deicent over their anceltors. Mandonius & Indibilis who were retired for a time into their confines. untill they knew how the fedition sped and what was the issue thereof rested stul in suspence. For if the naturall citizens had their trespasse forgiven, they made no doubt themselves but they might be pardoned alfo. But when it was published abroad how severely and sharply they were punished, they supposing their own transgresson to deserve the like punishment, sollicited their own people again to take arms: and thus having levied and affembled the fame power of aids which they had before, they passed into the Sedetants country, where at the beginning they lay in standing

Camp, being in all 20000, and 2500 horse ftrong.

Scipio after he had foon reconciled and won again the heart of his fouldiers, as well by making menaument of their wages, to the faulty and innocent alike, as also by shewing a loving countenance, and giving friendly words unto all indifferently; before that he dislodged and removed from Carthage, affembled them all together to an audience." Where he inveighed bitterly and at largesgainst the falshood and trechery of the lords of the country that rebelled and protested be foulders, "fore them all, that he went not now to be revenged of them for their wickedness with the same "mind, wherewith lately before he had cured the folly, and reformed the error of his naturall "citizens: for then quoth he with grief and grone, yea, and with tears like as one that rent and cut "hisown bowels,1 expiated and purged either the inconfiderat folly,or the wilful malice of eight D"thouland men, with the head of thirty perions : but now I go with joy and glad heart, yea, and " with a refolution to execute and maffacre the Hergetes. For neither are they born in the fame land " with me, nor linked now in any fociety at all unto me : the only bond of faith and amity which " was between us, that they have themselves first impiously broken. But in my own army, besides "that I leethey all are either Roman citizens or elfe allies, and thole not Aliens but meer Latins: "this doth me good and moved me much, that there is not among them to much as one fouldier "to speak of, but was brought out of Italy either by mineuncle Cn. Scipio (who was the first of "the Roman name that came as L. Deputy into this province for else by my father who was Con-"ful or last of all by my mine own felf. They are every one of them wel acquainted & inured with "the name of Scipios, and used to their fortune and government : whom I gladly would conduct *home fafe with me to deserved triumph, and whom I hope to find ready to affift me with their "twonr when I stand for a Consulship, as if it were a matter that concerned the honor of them "allin generall, as well as mine particular. And as for the expedition now in hand, wholoever "taketh it to be a war, little remembereth the noble acts by me atchieved: for furely I make more "reckening of Mago and his exploits, who is fled with a few ships as it were out of the compasse " of the world, in an lland environed with the Ocean lea, then I do of the Illergetes. For there "in that place is not only a Carthaginian captain, but all the Carthaginian forces and stength that "now remain. Here are none but theeves and robbers, and their leader ; who peradventure "may be of some power and sufficiency to forage the fields, to burn the houses, to drive away some "canell of their neighbours; but to come to hand-strokes in a set fight and ranged battell, they are "of no valour and worth at all: who no doubt will come into the field, trufting upon their good "footmanship to run away in the rout, more than upon any force of arms to maintain the fight. "And therefore I have thought good to put down and suppresse these Hergetes, before I depart out "of the province; not for any prefent danger at all, or fear of greater war that I fee may fpring "trom thence; but first and principally, that so ungracious and wicked a rebellion should not re-"main unpunished; and next because it might not be said, that in a province so subdued, as well by " fingular proweffe as rare felicity, there was left one enemie behind of the Romans. And therfore "in the name of the gods follow after me, not to much to make just war (for ye are not to deal "withenemies any way comparable unto you) as to take vengeance of wicked men, and to punish grateleffe persons. When he had finished his speech, he dismissed them, with commandment to G be ready the next morrow to put themselves in the journey; and after that he set once forward by the tenth day he came to the river Iberus, and when he had passed over, within 4 daies more, he encamped in the fight of his enemies. Now there was a plain there, environed round about with mountains: into which vale between, he caused the cattell (and those were for the most part drivenout of the enemies countrie) for to be put forth to grafing and all to provoke the anger of the fiere and (avage enemies: and fent out withall, the light appointed archers to guard them: be took order belides, that when thele were one in skirmifh with the vancurriers of the enemies, L4in with his Cavalry should closely from some covert place give a suddain charge. And for this purpole, there was a hill that bare out handlomely to hide the amouth of those horsemen.

And prefently without any delay, they came to skirmith . for the Spaniards made out to to the H cattell, fo foon as ever they discovered them a far off the archers again and darters of the Romans ran upon the Spaniards as they were busic in their booty. And at first they terrified them, and skirmifhed with their fhot: but afterward, when they had spent their arrows and darts, which were better to begin a fray, then determine a battell, they drew their naked fwords and began to fight close together foot to foot. And lurely the skirmish of the footmen had been doubt. fully decided, but that the horfemen came upon them: who not only affronted the enemies in their face, and trampled them all under their horsefeet that came in their way, but also some of them having wheeled bout and fet a compasse along the hill toot, presented themselves at the back of the enemics, to a. . ney enclosed and thut up the most part of them in the middle between, Infomuch asthere enlued a greater fl ughter, then commonly upon light skirmifhes by way of fuch rodes and excursions. But the barbarous people by this discomfiture were rather kindled and en. flamed to anger, then daunted any way or discouraged. And therfore, because they would not feem to h ve been difmaied or affrighted, the morrow morning by day-light, they shewed them. felves in battell array. The streight and narrow valley, as is beforefaid, was not able to receive and contain all their power : for two third parts welneer of the infantry and all the horfe were come down into the plain field ; and the rest of their footmen besides, stood together quartered on the fide of the hill. Scipio judged that the icantnelle of the ground made for him both because it leemed that the Roman fouldiers were more fitted to fight in a small room then the Spaniards; and also for that the enemies were engaged within that place, which was not able to contein the the whole multitude : and therefore ne devised a new stratagem besides. For considering that be K could not in to narrow a space bring his own cavalrie about to compasse and charge the wings and points of their battell, and that the horimen which the enemies had arranged together with their infantry, would serve them in no stead; he gave direction unto Lalim to conduct the hories closely as he could about the hils, and to keep off the iquadrons of the cavalry fo far as possibly might be from the skirmish of the Infantry. Himself directly turned all the enligos of the footmenoppolit against the enemies, and marshalled the forefront with four cohorts only, becaule he could not firetch out the battell any broader : and then without delay he made half to begintle conflict, to the end, that while the enemies were amuled and occupied in fight they should be withdrawn from efpying the horimen as they traverted over the hils. Neither had they an eye of them at all, whiles they were brought about, before they heard the noise and tumult of thems L they charged upon their backs. So they fought alunder in two feverall placess and battels of foo, and as many of horte encountred & joyned along the plain, because the streightnesse of the ground would not admit both horse and soot to fight together in one plot at once. Now when as the infantry of the Spaniards could not help the men of armes, and they again were a little succound by the Cavalry, out that the footmen trulting upon the Cavalry, were without good direction put rathly to fight in the plain ground, and to beaten down and flain; and the horfemen beingencloted round, could neither shide the enemies footmen afront them (for by this timetheir own infantry was overthrown and defeated) nor yet endure behind them the hot affault of their botfmen; they left their horfes, caff themselves into a ring, and after they had stood to at defence long time, were flain every one to the latt man : there was not I fay one footman or horiman left M of all those that fought in the v. lley. As for that third part which flood upon the hillfide, rather to behold the fight in a place of recurity, than to take part with their fellows in the battell, they had both time and space to shift for themselves and escape. Among whom, were the Princes alfo themselves in perion, Madonine and Indibilis : who were flipt away in the first tumult of the fight, before all the battailons were environed. The same day was the camp also of the Spills ards forced, and therein betides other pillage, were taken pritoners almost three thouland men. Rom nsand allies there died in the tight upon a $ 200, and above three thouland were fore huth The victory no doubt had been obtained with tellebloudihed, if they had fought in a more open piece of ground, where there had been better icope to flie away. Then Indibilit giving over dett to think any more of wars, & supposing nothing fafer, then to have reconfle to the approved good N ness and elemency of Scipio, sent his brother Mandonius unto him : who fell postrat downthis feet, blaming much (as the cause of their folly) the fat. Il rage and sury of the time; wherein not only the Illergetes] and Lacetanes, but also the Roman camp, as it were by some configurations and pestilent infection, became frantick and besides themselves : and said withall, that the condition of himlelf, his brother, and their followers and subjects was such, as they were ready it if were io thought good, either to yeeld up their lively breath unto Scipio, at whole very hands they had once received the fame; or if they might now be pardoned and faved, to devote and employ their lives for ever hereafter wholly in his service, as being now twice due unto him along and no other. Once after they prefumed upon confidence in their innocent ciule, when syst they had no experience of his elemency a but now contrary wife they repoled all their full hope in 0 the mercy of the conqueror, and nothing trusting in the goodness of the quarrell. Now it was all old cultome among the Romans, not to exercise the absolute authority of the government upon any (sthey did to peaceable inbjects) with whom they were neither confedered in equal and te ciprocall covenants, nor linked in the bands of amity; before they furrendered up unto them all rights, as well divine as humane . before I fay they had received holtages of them, taken atmot from them, and plainted garritons in their towns and Cities. Scipio after he had sharply rebuled

and roundly haken up Mandomine there prefent, and likewife Indibilis that was ablent, faid, that for their wicked parts & lewd demeanor, they had worthily deferved death; but live they should by his goodness and the gracious favour of the people of Rome. And moreover he promised neither to despoil them of their armour & weapons (the seizing whereof was put a pawn and affurance unto luch as feated rebellion ; for as for him, he left unto them their armour freely to ule at their pleasure, and their hearts and minds fecured from fear) nor proceed in rigor and cruelty against the guiltleffe hollages, but against their own persons, if they went out and revolted again : nor yet would be content himtelf to be revenged of difarmed and naked enemies, but the offenders & transgressors should in their armes suffer for their deserts. And now since they had tried both fortanes, as well the one as the other, he put more their choile, whether they had rather have the Rog mans pacified or displeased, friends or enemies? So Mandonine had a fair delivery; only there was an imposition and fine laid anto him and Indibility of a turn of money for fouldiers pay, Seipo himlelf after he had fent Marrine before meo the farther part of Spain (beyond the river Iberm) and Syllanas back again to Tarracon, fraid fome few daiss untill the Illergetes had made payment of the monies that they were charged with : and then with all his fouldiers lightly appointed without carrages, marched in a running camp to overtake Marrine, who by that time approached neer unto the Oceani-

The newly which Majoriffa began before time, was upon landry occasions put off still and defend. For the Numidian Prince was very defirous to parley & commune with Scipio himself in perion & or the right hand to a flurehim of fealers which was the very cause then, that Scipio took lokes a journey to lar out of his was, Majoriffa being now at Gades, and advertised by Martine that Scipio was coming and neer a band, shewed falls semblance to Mago, made many excuses, & some much tault, namely, that their bottles being pinned up and peltred within the Hand, were welcare fort and spoiled t and that by shelf long abode there, not only they made others feet him war and survivey of all thirties, bit also afted thereof themselves and besides that his men of arms for very exte and idlenselfe, became feeble and unfully. By which suggestions he pertivated with Mago, and prevailed with him so much, as to suffer him to cross over to the continent, under colour to wast and spoil the land of Spain next adjoyning. When he was passed over, he into the sense principall Numidians, gentlement of maits, to appoint both the time and the place of their meeting and conference; and gave order; that Scipio should detain some for the mits him as pledges stockhird was sent back, to conduct Majoriffa to the appointed place, according as the was tent back, to exposing the order of them with him as pledges the third was sent back, to conduct Majoriffa to the appointed place, according as the was tent back, to exposing to the appointed place, according as the was tent back, to employ they meet for to emparle and confirment together.

· Now wet Majant fa the Numidian King polleded before with a wonderful admiration of Scipio and his vesture; by reason of the fame that was blazed abroad of his noble acts: and had conceived withill and imagined, that he was a man right personable, of a mighty big and goodly stature, but when knonne faw him in place, he graw into a far greater reverence and tionor of his person. Forbeiche the executing majety and fore that naturally he carried with him, his goodly long bulh of hais well accessed and graced him; the habit alio and attire of the body, manly & fouldier-likenot brive and sticked up deintily and delicatly, much adorned and let him out. And for his and he was in the belt & height of his strength : which seemed upon his late sickness, more full, more imag and frells, as if the very prime and flour of his youth had been renewed, and himself cast again in a new mould. The Numidian (at their first meeting) almost astonied, gave him thanks or fending back his brottiers fon unto him, faying, " That ever fince that time, he fought to elpie iome occasion and fit opportunity, which now at length by the goodness of the immortall gods being preferred anto him, we had not neglected and let flip. Protefting that he was most defirous "bothte do him favour, and to gratifie the people of Rome in any kind of fervice i in fo much as there was no one foreiner more carnelt & ready to advance and better the State of the Romans then himself a which (abbelt he had been willing unto heretotore) he could not possibly shew in clica to long as he was in Spaina Brango commer, and unknown unto him; but in that wherein the was born & brought up in hope of fueceffion in his fathers Kingdom, he would be most forwand to perform. Pot, in case the Romans would fend but Scipio as L. Generall into Africk, he made no doubt but hoped affiredly, that Carthage had not long to continue and fland, but foor would come to a finall end. Seipis for his patt was glad both to fee bim, and hear him fo fresh latewing this fall well, that of all the cavalry of the enemies; Maffaniffa and the Numid iin west ever away with price & prize & the young man himself in his very countenance carried with him a good the w of a brave and hanty mind. So after faithfull promite given and received on both parts, Stiffie retited to Faraton : and Majaniffa when he had by the permiffion of the Romans loraged the coalts next adjoyning, because he might not feeth to have passed over into the main land for nothing, returned into Gades.

When Maga now being hi hiter despair of Spain (whereof he had conceived great hopes, and two hindelf ho proudly; first upon the mutthy of the fouldiers, and after wards upon the revolt & rebellion of Indibility maded preparation to fail over into Africk, there came a message unto him from Carbings, that the Senasthere had given order and direction. That he should transport the armido which he had at Gadh, and passe into Indi; anothere to take up and wage all the able into that properties the should transport the should be shou force and endeavor, and yet, with greater favour of fortune. For this exploit, both treasure was H brought from Carthage to Mago : and himfelf also raited as great fums as possibly the could of the Gaditanes, having not only emptied the common treature of the Hand, but ipoiled also the temples, yea, and forced all privat persons to bring abroad all their gold and filver whatsoever. As he sailed along the coalt of Spain, he landed his ionidiers not far from new Barehage : and after he had walted and overrin the territories by the Sea fide, he approached neer with his fleet, and rid at anchor before the City: where all the day long he kept his fouldiers within their ships, and by pight let them ashiore, and led them to ward the part of the wall, whereas Carthage. Was by the Romans won : inpposing that the City was not infliciently defended with a strongeguerd, and that fome of the townimen, upon hope of a change and alteration, would rife up in armes and rebell. But there were come polts out of the country in all halt beforehand, who had brought news, I as well of the foraging of the country & fearfull flight of the ruftical peafants, as of the coming of the enemies. Moreover the armado was descried also in the day time, & it was apparant, that they made not choise to anchor even just in the rode before the City, for nothing. And therefore the the City fouldiers Bood ready, well appointed, and in armes, and kept within that gate, which turned toward the lake and the fea. And when the enemies, fouldiers and marriners confuledly together, were come in great diforder under the walls, with more tumultuous noile then forcible violence : the Romans at once fuddainly fet open their gate, and with a great crie and fhout, made a fally upon t hem, charged the enemies, troubled and difordered them. & at the fift onfette volly of that discomfited and put them to flight, yea, and with much flaughter chaled them to the shore: and but that the veffels flood close to the firand, ready to receive them abroad as they fled fo g fearfully, there had not been one left alive, either in the flight or fightn Nay, they that were in the very thips were in great affright & peril, whiles to prevent the enemies of breaking in upon them pell mell with their own company, they pull'd up the ladders, drew in the planks, cut a two the ropes where by the fhips were faltened to the banks, yea, and the very cables for half, that they might have no hinderance by weighing anchor; to that many there were, who in swimming to the flips, because they knew not in the darke night, which way to go or what to avoid, perified miderably. The next day, when the armado was fled from thence back again into the Ocean from whence it came, they were found flain eight hundred men and of armors and confletsbetween

the City wall and the tea shore, two thousand,

Mago being retired to Gades, was excluded from thence, and arrived with his sleet at sale, 1. a place not far from Gades. From whence he fent Embaffadors, to complain that the gates were thut against him, being their allie and friend and when the Gaditanes excused themselves and faid, that it was long of an uprore of the multitude, who were offended & aggriceed for sentimentberies committed, and spoil made by the fouldiers at their departure, and when they were resty to be embarked; he trained forth to parly their head magistrats (whom the Garthaginian call Sufferes Jogether with the chief Treaturer : and after they were senurged and their skin pincoully torn, he commanded them to be roundly truffed up and crueified. From thence hefailed to Payufa, an lland diftant from the main an hundred miles, inhabited at that time by Canthaginians, where the fleet was friendly and peaceably received : & not only provided for liberally of flore of victuals, but also furnished with lufty men, for marriners to ferve at fea; yea, and with smorand munition for fouldiers. Upon which forces Mago bare himself confident and bold, and fetting fit fell within the Balear Hands, that were fitty miles off. Now there are two of these Handscalled Beleares, the one greater then the other, and more mighty both in men and munition : having unbe wen and harbour where Mago supposed that he might commodiously winter in. But the linder withflood his navy with as great hostility, as if they had been Romans that had inhabited he le land, they could not have done more. And as now adaies they use for the most part slings, to at that time they practifed no other kind of weapons at all. And in no nation befides, can ye solone speciall person, so much to excell in that feat, as all the Balcars generally do exceed and impule others in the call and flight thereof. And therefore they discharged and levelled among them, as the armado approached the shore, such store of stones slying about their ears as thick as hul, that they durft not enter the haven, but turned their fhips into the main fea again. Then they proved to the leffer * Iland of the Balears, which as it was fertile in foil, fo for men and armotivus me thing to ftrong. Whereupon they disbarked and came a land and above the haven in almost and well tenced place they encamped. And having gotten to be malters both of the City industritor ry about it, without any force of armes and conflict, they levied and enrolled there among them two thouland auxiliary fouldiers, whom they lent to Carthage for to winter, and then they det up their flips alandinto the dock. When Mago was once departed from the Oceanies coall, the Gaditans furrendred themselves to the Romans,

These were the acts atchieved in Spain, under the conduct & fortunat government of P. Stiph who having delivered the charge of the province to L. Lentalm, and Manlim Acidiam, reimed to Rome with a fleet of ten fail. He had audience given him in the Senat, affembledio the temple of Bellona, without the City-where he discouried before them in order from point opoints of all the affairs and exploits that he had done in Spain : Namely, how often he had foutling fet and ranged battels : what a number of towns he had forced and won from the enemits I what nations he had subdued and brought in subjection under the state of Rome; how at the

he passed into Spain, against four general captains and four victorious armies; and now had not left one Carthaginian in all thole parts. Yet for all these noble deeds, he rather affaied what hope hemight have of a triumph, than made any hot & earnest fute therefore: because it was never seen to that day, that any one had triumphed who made war, being himself no principal Magistrate. After the Senat was rilen and dismissed he entred the City and caused to be carried before him into the Chamber of Rome, of filver in bullion, 14342 pounds weight; and in coin befides, a great quantity. Then L. Veturius Philo held the folemn affembly for creation of Coff, and all the Centuties in general, with exceeding favour and affection elected P. Scipio Cof, and for to be his companion in government, P. Licinius Crassus the Archbishop was joyned unto him. But this affembly (as we find in records) was celebrated with more frequency of people, than ever any had been R known during this war. For they repaired and met from all parts, not only to give their voices, but allo to lee Scipio: nay they ran in great numbers to his house, and into the Capitoll, when he facrificed and flew an hundred oxen in facrifice for the honour of Jupiter, according to his vow which he had made in Spain. And all mens minds gave them, and they were affuredly perlivaded in their hearts that as L. Luctatius finished the former Punick war, so P. Cornelius would make an end of that which was now in hand: and like as he had driven all the Carthaginians forth of Spain, to would Scipio hunt them out of Italy : and every man in his conceit withed and affigued unto him the Province of Affrick, as if the war in Italy had been tu ly brought to an end, Then enmed the election of the Prætors. And two were created that were then Adiles of the Commons, to wit, Sp. Lucretius, and Cn. Octavius: and of private persons, Cn. Servilius Scipio, and L. Explius Pappus. In the fourteenth year of the Punick war, P. Cornelius Scipio, and P. Licinius Craffus entred their Consulship. And unto the Consuls were the Provinces appointed : namely, unto Scipio was Sicily granted without casting lots, and that with the consent and good liking of his Collegue, because he being the Archbishop, was by vertue of that dignity kept fill in Italy, for to see to the facilities, divine service, and Church matters : and unto Crassus the country of Britis was assigned. Then the provinces for the Prators were put to the lottery and the civil jurisdiction within Rome fell to Cn. Servilius: Ariminum (for fo they called Gallia) unto Sp. Lucretius: Sicily was allotted to L. Amylius and Lardinia to Cn. Octavius.

The Senat affembled in the Capitol: where Publius Scipio propounded an Act, and it was confirmed by the authority of the house, That out of the money which himself brought into the D common treature, he might be allowed to defray the charges of those plaies and games that he had vowed in Spain during the time of the Souldiers mutiny. Then he called the Embaffadors of the Sagontins into the Senat house: and the most ancient man amongst them spake in this wise:

"Although right honourable, it be not possible to find any more miseries & calamities than we The Oration "haveendured already in the maintenance of our faithful allegeance unto you even unto the end, of the Sagun "yet fuch have your deferts been to us ward, & fo many favours have we received of your cap-tine Embassa. "ving once begun it, ye have continued therein for the full space of 14 years; and that with such "resolution, that of times, as ye have plunded your selves into extream peril & danger, so ye have E "engaged no less the State of the Carthaginians. For at what time as ye had within Italy a cruell "and bloudy war. & Annibal your mortall enemy, ye sent forth your Coss, with armies into Spain, "as it were to gather up the broken reliques of our shipwrack, Pub. and Cn, Cornelii the two bre-"thren, from the first time that they came into the Province, never ceased to devite and do what-"foever might either advantage us, or endamage our enemies. For first and formost they restored "unto us our town again: then having made enquiry throughout all Spain where any one of our "Citizens were fold as flaves, they delivered and redeemed them out of miferable fervitude, and "recovered for them their former freedom But fee; When we were well-near come to this good "pais, that from our poor & pitiful estate we were raised up to a wished for and definable fortune, "then Pub, and Cn. Cornelii your Generals suddenly died: whose death hapned in manner more F" lamentable and dolorous unto us than unto you. For then we thought verily thus of our felves, "That we were reduced from remote & distant places unto our ancient habitation, for this pur-"pole, that we should perish once again, and see a second overthrow and destruction of our native "country: knowing thus much, that for to work our utter confusion there needed not a Cartha-"ginian captain or army to be the instrument and the means; for even the Turdetans alone, our most ancient enemies, who were the cause also of our former ruin and undoing, were able with "their own forces to root us out clean, and extinguish our name. But behold, whiles we were in "these perplexities, immediatly beyond all our hope and expectation, ye sent among us this noble Scipio here in place. In whose behalf we count our selves of all Saguntins most happy because we havefeen him declared Cof, already, and shall be able to report the news unto our neighbours G" and fellow Citizens, that we have beheld with our own eyes, even our whole hope, our help, "our health and fafety. Who having forced & won very many Cities and towns or your enemies "in Spain, at all times and in all places fet the Saguntins apart from out of other prisoners & cap-"tives, and sent them home again into their own country. Finally, as for Turdetavis, a nation so adverse, and so dangerous enemies unto us, that if it should continue still in prosperity, Sagurtum "could not possibly stand upright; he hath by force of arms so quelled and tamed it, that neither "We our selves, nor (be it spoken without arrogance) any of our posterity hereasterneed stand in

" fear of any danger from thence, We fee before our eyes their City rafed, at whose instigation & H "whom for to gratifie Annibal before had rafed Sagnatum: and out of their lands now, we gather " rents and revenues: which contenteth our hearts, not fo much for profit & gain, as for quittance "and revenge. In confideration and regard of these benefits and good turns, which be such, as grea-"ter we cannot hope nor wish for at the hands of the immortal gods: the Senat and people of Sa-" quetum hath sent us ten here in Embassie unto you, for to give you thanks in their name; & with-"all, to rejoyce and congratulate in your behalffor the happy hand ye have made, and the form-" nate exploits ye have atchieved thefe last years past, as well in Spain as in Italy; namely, that ye "have subdued, and do hold in possession all Spein, not only so far as to the river Iberus, but even "to the lands end, and the utmost point lying upon the Ocean sea, And as for Italy, ye have lest no "more ground in it for Annibel and the Carthaginians, than they empale within the compass of 1 " trench and rampier Moreover, we have in speciall charge, not only to render thanksgiving there-"fore to almighty and most gracious Jupiter, the patron of the fortreis and Castle of the Capitol, of but also to offer & prefent unto him it might stand with your good grace and liking this golden crown; and to set it up in the Capitol, in token and memorial of Victory. Which we hum-" bly beseech your HH, of your favour to grant unto us: and moreover, (if it please you) to ratife "and confirm for ever by your authority and approbation; all those benefits, franchiles, and privi-"ledges, which your Generals have of their goodness vouchsafed to endow us with,

The Senatmade this answer to the Saguntin Embassadors, "That both the rasing and also the " rearing again of Sagumum should be a memorable example to all nations, of the faithful socie-"ty and alliance, observed both of the one part and the other inviolate. And whereas their Gene. K "rels had re-edified the City of Saguntum, and delivered the Citizens thereof from fervitude and 66 bondage, they had therein done well and truly, and by direction, according to the will and plea-" fure of the Senat. And what loever elle was performed by them to the good and benefit of the "Saguntins, the Senat flood willing and contented therewith, and gave order therefore, As for "their present and oblation, good leave they had to bestow it solemnly in the Temple of the Ca-"pitol, After this order was given, That the Embassadors should have their lodging appointed them, and presents sent unto them, and all other entertainment at the charges of the City, yea, and by way of a reward, an allowance of no less than ten thousand Asses apeece.

Then were the other Embassadors admitted into the Senat-house, and audience given them, Also the request of the Saguntins was granted to go and see Italy for their pleasure, so far forthis L they might with security of their persons: and certain guides were assigned to conduct and accompany them, with especial letters also directed unto all Cities and towns, for to receive the Spaniards triendly, and give them courteous entertainment.

These things done, the Senators lat in consultation about the state and commonweal, & treated concerning the levying of new armies, & the distribution of the Provinces. Now when as the common brute went that P. Scipio was destined & named to a new province of Affrick, & all mengare out with open voice, that he was the man to be fent thither directly, without casting lots for the matter: and himself besides not resting content now with mean glory, said openly, that he was declared Col, not only for to maintain war but also to finish and make an end thereof once or all which could not be effected by any other means, unless himself in person made a voyage with an M army into Affrick; protetting moreover, That if the Senat croffed and gainfaid this defign of his he would propound it to the people, and carry it away clear by their voices: whiles the principal LL and ancients of the Senat were nothing pleased with this resolution of his, but durst not say a word and speak their minds, either for sear, or for courting of him, in hope of preferment; only Q. Fabins being demanded his opinion spake to the matter in question to this effect,

6 Right honourable and my LL of the Senat, I know ful well, that many of you here affembed of are of this mind &verily periwaded, That we are fet this day to no purpose, but even to comult " & debate of a matter clearly determined; & that in vain he shall spend words, who shall deliver " his advice of the Province of Affrick as of a point as yet doubtful & not resolved upon already. "For mine own part, first I cannot conceive neither will it enter into my head, how Affrikan N "possibly now be accounted as a Province & assigned certainly unto your Cos, (let him beams) "right hardy, & of as much valour as may be) confidering, that neither the Senar unto this day hath " judged it, nor the people ordained & affigued it to any person in the nature and name of Pro-vince. Furthermore, if it were so indeed without all peradventure: then inmy judgment the "Cos, hath done amis, who in making sembiance to put a matter for to be debated, which is al-" ready agreed upon hath deluded and mocked the whole Senat, and not the Senator, who is is "course delivereth his opinion of the thing in question. But I am assured, that in gainsaying and "croffing this hally voyage into Affrick I shall incurthe finisher opinion & surmife of two things "the one is of my usual lingring and slow proceeding in all mine actions (a course that naturally "am given unto) which young men may term at their pleasure, timorousness and laziness but 100 " long as I have no cause to repent theriore, I pass the less. For surely hitherto the advices of others " have ever at the first fight made a goodlier shew, and seemed more honourable; but by exert "ence, mine own waies have fped better, and been found in the end more effectual, The other is " of backbiting detraction, and envying at the glory and reputation of the Cof. a man of ingulat "prowels(I must confels) & whom I see to grow from day to day in greatness and honour, From "which jealousie and suspition, if neither my life passed and the carriage of my self; if neither my

"Dictarorfhip with five Confulthips, nor formuch glory which I have acquired as well in manaaging the affairs of war abroad, as of civil policy at home (that a man would think I should ra-"ther be glutted therewith than defire any more) be able to clear and affoil me; yet my years at "leaftwile may free me very well. For what concurrence and emulation can there be between me "and hint, who is not of equal age with my very fon? When I was Dictator, in the vigour and "flower of my firength, in the very course and train of my greatest and bravest exploits, no man "either in Senat or in the affembly of the people; heard me to refule and deny, That my own Ge "neral of Cavalry, who could not afford me a good word, but ever railed at me (a thing that was never heard before) thould be made equall with my left in command and government. And yet B by good deeds rather than by fair words; I effected and gained thus much in the end, that he, who in the judgment of others was matched with me and made my fellow, confessed within a "while himself to be my interior. Less reason have I then now, after I have gone through all de-"grees of honors and dignities, to enter into contention & emulation with a young gentleman, "of all others at this day most flourishing in the eyes of the world: unless for sooth it be a likely "matter that I (a man weary not only of managing affairs, but also of this world, and of this life) "hould look to have the Province of Affrick offered unto me, if it were once denied him Nay "verily, I have enough already: in that glory I am content to live and die, and feek for no more. "It was fufficient for me to hinder Annibal from archieving the victory; to the end that by you, "who now are gallants in the best of your strength he might be vanquished & overcome, Meet it C sisten and great reason O P. Cornelius, that you should bear with me, and hold me excused if I. "who never in regard of mine own felf fer greater store by the same and opinion of people, than "of the good of the Common-weal) prefer not now your glory before the weal-publike, Andyer "I will not fay, but in case there were no war at all in Italy; or the enemy of that quality as by con-"quering of whom there were no credit & honour to be gotter then he that would feek to keep "you Aillin Italy, were it never fo much for the good of the State might feem to go about to dil-"appoint and frustrate you (in putting you by the charge of the war) of the very means and matter of your glory and renown. But leeing that Annibal is your object, feeing he is our enemy, "who with an entire army fill holdeth Italy as it were befreged now these fourteen years; will you "not O P, Cornel, hold your felf well contented with this honour and reputation, That you being D "Conful, should drive that enemy out of Italy, who hath been the cause of the death of so many "bravemen of ours, and of fo many foils and overthrows that we have received; that, like as C. "Lust atius had the name of finishing the former Punick war, so you may win the title of ending "this other also, Unless that a man would say that Amilear was a warrior and Captain worthy to "bepreferred before Annibal; or that war of more importance than this; or that victory greater "and more honorable than this is like to be, in ease it happen that we may be conquerours under " your conduct and whiles you are Conful. Whether would you chuse rather to have drawn A-"milear away from Drepanum & the mountain of Eryx, than chased and hunted the Carthagini-"ans and Annibal out of Italy? Nay furely, even your own felf (howfoever you embrace glory al-"ready won than hoped for hereafter) would not take more joy & contentment, and triumph ra-E"ther for freeing and delivering of Spain than Itely from the wars. Annibal, I wot, as yet is not "come to that low ebb nor lo down the wind, but that he which made choice of another war. "may feem well in fo doing to fland as much in fear and dread, as in contempt of him. Why then "address you not your self to effect this impress, and leave building these Castles in the air, and "hope by fetching these reaches and this compass, & going the longest way about that when you are passed over into Affrick, Annibal will follow you thicher; and not rather go the next way "to work, and fight with Annibal where he is, and make no more ado? Are you willing indeed "and desirous to win this honour of dispatching quite the Punick war? Why, it is the course of "nature to defend and make fure your own before you go in hand to affail the dominions of o-"thers. Let us have peace first in Ivaly before we make war in Affrick: and let us first rid our selves "of fearere ever we take occasion to put others in fear; unless we had some greater quarrel, And Fair by your conduct and fortunategovernment, both these may possibly be essected; conquer "Annibal here, and then go thither to affail Carthage a Gods name. But if the one or the other of these victories must needs be left for new Consuls to atchieve: as the former of the twain will "be the greater and more memorable, so it will open the way, and give the overture unto the o-"ther entuing upon it. For at this time, over and besides that our treasure, and all the revenues and "finances of our state, are not able to maintain and wage two fundry armies both in Italy and in "Affrick: befides, I fay, that we want the means to keep two Armados affoat, and have nothing "left fufficient wherewith to furnish them with victuals and munition: who feeth not I pray "you how far we engage our felves in peril and danger by this enterprise? P. Licinius shall war in "Italiand P. Scipio in Affrick, What will ye lay if Annibal, (which God forbid, & my heart even "dreadeth to prefage, but that which once hath hapned may happen full wel again) upon the train "of some new vistory, sortune to go forward and assault the City of Rome? Where are we then? "Shall we have time then to fend for you our Cof, out of Africk, as we did for Q. Falv from Ca-" pn ? And what fay you to this befides, That the fortune of war is doubtfull & uncertain even in te Affrick, as well as in other places? Call to mind, and learn betimes by the examples of your own thouse and family, by your father and uncle; who within 30 daies were slain, & their armies de-"feared even there, where for certain years space they had performed both by sea and land most

For what semblable proportion is there between them? When you were in "your voyage for Spain, you failed in the calm fea peaceably along the coaft of Italy and France, "and arrived at Emporie, a friend City and Confederat: and when you had landed your men, you and attives at Large and Allies of the people of Rome, even as far the ded them in fecurity through all places to the friends and allies of the people of Rome, even as far the ded them in fecurity through all places to the friends and allies of the people of Rome, even as far the ded them in fecurity through all places to the friends and allies of the people of Rome, even as far the ded them in fecurity through all places to the friends and allies of the people of Rome, even as far the ded them in fecurity through all places to the friends and allies of the people of Rome, even as far the ded them in fecurity through all places to the friends and allies of the people of Rome, even as far the ded them in fecurity through all places to the friends and allies of the people of Rome, even as far the ded them in fecurity through all places to the friends and allies of the people of Rome, even as far the ded them in fecurity through all places to the friends and allies of the people of Rome, even as far the ded th "Tarracon. From thence ye journeyed all the waies by Cities and towns, furnished with Roman "garrisons. About the river therm you found the armies of your father and uncle, which remained "upon the lois of their Generals more fierce and fell for the calamity that they had received than "before, You met there L. As for all the exploits besides (without offence be it spoken & not to debase any good "fervice there) they are in no respect to be compared with the Affrican war : where we shalled " no haven open to entertain our Armado, no Country peaceable, no City confederate, no King "friendly, no place at all either to fojourn and reft in, or to march forward and pass through with "fafety. Which way foever you cast your eyes nothing but hostility threatning danger and peall "unto us Do you indeed truit Syphax, or rely upon the Numidians? Well, let it suffice that one " ye trufted them. Rash adventures speed not alwaies best. And oftentimes we see, that fraud ke-"meth faithfull, and maketh way of credit in small things, that in matters of greatest importance, "and when the time serveth it may pay home and work a mischief with a witness. The enemies "overcame not your father and uncle by force of arms before that the Celtiberians our Allies "over-raught them by fallhood and treachery: neither were your felf in so much dangersom " Mago and Afdruhal the chief Optains of your enemies, as from Indibilis and Mandonius, your " new friends and confederate. Can you repose any confidence in the Numidians? You, I say that have experience of your own fouldiers mining, and have been them rife against you: Asforsyes phax and Mafaniffa, as they had rather the michvesbe the toveraign & most mighty in Africk, M "than the Carthaginians should; so surely they wish the Carthaginians to be the highestabore " all others besides their own selves. Now at this time there is some emulation and heart-burning "among them, and all occasions of quarrell whet them on to maintain sides and factions, so long "as fear of forrain enemy is far enough off. Shew them once the Roman arms and forces, in "them fee an host of strangers once, they will run I warrant you altogether then as it weren " quench a common scarcfire. You shall find that the very same Carthaginians will far otherwise "Hand to the defence of the wals of their Country, their Cities, the Temples of their gods, that "Altars and private houses, when going to battell they shall have their fearful wives to bearthen "company, their small children to go aforethem in their eye; you shall find them, I say, slick be-"ter to it than they did in the quarrell and defence of Spain. But what and if the Carthaginian, N "finding themselves strong enough upon the considence of the general concord of Africt of "the falt fidelity of the confederate Kings, of the firength of their own wals, should forme "themselves, when they shall see Italy destitute of your help, and dissurnished of their foresei-"ther to make out a fresh army from Affrick and send it into Italy, or else give order and diedi-" onto Mago (who as it is well known for certain, is departed with his navy from the balear "Islands, and lyeth floating and riding continually upon the Alpine Ligurians) for to joynlis "power with Annibal; It is a clear case, that we shall be in as great trouble, and as much affighted then as we were of late, when Afdrubal monnted over the Alpes, and came down into "Italy, Afdrubah, I fay, whom you (that will with your army compals not only Carthage, but allo "all Affrick) let go out of your hands, and fuffered to pass over into Italy, But you will say that 0 "you have vanquished him, Sayyou so? A under their hand: & decreed it was that they two, namely, L. Veturius & Q. Cecilius, should either "The better and more valiant that you are, the more need bath your native country, yes, and all " Italy besides, to keep you still at home with them, so brave a captain, o rare a Protector. You " annot your own felf distemble the matter, but confeste, That whereloever Annibal is, there is "the very head, the fort & strength of all this war; for as much as you pretend, that the only cante "why you would passe into Africk, is to draw Annibal thither after you. Well then, be it here or "beit there, with Annibal you mult have to deal. Tell me then, whether are you like to be stronger if Afric your felt alone, or here where your own forces and the power of your Colleague final be " joyned together? Is it possible that even the late example of Levius and Claudius, so fresh in memory, should not inform and teach us, what difference there is between the one and the o-B "ther? In whither place I pray you, will Annibal be more strong in men and munition; here in the atmost corner & angle of the Brutians country, where this long time he hath waited in vain for said from home; where he hath fent for fuccour and gone without; or neer unto Carthage, and in whe mids of Africk among his friends and allies? What kind of policy is this of yours, there to de-"cide the quarell and try the whole matter, where your own forces are leffe by a halfe moity, and "the power of your enemies much greater and stronger; rather then here, whereas you may Afight with the power of two armies against one, toiled out of heart in so many b ttels, and were "ried with long warfare, to tedious and grievous withall? Confider with your telfe, what confor-"mity and refemblance there is, between your defignes and your fathers. He, as Conful having " made a jorney into Spain, to the end that he might encounter Annibal as he come down the Alps. "returned out of his own province into Italy : and you, when Annibal is in Italy, purpose to a-Cu bandon and leave Italy. And why? for looth not because you judg it good for the common-weal, "but because you think it an enterprise that may import you in great honour and glory : like as " when you being captain Generall of the people of Rome, left your province at random and your "army at fix and feven, without warrant of law, without order or act of Senat, hazarded in two "bothoms the whole state and majesty of the Empire of Rome; which at that time together with "the danger of your life, incurred the perill and jeopardy of the maine chance. To conclude, for " mine own part (my LL. of the Senat,) am of this mind, and this is my conceit, that P. Corneline " was not created Coi. privatly for himself and his own behoof, but for the good of the common-" weal and us all ; and then the armies were levied and enrolled, for the guard of the City and de-" tence of Italy; and not for the Coff. in their proud felf-conceit & overweening of themselves. D "after the manner of absolute KK to transport & lead into what parts of the world they lift themfelves. When Fabius by this oration (premeditate and framed to the time) had through his authoria ty land the long lettled and comfirmed opinion that men had of his wiledome, drawn unto his fide agood part of the Senat, and especially the ancients; insomuch as the greater number commended and the grave counfell of the old man, above the lufty and youthfull courage of the other gallant: then Scipio by way of answer made these remonstrances, and spake in this wife. "My lords of the "Senat, even Fabius himself in the beginning of his oration, said very well, that his opinion which "he was to deliver, might be suspected of detraction and envy. Of which note, verily I doubt not "my telf tax and accule a man of his quality and reputation to much, s methinks is not to well E "clered as it ought to be the very suspition it felf: and I wot not whether it be by a default of his uperch &coration, or that the thing it felf is so pregnant. For in such maner he extelled with good-"ly words, and magnified his own dignities and renowned deeds, and all to quench the jealenge and crime of envy: as if my felf was to fear the danger of emulation and concurrence of some "companion of the baleft degree and condition, and not of him; who because he far surpasseth other "men, (which hight and pitch of honor I deny not, but I endeavour my felf to reach unto) would " not in any hand, that I should compare with him. So highly bath he advanced himself in regard " of his old years, c nidering that he hath gone through all ranks and honour and fo low debated "me, and put me down even under the age of his own ion; as though the defire and love of glory, " should passe no farther then the length of mans life, and the greatest part there of extended not to the memory of posterity and the future time. This I hold for certain, that it is a thing incident to the most magnanimous men and of greatest spirit and courage, to have a defire for to much themselves not only with them that live in their daies, but with most famous & excellent c'personages, that ever were or might be in any age. And surely for mine own part, OQ Fabius, I will not make it goodly, but frankly be wray my mind that way, namely, that I would full fain enotonly attain unto your praise-worthy acts and commendable vertues; but also (with your good cleave be it ipoken) if possible I can, even to excell and furmount the lame. Therfore let us not ca-"tythis mind, either you towards me, or I to thole that are yonger then my felf, to be un willing "and think much, that any one citizen among us, should prove equall to our selves: for in so do-"ing, we should offer wrong and do hurt not only to them whom we have envied and maligned, but also prejudice the common-wealth, & in maner the whole state of all mankind. And thus much "to you left. He hath now (my lords) recounted to what great perils I hould enter into by the A-"frick voyage in such fort, as he would feem not only to have a carefull regard of the common-"wealth and the army, but also to pity me and tender my case and fortune. Whence cometh, it that "you should all on a suddain take so great care for me? when my father and uncleboth were slain, "when their armies both twain, were utterly almost defeated and put all to the sword; when "Spain was loft; when 4 armies of Carthaginians, and 4 Generals, held all in fear by force of "armes; when there was a captain fought for to undertake that war, and no man durft be feen to Ccc 3

e put himselforward, no man so hardy as to present and other his service, but my selt; and when H "the people of Rome had committed the charge and government of Spain to me a young man "but four and twenty years old how happed it that no man then took exception at my age, made "mention of the enemies force, discoursed of the difficulty and danger of the war, or laid abroad the late and iresh deseat and death of my father and uncle ? I would demand and glady know " whether we have insteined now lately, some greater calamity and losse in Africk, than we re-" ceived at that time in Spain? or if the armies at this present in a frick be more puissant, or the "captains more in number, or better in valour, then they were in Spain at that time? or whe-" ther mine agethen, was more ripe and inflicient to manage wars, then now it is? Latt of all, "whether it be better, more commodions & easie, to maintain war with the Carthaginian enemy "in Span, then in Afrek? Alter that I have discomfitted and put to flight four holls of Cartha- I "ginians; after I have either forced by affault, or reduced under mine obeilance (for fear Jioma-" ny Cities; after I have vanquiffied and subdued all, even as far as to the Oceaniea, io many "princes and potentates, fo many fierce and cruel nations; after I have fo full yrecovered Siam as "there is not remaining to be feen there fo much as the footing and bare token of any war: an easie matteritis, and allone to elevat and depresse the acts past that I have at hieved; as also "par-dieit willbe, when I return with conquelt out of africk, to debase and make nothing of "those very things, which now to keep me back from thence, and to make them appear trange, "are amplified with great words, & firetched upon thetainters to the will, He ho deth that there is no accelle, no entranceinto Africk, nor havens open to receive an armado. He telleth us and " alledgeth that M. Ardius was taken pritoner in Africk as if M. A. dius for looth at his fill atri- K " vall in Africk, had caught that harm and heavy mistoriune. But he never remembreth and cal-" leth to mind how that even the very fame captain, as infortunat as ne was yet found thebues open enough into Affrick; and the first year bare himself right valuantly and victoriorsly; & bar "hut f om Carthaginian captains, continued in incible to the end. You flia, never therefore "Icare me with the example fo much, (were it fo, that the calamity you fpeak of hapned intois "war, and not in the former; of late, and not forty years 190) that I should give over my intend-"ed purpose and not failinto Africk now, because Regulus there was taken prisoner; as well as "I passed before into Spain, whereas the Serpios chanced to be killed. Or that I shall inster, that " Zanth ppus the La edemonian was born into this world more hapy tor (arthage, then my "fellfor Lah: but rather that thereby I should think the better of my felt, confidering that the L " vertue of one only man can be of fur he onlequence and to great effect, But we ought (you tay) " to confider the exemple of the Athenians, who leaving the war at home in their own country, "paffed over into Seeily unadvifedly. Seeing you are at fo good leature to tell tales and reput "the fabulous fto ies of Greeces why discourse you not rather of Agathocles the king of the Syram-" fiane? who feeing that Siedy a long time was troubled & reaed with the Punick war, failed over "into the self f. me Africk whereof we speak, and withdrew the warthither from whencet "came? But what need I to infirmet and teach you by rehearing old and forrain eximples, how "materiall a thing it is and important to be gin with an enemy first and put him in fear; and by " hringing another in dinger, to remove the peril from our felves. Can there be a president found "more pregnant more present and resh in memory to prove and en or e this point, then Anni- M "b, I himfelt? A great difference there is between the waiting, and pilling the lands of others, and "feeing of our own burnt and de troied. And he which giveth the affault to endanger another, "is ever of more conrage then he that flandeth upon his own guard and at defen e only to lave "himfelf. Moreover, the fear and dread is alwaies greater of things unknown unto us: butfo "foon as a man is entred into the confines of a forrain country he may behold and ee at hand(as "well the good as the bad) what may advantage and what may endamage the enemies. Annibil would never have thought and hoped, that io many States in Italy would have revolted unto "him as they did upon the overthrow at Canna, How much lefte account then may the Canha "ginions make of any thing in Africk, to remain fast and assured unto them : who are fickle al- N "lies to fitangers without all truth and fidelity; proud lords & intolerable tyrants over their own fubjects, full of wrath & cracky? Over and befides, we albeit (we were for faken and aban-"doned of all our confederats) food alwaies upon our own forces, se mainteined our selves with "meer Roman fouldiers; whereas in Carthage they have no fittingth of naturall citizens: the "foundiers that they have, are mercenaries all & waged for money patrly Africans and patrly No-" midians the most unconstant nations of all others by nature, and aptest to entertain changes & "innovations. Let me have no stay and hindrance in this place only; ye shall hear news at one Stime that I am fet over in Africk that all the country there is up in a broil: that Annib. I is res-"dy to dislodg and remove out of these parts : & also that Carthage it self is befreged, Expect you "daily out of Africk better and luckier tidings, yea and oftner then ye heard out of Spain, Thele 0 "hopes of mine, I ground upon the fortune of the people of Rome; upon the juffice of the gods "witnesses of the league buoken by the enemies upon Syphax and M. fariff. s, both Kings, whole truth and fidelity I will truth fofar forth as I find them. and ever frand in fear and doubt of their truth and in fear and doubt of their contractions. is falshood and trechery. Many things they are now, that by distance of place appear not, which " war once begun will foon discover, And this is a special point of a mm indeed, & of a good captain, in no cale to be wanting unto fortune when the offereth her felf, but to take all vantages If that the giteth : and those acordents and occurrences whichfall by chance to make use of them

A a rea and by wisdome and counsell to frame them to his own purpose and designes. True e it is. O Fabins, I shall have Annital to beard and to match me ; a souldier, I confesse, as a good every way as my felf, but I will rather draw him after me, than he shall keep me back nat home. Force him I will to fight in his own country, and Carehage shall be the price of my vi-"Gory, rather then the decaied peeces, and half ruinat pety castles of the Brutii. Only provide, O (Q. Fabins, that in the mean time whiles I am at fea in my voyage, whiles I amlanding mine aruny in Africk, whiles I approach Carthage with a running camp, the Common-weal fuftein no charm and damage here at home. See to this, I say, and be well advised, that it be not a sharmeefull reproach to lay, that P. Licinius the Conful, a man of fingular valour (who because he is the whigh Priest, and by vertue therof, not to absent himself from the solemn celebration of sacrifices B cand divine lervice, was content and willing, that the charge of to diffant a province should conot befall unto him by casting lots) is not able to perform that, now when Annibalis half defested, and his heart almost broken, which your felf was inflicient to effect when Annibal iquarused it out, and braved all Italy like a conqueror. But let the case, and suppose I say, that by this "course which I mean to take, the war be never the sooner brought to an end : yet intely it were for the honour of the people of Rome, and for the reputation and name which they have camong foreain princes and States abroad, that they may fee and know, that our hearts ferve us anot only to defend Italy, but also to offend Africk. And that it might neither be thought and be-" leeved, nor spoken and noised abroad in the world, how no Roman captain durst adventure that fu which Annibat hath already dared and done: and when as in the former Punick war, when Il the quarell was for Sicily, our armies and armados fo often affailed Africk: now that Italy is in C" question Africk should lie still, and be at rest. Nay, rather let I aly be at repose and quier now at last, after so long traveil and affliction and let Africk in her turn be fired and foreaged another while. Let the Roman camp be pirched rather under the very wals and gates of Carthage, then we see once again from our wals the trench and rampier of our enemies, to invest our City. Let Africk be the fet place and feat of the war, let fright and flight, forraging and harrying "ofcountries, revoltand rebellion of allies, and all other inconveniences and enormities that follow war, which have lien heavy upon us their 14 years, turn from us thither. It shall content "and fuffice me to have spoken as touching State-matters & the commonweal of the war present-"ly in hand; and concerning the provinces and their government now in question and consultation. For it would require a long and tedious discourse, and the same impertinent altogether un-D"toyou, asif Q. Fabius hath defaced and depraved mine acts in Spain, fo I likewise should dis-"grate him and diminish his glory, and set out my self and mine own reputation with goodly "and magnificall words. But my LL. I will do neither one nor the other, And if in nothing elfe, "yetatleastwise, young man as I am, I will in modesty and government of my tongue, go beyond "him as old and ancient a personage as he is. Thus have I lived, and thus have I carried my self in "all mine actions, that without blazing of mine own praises, I can soon content my self with "that good opinion which you of your felves have conceived and entertained of me.

Supio had audience given him, with leffe indifference, and patience because it was commonly voiced abroad, That if the Senat would not grant him to have the province and emprese of Africk he would immediatly propound and put it to question before the people. Whereupon Q. E Fulvius, a man that had been four times Conful and Cenfor befides, required the Conful to speak his mind openly before the Senat, whether he would refer unto the LL, there affembled, to determine of the provinces, and stand to that which they should set down, or prefer the thing unto the people. Winen Scipio had made answer again and said, That he would do that which might be good and expedient for the service of the Common-weal: then Fulvius replied upon him and faid : I demand not this question of you, as ignorant what either you would answer or what you meant to do. For I know full well, that ye pretend no less your self, that you do but found the Senat, and feel rather how they had enclined, then to fland to any advice of theirs in good ladness. And in case we do not presently grant you the province according unto your defite you have a bill framed already to prefent unto the body of the people and Commonalty. FAnd therfore (qd.he.)my matters, ye that are Tribunes, I require your aid and affiltance, in that lfotbear to speak unto the point and deliver thine opinion; in this regard, because I know that the Col. will not approve and ratific the same, how soever the whole house will go with me, and allow my fentence. Hencupon arose some brail & debase among them, whiles the Cos, nrged andenforced this point especially, and said, It was against all reason and equity, that the Tribuns hould enterpose their authority, and not permit every benator being requested to speak in his um force deliver his mind and opinion. Then the Tribuns made a decree in this maner, if the Col becoment that the Senat shall detekmine of the Provinces, we will and command, that all men sell in that which the Senar that ordein and judgineither will we fulfer the fame to be propounded unto the people : if he be not content nor yeeld thereo, then we will affift him who shall reinfe to speak to the matter. Then the Col requested a daies respit to confer with his Collegie, and so the mostow after he condescended to put all to the censure of the Senat. And in this wife were the provinces distributed and appointed : unto one of the Coss. Sicily was assigned, and thirty ships of war, with brazen beak heads (even the fame that C. Servilius the year before had the charge of) with committion also to passe over in Africk, if he thought it were for the good of the Common-wealth. The other Conful had the government of the Brinis and the managing of the war against Annibal, with the power of that army which L. Veturius and Q. Cacilius had cast lots, agree between themselves who should remain still in the Brutians country to sollow a the wars there, with those two legions which the Consol lest i and that whether of them than ced to have that province, his government should be prorounced and continued for another year, the rest of the Pretors also and Consolls, who were to govern any province, or have the conduct of armies, had their commission renewed and sealed again for a longer term. Now it sell to Q. Cacilius his lot, to make war together with the Consoll against Annibal in the Brutians country.

Alterthis, ensued the games and plaies of Scipio; which were exibited and set torth, with great concourse of people and exceeding applaule and affectionat favour of the beholders, M. Pomponius Matho, and Q. Catulus were ient as Embaffadors unto Delphos, to carry thither an offring and stately gift of the booty and plllage of Afdrabal: who presented there a crown of gold weighing two hundred pound : also certain counterfets relembling the spoils, which were made of filver, amounting to a thousand pound weight. Scipia when he could not getleare granted to levy fouldiers and take musters which he greatly forced not of, obteined thus much yet, that he might have with him in his train voluntary fouldiers : as also receive whattoever the Allies would contribute and give towards the building of new thips, be aufe he had passed his word, that the City should not be charged with setting out an armado. And hert and formoth, the States of Hetruria promised to help the Coniul, every one according to their abillity. The Carites came off, and granted to purvey corn and all kinds of victuals for the mariners and failers, the Populonians to provide iron the Tarquinians to find fail cloths, the Volatetrans to fendal tacklings and furniture belonging to ships, and also corn : the Arctines to confer 30000 targets, as many morions or head-peeces, besides javellins darts faulchions, lances, and pikes to the fall K number offifty thousand, as many of the one fort as of the other, also axes, spades and mattocks bils, fithes, and hooks, and fickles, meal, troughs and quern mils, as many as would refeto furnish forty long ships or gallies: of wheat 120000 Modii, and all voyage provision for the Desurions, pety captains, Mariners and Ore-men by the way. The Perulines, the Clinin s, the Rusellans offred fir trees for the framing and making of thips, and a great quantity of corn. But for this work, he occupied only the fir hewn out of the publick forest and wasts. All the States of Vmbria, the Nursines also, the Reatines Amiternines, and the whole country of the Sabines, made promite to help him to fouldiers: the Marsi, the peligni, and Marricines, in great number came of their own free wils, and were enrolled to serve at sea in the navy. The Camertes, be ing allies and confederat to the Romans, but not tied to any service sent a brave company of the L hundred men well armed. And when as there were fet out the keels or bottoms of thirty ships, twenty Caravels of five courie of oars, and ten of four; himfelf in person plied the carpenters and ship wrights so, and set forward the work that 45 daies after the timber was brought out of the wood, theships were finished, rigged, and furnished with all things, and shot into the water, 50 to Sicily he failed with thirty long Thips of war having embarked therein almost seven thousand of voluntary fervitors. P. Licinius also for his part, came into the Brutianscountry unto the two confulrationarmies, of which he took unto him and choice that which L. Veturius the Conful had commanded, and suffered Metellus to have the leading fill of those legions, which had been under his coudust before : supposing that he should more easily employ them in terricebecause they were acquainted already with his monner of regiment and governance. The Pretors M likewise went into their fundry provinces. And because mony was wanting for to delray the charges of the wars, the high Treasurers were commanded to make sale of all that tract of the Campane country, which from the Greek Fosse extendeth towards the sea. And there was granted out a commission to give notice of those lands: and look what ground soever belonged to any citizen of Capha, it was conficat to the use of the people of Rome: and for a reward tohim that gave notice, there was assigned the tenth part of the mony, that the land was rated and prized at. Also C. Servilus the City Pretor, had given him in charge to take order that the Cimpanes should dwel where as they were allowed to inhabit by vertue of a decree granted forthby the Senat, and to punish those that dwelt eliewhere.

In the same summer Mago the son of Amilear, being departed from the lesse Baleare Islands, where he abode the winter featon, and embarked a choien power of young and lufty men failed overinto Italy with a fleet of thirty ships headed with brazen piked beaks, and many hulks of burden: and there he feraland his fouldiers, to the number of twelve thousand footmen, and welneer two thousand horse : and with his suddain coming surprised Genua, by reason that there lay nogarrifons in those parts to guard and defend the sea coasts. From thence he sailed along and arrived in the river of the Alpine Ligarians, to see if he could by his coming raise some commotion and rebellion. The * Ingauni (a people of the Ligurians) fortuned to war at that pretent with certain mountainers the Epanterii. Whereupon Mago having laid up and bestowed facof the prizes and pillage that when he won in * Savo, (a town upon the Alpes) and left ten ships all 0 war riding in the river, for a sufficient guard, and sent away the rest to Carthage for to keep the coaffs at home (because there ran a mighty rumor, that Scipio would pals the seas, and over in to Africk himself, after he had concluded a league and amity with the Ingauni (whole tavour he more affected and esteemed then the other) set in hand to affail the mountainers. Besides, his power increased daily : for that the Frenchmen flocked unto him in all parts, upon noise and voyce of his name. Intelligence hereof was given to the Senat by the letters of Sp. Lucratish who were with these news exceedingly troubled and perplexed for fear lest they had rejoyced in

A vain for the death of Aftenhal, and the defeat of his army two years before; in case there should arise from thence another war as great and dangerous as the other, differing in nothing else but the exchange of the General. And therefore they gave order and direction both to M. Livoius the Pro. Consul, to come forward with his army of Voluntaries out of Tuscary into Arisminus: and also unto Sn. Servitins, the City Practor, (if he thought requisite and expedient for the Commonwalth) to committee two legions of Childran strending about Rome, to whomsolever he pleased, for to be commanded, and led forth of the City. So M. Valerius Lavinus conducted those legions of

About the fame time, certain bulks of the Carthaginians, to the number of four tore, were B boorded and taken about Sardains, by Ca. Ottavins, governor of that province, Calins writeth that they were loaden with corr and viguals fent unto Aintid. But Valerins reporteth, that as they were carrying the pillage taken in Harvarin and certain prifoners of the Eigerian mountainers; into Carhage, they were intercepted and firefrized by the way. There was no memorable thing that year done in the Brutians country. The petilence raighed as well amongst the Romans as the Carhaginians, and they died thereof alike on both fides. Mary the Carthaginian army, before the plague, were afflicted also with famine, Annibal passed all that summer time near unto the Terriple of Jun Lacinia, where he built and reared analtar, and dedicated it with a glorious title of his worth acts, seprence no Publick and Greek ketters.

Ains Laliusbeing fent from Scipio out of Sicily into Affrick, brought from thence a huge booty, and Checkeed unto Scipio the credence and me flage that he had from Malanista, who complained of hime that he had not as yet paffed over with his fleet into Affrick. The war in Spain which Indibilis had raifed wie dispatched: himself slain in the field: and Mandonius was delivered by his own men into the Roman hands that demanded hims of them. Mago, who was in France and Liguria, had out of Affrick lent unto him both a great power of fouldiers, and also money to wage aids with a commission and precept tojon himself unto Annibal. Scipio croffed the Seas from Syracuse imothe Brutil, and recovered the City Locti, after he had discomfited the garrison there, and put to slight Annibal. Peace was concluded with Philip, The gooddest Dame Idea was brought solemnty to Rome from Pellinus, by occasion of a pro-puse sound in the books of Sybilla to this effect: That then the forrain enemy might be driven out of Italy, when Dame Cybele of Ida was brought to Rome. And to the Romans she was delivered by Attalus King of Alia. A thick stone it was, and nothing else, which the Inhabit ants called the mother of the gods. P. Scipio Nasica, the fon of that Cneus who was killed in Spain, judged by the Senat a right good man, outhat was very young, and had not been yet so much as Questor, was be that received here for it was by the tracke imported, that the said goddess should be received by the best man of the City, and so didicated. The Locrians fent their Embassadors to Rome, to complain of the outrage and crucky of Q. Plemimusthe Lieutenant : in that he had unjustly taken away the money consecrated to Proferpina, and villanoufly forced their wives and children. Pleminius was brought bound with chains to Rome, and there dud in prison. There ran afalse rumour of Pub. Scipio, (Pro-Consul in Sicily) and spre d as far as to the City. That he foould spend his time there in riot. Whereupon there were sent certain messengers from the Senat for to enquire and fee whether those reports were true. And Scipio being cleared from all infanty, by the permission and good leave of the Senat, failed over into Affrick. Syphax affianced and wedded the daughter of Aldrubal the son of Giso: and thereupon renounced clean the amity which he hed ontralid with Scipio. Malanistathe King of the Massylians, whiles he served in the wars in defence of the Cathaginians quarrel within Spain, after he had loft his father Gala, was with il differed of his kingdm. And when he had offentimes fought to recover it again by war, he was in certain leastest evaguished b Sphax King of the Numidians, and utterly deprived of his royall dignity. So with two hundred hor famente joyned as a banished person with Scipio: and with him, immediation the first batell be flow Hannothe son of Amilcat, together with a great number of men. Scipio apon the coming of Aldribal and Syphan, who were almost 100000 strong, was compelled to breck up the fire at Utica: and so he forthid a flanding camp for winter harbour Semptonius the Conful had a fortunate hartel ugainst Annibal in the territory of Croton. The Cenfors held felemin review and parging of the City and numbered the people: In which survey taken there were affeffed in their books 21 5000 Citizens. Between the two Cenfors M. Livius and Claudius Nero, there fell out a notable difcord: for C. Claudius rook from Livius (companion with him en office) his horse of service: for ela: be had been sometimes condemned by the Peril of Rome, and driven into exile. And Livius again did the like by him, because be hid born false wines against him, and not dealt bona fide with him, considering the reconciliation between them, Cipio after he was arrived in Sicily, disposed his voluntary souldiers in order, and etrolled them by Centuries. Over and befides them he had about him three hundred lufty tall fellows for the flower of their age and firength of body, the bravest men of all others: but they wist not themselves for what purpose they were reserved; being neither assigned to any co. I lours under a Captain, nor so much as armed at all. Then he made choice from our of the whole manhood and youth of Sicily three hundred men of arms, such as for birth and wealth were the very principall and best in the Island, who were to pass over with him into into Affrick: and he appointed them a day, upon which they should all present themselves in readiness, surnished and appointed in the best manner with horie and armor. This warfare so far from home was like to be irksome unto them, and to bring with it much trouble, many difficulties and dangers, as well by fea as land. The confideration and fear hereof mightily disquieted not only the parties themfelves, but also their parents and kinsfolk, Now when the day appointed was come, they shewed their horses and armour. Then Scipio made a speech unto them, and faid, " That he was givento " understand, that certain Sicilian horsemen stood in great fear and dread of this souldier, as K "being a fore and painfull piece of fervice: In case then (quoth he) there be any of you so min-" ded and disposed indeed, I had rather you would now presently be known thereof unto meand confess at once, then hereafter to whine and complain, and so to prove lazy lubbers and un-" profitable fouldiers to the Common-wealth. And therefore utter your minds in plain terms, and I will be content to hear you without offence. Whereupon, when as one of them tooks good heart, and faid flatly, "That if it lay in his choice freely to do what he would, he was also gether unwilling to ferve: then Scipp answered him again in this manner, Forasmuch as my " youth) thou half not dissembled thy hearts grief, but spoken out what thou thinkest, I will soon depute one in thy turn unto whom thou maiest deliver thy armour, thy horse, and other simi-"ture of warfare, and whom thou shalt forthwith have home with thee, there to train, teach & I exercise him after thou hast given him thy horse and armor. The young man was glad hereofind accepted the offer upon that condition: and so he affigned unto him one of those three hundred above faid, whom he kept about himself unarmed. When the rest saw that horseman in this manner discharged of his service, and that with the savour and good will of the L. General : every man then began to peak for himself, and to make excuses, and took others in their sead. Thus for the three hundred Sicilians were aubitituted as many Roman horlemen, without any expentes stall of the State, And the Sicilians themselves had the charge of instructing and training themup. For the Generall had made an Edict and Proclamation, That who foever did not fo, should frehimfelf in person, This proved by report a brave cornet of horsemen above the rest; and in many battels performed right good fervice to the Common-weal. After this, he took a furvey of the legi-M gions or tootmen: and all those who had born arms longest in the wars he selected forth, especially fuch as had been employed under the conduct of Marcellus. For those he well wist to have been brought under the best discipline of warfare, and also by reason of the long siege of Syracuse, to be most skilfull in assaulting of Cities, For now they were no small matters that he had inhis head, but he plotted even the very destruction and ruin of great Carthage, After this, he divided histmy and placed severall forces in fundry towns. The Cities of Sicily he enjoyned to provide coms he made spare of that which was brought out of Italy; the old ships he newly repaired and igged, and with them he fent Lelius into Affrick for to prey upon the country and fetch in pixes, the new which rid at Panormus he drew up to land, that they might all winter long lie upondry ground, and be seasoned, because they were made in haste of green timber, When he had prepary ted all things necessary for war, he came to the City of Syracuse, which as yet was not in good of der and well quieted, fince the great troubles of the late wars, For the Greeks made claim for their goods granted unto them by the Senat of Rome, which certain of the Italian nation detained and with-held from them by the same violence, wherewith in time of war they had possessed themfelves thereof. He supposing it meet and requisite to maintain above all things, the credit of the State ; partly by vertue of an edict and commandment, and partly by a civil course and process of law against such as were obstinate and avowed their wrongs done, he forced them to makere Ritution to the Syracufians. This act of his pleased not only them, but also all the states of Sicilyi and therefore they were more willing and forward to help him in the wars.

The same summer there arose in Spain great troubles, raised by the means of Indubits the lierogete for no other occasion or reason in the world, but because in regard of the high admixation of Scipio, all other Captains besides what foever were but despised. "Him they supposed to be the only General that the Romans had left, now that all the rest were slain by Annibal. And heter only General that the Power has when the two Scipios were killed, they had no other to send in the sign but him: and afterwards, when the wars grew hot in Indy, he was the only manism to over to match with Annibal, And over and besides that, the Romans had now in Spain no Captain of the state of th

A tains at all, but in bare name and shew: the old experienced army also was from thence with drawn. All things are out of frame, and in great continion. & none there, but a disordered fort of traw fresh water fouldiers. And never they looked to have again the like occasion & opportunity of orecover. Spain out of their hands. For hitherto they had ever been in subjection to that day, weither to the Carthaginians or the Romans, and not alwaies to the one or the other, by turns, what other whites to both at once, And like as the Carthaginians have been driven out by the Romans, so may the Romans be expelied by the Spaniards, if they would hold together. So that in when d Spain being freed from all fortain war, might be restored for ever to the ancient cut of some and rights of the country. With these and such like suggestions and discourses, be folicited and tailed not only his own tubjects and countrimen, but the Austrans also, a neighbour-napion, yea, and other States and Cities that bordered upon his and their confines; so as within sew diese there assembled together into the territory of the Sedetans (according to an Edict published abroad) thirty thousand foot, and fast upon four thousand horsemen.

The Roman Captains likewise for thir part, L. Lemulus, and L. Manlius Acidinus, lest by neglested of the first beginning, the war might grow to a greater head, joyned their forces together. and marching through the country of the Auterans, as peaceably as if they had been friends, (notwithflanding they were known enemies) came to the very place where they were encamped and nitched themselves within three miles of the enemies. At the first they assaied by way of Embasfaceto deal with them, and to perswade them to lay ande all arms and hostility: but they laboured in vain. Afterwards, when as the Spanish horsemen gave charge suddenly upon certain Romans that were forraging, the Romans also sent out from their Stations and Corps de guard their Cavalry to rescue : so the horsemen skirmished, but no memorable act to speak of was effected on the one fide or the other. The next morrow by fun-rifing the enemies all shewed themselves armed and in order of battel, and braved the Romans within a mile of their Camp. The Aufetans were marshalled in the main battel; the Hergetes in the right point, and certain other Sp. nish nations of base and mean account in the left: between both those wings and the battel, of either hand they left certain wide and void places, whereas when the time ferved they might put forth their horiemen. The Romans having embattelled and put themselves in array after their old and ulual manner, yet in this one thing followed the examples of the enemies, in leaving out certain open waies between the legions for the men of arms to pass through, But Lent, lus supposing that thene of the horie-fervice would be advantagious to that part which first should send out their Cavalry into the battell of the enemies, that lay to open with spaces between, gave command. mentto Ser, Cornelius a Knight Marshall or Tribune, to will and charge the Cavalry to set to with their horses and to enter those open lanes between the enemies battaillons. And himself having feed but badly in beginning the fight with footmen fo rashly, staid no longer, but untill he had brought the thirteenth legion (which was fet in the left wing opposite to the Ilergetes) out of the rereward into the vanguard, for to succour and strengthen the twesth legion, which already began to shrink and give ground. After that once the skirmish there was equall and fought on evenhand, he advanced forward to L. Marlius, who in the forefront of the battell was buffe in encouraging his men, and fending supplies and succours into all parts where he saw needfull: thewing unto him, that all was well and whole in the left point, and that he had fent out Cornelianywho with his horsemen, would like a tempessuous storm come upon them, and soon overcast and beipread the enemies round about. The word was not fo foon spoken but the Roman horiemen were ridden within the thickest of the enemies, and not only disordered the arraies and companies of the footmen, but also at once shut up the waies and passages that the Spaniards could not make out with their horsemen. And therefore the Spaniards leaving to fight on horseback, alight on foot. The Roman Generals seeing the ranks and files of the enemies disarraied, themselves in fright and fear, and their ensigns waving up and down every way; fell to exhorting, yea, to entreating of their own Infantry to recharge them with all their force, whiles they were thus troubled and disbanded, and not fuffer them to come into order, and re-enforce the battell again. And furely the barbarous people had never been able to abide their violent impression, but that Indibilis himself their Prince and Lord, together with the men of arms that were now dismounted on foot. made head against the ensigns of the footmen in the vanguard. Whereupon enfued a sharp and cruell fight for a good while. At length, when as they that fought about their Prince (who first, although he were half dead, yet stood their ground and afterwards with a javelin was nailed to the earth) were overwhelmed with darrs, and flain; then they began to flie on all hands: but the greater number were killed in the place, because both the horemen had no time nor space to recover their horses, and mount upon them again and also the Romans pressed so horly upon them after they were once discomfitted, and never gave over untill they had ftript the enemies quite out of their Camp. So there died that day thirteen thouland Spaniards, and well near eight hundred were taken pritoners. Of Romans and Allies, not many more than two hundred left their lives behind them, and those especially in the left point. The Spaniards, that either were driven out of their Camp, or escaped out of the battell, first ran scattered and dispersed over the fields, and afterwards returned every man to his own City where

Then Mandonius fummoned them to a generall councill: where they all bewailed their calamities & mileries, greatly blamed the authors of the war, and agreed in the end to fend their embafadors sadors to give up their arms, and to yield their bodies. These having excused themselves and laid u the whole tault upon Indivitiv & the rest of the Princes who were the stirrers of the war. & were for the most part flain themselves for their labour in the field, yielded up their armour and themfelves, and received this answer from the Romans: That they should be received to merry, and their tubmission accepted it they would deliver alive into their hands Mandonius, and the rest that were the breakers of peace. Otherwise, they threatned to lead their forces into the territones of the llergetes and Auletans and to forward, of the other nations their complices in that rebellion With this answer the Orators departed, and related the same in the councill assembled. Where Mandonius and the rest of their Lords were apprehended & delivered to the Romans for to be punished and executed accordingly. So the States of Spain obtained peace again: and a double tibute for that year was imposed upon them, and they enjoyned to provide corn to serve the army I fix months bendes fouldiers liveries, fhort coats, and fide caffocks; and they received hottages welnear of thirty Cities. Thus the troubles and rebellions of Spain being begun and ended after this manner, without any great ado within few daies, all the force of the war turned upon Affrick

C.I. clius being arrived in the night at Hippo Royall, by the break of the day, led forth with ban ner displaied in order of battel all his fouldiers and mariners, for to harrey and spoil the country. And finding the inhabitants there retchles and careless, and living in tecurity as in time of peace. they did much hurt and annoied them fore, Whereupon the news went in post to Carthage, let all on a hurry & put them in exceeding great fear. For it was reported that the Roman Armado was arrived, and that Scipio the General was landed (for the rumour ran before, how he waspaffed over already into Sicily.) And because they never descried the ships, nor discovered certainly what K power of men invaded and ipoiled the country, they thought the most and doubted the works fear commonly maketh every thing more than it is. And lo at first they were only affrighted and terrified; but afterwards they grew melancholly and troubled in spirit in these tearms, to think "That fortune should so much be changed, that they, who a little before as noble conquerors had 66 lain encamped with an army before the walls of Rome, deleated fo many hofts of enemies, and "ceither by meer force or meer love, held all the States of Italy under their Signory, should now "themselves ee the wheel so turn about, as they were like shortly to behold the wasting and spoi-"sling of Affrick, and the City of Carthage befreged: a thing that they were never able to a dure with that valour and resolution, nor to abide with such strength as the Romans had, for "the Romans had ever the Commons of Rome; they had alwaies the youth of Latium ready L "hand; who fill encreased more and more the new fry, and daily grew in number to makein ecply, and to repair & furnish out so many armies that were descated. Whereas, their natural pro-" ple were neither in town nor country fit for service, their aids were waged and hired for money of from among the Africans, a nation like to turn upon any accident, & to change with every gale " and puff of vain hope, and were besides salse and unsaithful in their promise, For now the Kings " already, S; ph. x and M. faniff s, the one upon conference with Scipio is fecretly alienated from us inheart, and the other openly revolted in action, and become our most deadly enemy: so that "there remaineth neither help nor hope for us at all in any place, For neither Mago is able in Gant "to make any commotions and rebellion nor yet to joyn with Annibal: And as for Annibal him-66 felf, he weareth apace, and decaieth daily both in fame and reputation, and also instrength and the "forcible means, When their minds being thus disquieted upon those fresh and present tidings, they were fain to bewail and iament their wofull state, the instant danger recalled them again to confult by what means they might withfland the imminent perils, So they thought good totale musters in all haste both in the City and the countries by, to send some to levy and wage the aids of the Afficans, to fortifie their City, to bring in store of grain, to provide weapons and armor, to rig their navy & to fend it out to Hippo, for to encounter the Roman Armado, Whiles theywere deviling these courses, there came at last a post with news, that it was Lalius and not Scipiwho was fet ashore; that there was landed no greater power than for to make rodes into the country for booties only: and as for the main strength of the whole army, it remained still in Sicily, So they had some respit to breath themselves, & began to address their Embassies to Syphax and to other N Princes, for to ellablish and confirm peace and league between them. They dispatched others alfo to Philip, who should make promise unto him of two hundred talents of silver, in case he would take the feas and pass over either into Sicily or Italy, Messengers also were sent as far as into Itaby unto their own Generals ferving there, to will them to raise what troubles they could possibly, for to keep Scipio awork, and hold him backfrom coming into Affrick. And unto Mago were lent not only those messengers aforesaid, but also five and twenty long ships of war, fix thousand soot men, eight hundred horiemen feven Elephants, and great flore of treasure besides for to hire aids, whereby he might advance forward with his torces nearer to Rome, and joyn with Annibal, Theke preparations were making, and these courses devising at Carthage, when as Masanissa upon the bruit that went of the arrivall of the Roman fleet, began to statt up and rouze himself; and and companied with some few horsemen, came unto Lalius, busie in driving still great bootison of the country, which he found altogether disfurnished of armour, and unprovided of guids and garrisons for defence. "He much complained that Scipio was so flack in his affairs, and grie-" ved that he had not passed over ere this time with an army into Affrick, whiles the Carthele nians were thus affrighted, whiles Sphan was troubled with the wars of the borderers of whom "he was thus much perswaded, that if he might have resting time to compose his own affairs

A "to his mind, he would not continue falt unto the Romans, nor deal in any thing faithfully and of one munique them: willing him to follicit Seipio, yea, and to four him on and importune him not to fland longer at a bay and make delayes. And for his own part, not with flanding he were difcized of his fathers Kingdom, yet he would be ready to affift him with fuch a power of foot and horse as were worth God amercy: advising Lelius withal not to make any longer stay in Africk. hore as were worth God anterest, agrained Louise with a not compared any ionger tray in Africa, for almuch as he believed verily, that there was a fleet already fet out from Carthage, with which in the ablence of Scipio, he might not with fafety enter into conflict and battail. After this communication, Majaniffa was dismifled, and Latins the next day loosed from Hippo, with this Communication, stage and prizes: and being returned into Sicity, declared unto Scipio the counsel and credence that he had from Mafaniffa.

About the very same time thoseships which were sent from Carthage to Magos Coasting along the Albiganians and the Ligurians, arrived at Genna, It fortuned that Mago at that time, lay with his fleet in those parts: who upon the words of the messengers, & the commission to raise as great force as possibly he could, immediatly held a counsel of the Frenchmen and Ligurianssfor of both nations there were great numbers in those coasts. "Where before them all he declared how he ministrate were great manners in those sources and how (as they might fee themselves) to that "western that the ment aid and faccour from home. But what forces, and how great anarmy was needful for the managing of the war in hand, it lay in them to determine. As for himieli, first and formost he knew in wel that there were two Roman armies abroad, the one in "France the other in Tuskany; and that Sp. Lucretim would joyn with M. Livius: and therefore C" they themselves were to put many a thousand in arms, for to make head against two Generals, & two compleat armies of Romans, The Frenchmen made aniwer again, That their will was good enough, and they had an exceeding defire to compais and effect the defignment intended: but "for almuch as the Romans had one camp within their confins, and another in Tuscany neer ad-"joyning and in manner within fight; if peradventure they should be seen in the action to aid the "Cirthaginians; incontinently both armies, as well the one as the other would in all manner of hossility invade their territories: and therefore they requested him to defire of the Gauls such "things, wherein they might (tand him in (tead fecretly under hand, As for the Ligurians, because the Romans lay far enough off encamped from their Lands & Cities, they might dispose well e-"nough of themselves as they list: and therefore it was good reason that they should put their "young & able men in arms, & bear a part in the managing of the war. The Ligurians refuted nor. Only they craved respit of two moneths, for to take the musters. In the mean time Mago, having fent away the Gauls, closely took up & prest souldiers throughout their countrey Towns for money, And from the States of France, there was fent fecretly provision of victuals of al forts unto him.

Marcus Livius led his army of Voluntaries out of Tuscany into France, and having united his forces unto Lucretius his power, was ready to receive and welcome Mago, if haply he removed out of the Ligurians countrey neerer to the City of Rome: but in case Mago kept himself quiet in acomet under the Alps, he minded also himself there to keep his standing leaguer about Ariminum, for the guard and detence of Italy.

After the return of C. Lelins out of Affrick both Scipio was pricked forward by the infligations E and perivations of Masanisa: and also his souldiers, seeing great prizes brought out of the enemies Land, and every ship fraight therewith; were mightly incensed and set on fire with a burn-ing defire to be transported over thither with all speed possible, Bur as they were plotting about this enterprise of greater importance, they thought also upon a lesser that came between namely the winning again of the City of Locri, which in the general revolt of all Italy, had fided also with the Carthaginians. The fifth hope that they conceived both to affect and effect this enterprilegrew upon a very small matter; by occasion that in the Brutians countrey, the whole manperoffervice was performed by way of robbing and roving, rather than by any ordinary course ofwar. The Numidians fifth began, and the Brutii soon took it up and seconded them: not so much because they would keep the Carthaginians company, and do as they did; but for that of their own natural inclination they were prone, and ready enough to follow that course. At lack the Roman fouldiers also, infected as it were by their example, took delight in robberies: and so far forth as they might have leave of their Captains, would make inrodes into the territories of their enemies. It fortuned to, that when some of them were gone abroad a plundring, certain Locinus were intercepted, and brought away with them to Rhegium. In which number of captives, were some carpenters and maions, who as it chanced, were hired to work for the Carthagillias in the Castle of Lacri. These were discovered and known by certain great men, and the Principal citizens of the Locrians, who hapned then to live as banished persons in Rhogsams, such as by the contrary faction that banded with Annibal and had delivered Locri into his hands, were driven our of the City. These men fell to questioning with them (as commonly their manner is, who have been long out of their own Country) of many matters, and among the rest, how all things fared at home: who told them all accordingly; and therewith, put them in some good hope, that if they might be ransomed, set at large, and sent home again, they would betray the Calle into them: for afmuch as within it they dwelt, and the Carthaginians put them in trust of althings there. They therefore, as men that were wonderful defirous to return thither, as well for her native country, as for to be revenged of their advertaries, out of hand paid their ranione; and after they had given order how to work the fear, and in what fort; as also agreed upon the figns and tokens which they should mark from on high a far off, they were sent back H again. Then the exiled Locrians repaired unto Scipio at Spracuse, with whom also were others of the banished perions of Locri: and there they related unto him the promises of the captives afore. faid, and put the Conful in very good hope that theeffect would be correspondent to their defignment, With them were lent two Tribuns or Marshals, to wit, M. Sergius and P. Matienus, with commission to conduct three thousand souldiers from Rhegium to Locri. Letters also were dispatched unto Q. Pleminius the Vice-pretor, for to be affiltant in this action, Who being departed from Rhegium, and carrying with them scaling ladders, proportioned to the height of the Catlle wall fore told unto them, about midnight gave a token by fire to those that were to betray the Castle, from that place which they had agreed upon: who being in readiness also, and looking wittly for them, put down likewise ladders of their own, made for the purpose; and in many places I at once received them that climbed up : so as, before there was any alarm heard, they set upon the watch of the Carth ginians, fast asleep as they were, and distrusting no such matter: who first were heard to grone as they lay a dying, but afterwards, to make a noise and keep a running and much ado, upon their fuddain starting from sleep, all the whiles that they wist not what the occasion was. At length, upon the discovery of the matter, one man wakened another, and every one called aloud to arm; crying out, that the enemies were within the Castle, and the watchmen flain, And without question, the Romans had been put to the worse and deseated quite, beingfar fewer in number than the enemies, but that there was an outcry and shout set up by them that were without the fortres; which so long as men knew not from whence it came, put themin in geat fear: and the tumult besides by night made every small and vain thing much greater than it K was. By means whereof, the Carthaginians aftonied (as if all places had been full of enemies) abandoned all fight, and betook themselves into the other fortress (for two there were distant not far afunder.) The Townsmen kept possession of the City, as the prize and guerdon in the mids for the winners. But out of the two Cattles there were light skirmishes every day. Q. Pleminius was Captain of the fort and garrison of the Romans, and Amilear over the Carthaginians: and both parts increased their strength, by aids that they had coming unto them from the places adjoyning, Until at last Annibal shewed himself in person: and no doubt the Romans had never been able to hold out, but that the whole multitude of the Locrenfians fore galled and grieved with the proud government and the covetous polling of the Carthaginians, took part with the Romans. When intelligence came to Scipio, that the Romans were diftreffed in Locri, and that Annibal himself wit L advancing thither: for fear lest the garrison also should be in some hazard (as having no ready means to retire from thence) himself leaving at Meffana his brother L. Scipio for the guard of the place, passed over from thence with his vessels down the water, when he espied the current and the tidetogether to serve for a fare. Likewise Annibal having sent out a vancurrier from the River Butroins (which is not far from the City Locri) to fignify unto his men, that by day light they should give a hot charge with all their might and main upon the Locrensians and Roman both, whiles he himself made an assault upon the Town behind, not looking for him, but wholly used away and amused upon that other tumult. Now when as early in the morning he found the skirmish begun, he was not willing to put himself within the Castle, for sear of pestering with over great a company the place so threight and of so small receipt: and for to scale the walls they had M brought no ladders with them. So causing all their carriages and packs to be piled up in one heap together : he presented all his footmen in battail array before the City, to terrific his enemis withal: and with the Numidian horsemen he made a bravado under the walls, and rodeabout the City. Whiles the ladders and other ordinance meet to give an affault, were in preparing and making ready, he approached on horseback neer to the wall, for to view on which part above the rest, he might give the assault: and there he was shot with a quarel discharged from an engine called a Scorpion, which hapned to be planted next unto him. And being affrighted at this fo dangerous an occurrent, he commanded to found the retreat, and fortified his camp aloof with out the peril and shot of any dart. Now was the Roman fleet from Messana arrived at Lects, and had the day afore them : so as they were all set a land, and entred the City before the sunseting, N The morrow after, the Carthaginians began to skirmish out of the Castle: and Annibal being now provided of ladders, and having all things else in readiness needful for the assault, came under the walls: with that, all upon a suddain the Romans set open a gate and sallied out upon him, who feared nothing less than any such accident: and thus setting upon them at unawares, slew two hundred of them. Annibal perceiving that the Consul was there, retired with the reft into the camp: and after he had fent a messenger to them that were within the Castle, willing them to this for themselves, in the night season he dislodged and departed. They also who were inthe fort, after they had fet on fire the houses which were in their keeping, of purpose by that tumult to cause the enemy to make some stay and tarry behind, ran away in manner of a rout and before it was night with good footmanship overtook their own company, Scipioseeing as well this Ca. O file quit by the enemy, as their camp also empty, called the Locrenses to a general affembly, and gave them a sharp check, and rebuked them for their revolt. The principal Captains & Authors of that trespais he put to death; and gave away their goods to the chief heads of the other sachi on, in reward and confideration of their fingular fidelity to the Romans. But as concerning the publickstate of the Locrians, he said he would neither make nor medle therewith, either ingiving to them, or taking ought at all from them. But willed them to fend their Embassadors to

A Rome, and look what the Senat would award in equity, that fortune they should abide. This one thing he was well affured of that how illfoever they had deferved of the people of Rome, yet they hould live in better condition under the fignory of the Romans, provoked to anger as they were. than they had already under the government of Carthaginians, pretending love and amity as they did. Then himlelf in person cut over to Messana with those forces that he brought with him, leaving Pleminius his Lientenant, and that power that won the Castle, in garrison for the desence of the City. The citizens of Locri had been to proudly mituted, and locruelly handled by the Carthaginians, after they were revolted from the Romans, that it feemed they could be content to abide any small wrongs, not only patiently but also willingly, and in manner with a glad heart. But so far R now exceeded Pleminius, Amilear the former captain of the garrifonito far went the Roman garrison souldiers, before the Carthaginians in wickedness & avarice, that a man would have thought they had strove together who should pass the other in single vice and ungodlines, and not in teats of arms and prowels. For neither Captain nor fouldier forbare to practife upon the poor Townsmen any enormous facts, which are wont to make the great & mighty men odious unto the poor and meaner persons. They wrought and committed shameful villanies upon their very bodies; upontheir wives and children. And their greedy avarice for ar proceeded, that they could not hold their hands from spoiling and robbing the very religious and sacred Temples. Insomush, as among other holy Churches which they polluted, they met even with the rich measure of Proferpina, which had lien still in all ages, and untouched by all others: tave only it was reported to have been Cpilled by Pyrrhus, who indeed carried away the spoil of her, but he deerly bought it, and paid full sweetly for that sacriledge. And therefore like as before time the Kings ships shaken with tempells, and torn and split with the rage of the Sea, brought nothing at all in that wreck ide to Land, but only that facred mony of the goddels, which they had folm and carried away; even fo at this present, the very same mony (but in another kind of calamity and misery) brought uponall them that were tainted in that wicked action of robbing the Temple, a strange & frantickmadness; which caused Captain against Captain, and souldier against souldier, to sare as if they were flark mad, and enraged as mortal enemies one with another. Pleminius had the chief rule and command of all. As for the fouldiers, some were under him, such as himself had brought from Command of any As for the commanded by the Tribuns of Colonels. Now it chanced that one of D Pleminias his fouldiers had stoln a filver cup out of a Townsmans house, and ran away when he had done; and the owners after him with hue and try, and fortuned to come in the way, and to meet with Segius & Mattenus the two Tribbins or Colonels full in the face. Whereupon the cup was taken from him by the commandment of the Tribuns; and thence arole first a braul, and some hard words were dealt between; and from them consequently they went to open clamors and loud outcries, until at length there grew a very fray between the fouldiers of Pleminius and of the Tribung and according as they came still one or other in time to help their own fide, both the number and the riot increased at once. In the end, Pleminius his men went away with the blows, and mouned themselves unto Pleminius, running to him with open mouth and great indignation, shewing their bloudy wounds: and teporting besides, what opprobrious words to his Edigrace had passed against him without spare, in the time of those brawling sits. Hereupon in a great choler and boyling heat of blond, he gat him forth of doors in all the half ; convented the Tribuns before him, and commanded them to be stripped naked, and the rods to be brought forth ready for to scourge them. But whiles there was some time spent in turning them out of their apparel & uncafing them (for they firugled & made refiftance and called to their fouldiers for help) al at once they came thick about them (for very losty they were upon their fresh victory) and ran from all places, as if the alarm bell had been rung against the coming of some enemies. But when they faw once the bodies of their Tribunes tewed with rods, then they fell into far more furious rage and a very fit of madness: and thus incensed as they were, without all regard not only of the reverent majesty of authority, but also of common humanity, they fell upon the Lieutenant himfiels, after they had most pittiously beaten and evil intreated his Lictors and Officers about him. Then having fingled him out apart from his Ministers and Sergeants, they cruelly mangled him, cutoffhis nofe, cropt his ears, and left him for dead. News hereof came to Messana, and within few dayes Scipio highed him apace to Locri in a gally directed with fix banks of oars: who after due examination and hearing of the cause between Pleminius and the Tribuns, acquit Pleminius as innocent, and left him Governour of the garrifon of the place: but he judged the Tribuns guilty, as Malefactors, and caused them to be bound in chains for to be sent to Kome unto the Senate: and so he returned to Messa, and from thence to Syracuse. Pleminius not able to over-rule his anger, and thinking that Scipio had dealt but coldly and negligently in the matter, and made too light of the injury which he had received, and not punished the offenders accordingly; and iupopolog that here was no man elfe able to make true estimate of the cause, but he that in his own person had felt the indignity and hainouiness thereofs commanded the Tribuns to be haled before him, and after he had put them to all the cruel torments, that any mans body is able to abide, he por them to death: and not fatisfied either with their dolorous forture whiles they were quick, not with taking their lives from them, cast their dead bodies forth into the fields, there to lie abore ground annuried. The like cruelty he exercised upon the principal Burgesses of the Locrians, such as he heard fay went to Scipio for to make complaint of his wrongs and injuries, And look

what foul and shameful pranks he had plaid afore with his friends and allies, proceeding of lust H and coverousness; the same now in his sell and furious rage he multiplied and wrought in divers forts: so as he brought infamy, hatred and obloquy, not only upon himself, but also made the world to think hardly, and to speak much shame of the General himself.

Now drew the time neer of the folemn election of Magistrats; when as there came letters to Rome from Pub. Licinius the Conful, the tenor whereof was to this effect: That himself and his army were fore vifited with a grievous ficknes: and that he could not possibly have staid there, but that the violent contagion and influence of the fame malady, if not greater & more grievous. had not assailed the enemies. Seeing that therefore himself was not able to come unto the cledion, he was minded, if it might to ftand with the good liking of the Lords of the Senat, to nominat as Dictator Q. Cecilius Metellus, for to hold the toresaid election. And as for the army of Q. Ceci-I lins, it was for the good of the Common-weal that it should be casted and discharged, fine that there was no imployment of them at this present; considering that Annibal was retired already with his forces into his standing camp, and taken up his wintring harbos; and again, the pessione grew fo hot in that leaguer of his, that if they were not discharged betimes, there was not one of them like to escape and remain alive. In these points, the LL. of the Senat granted out their commission unto the Consul, for to do according as himself thought to stand either with his own credit and trust committed unto him, or the benefit of the Common-weal,

At the very fame time there was a certain religious opinion that had possessed of a suddain the whole City, by occasion of a certain Prophetic found in the books of Sibylla. When search was made into them and they diligently perused, about the raining of stones, which happed so often k that year. The Prophefic ran in this form: " At what time foever an enemy of a strange and for-"rain countrey, shall happen to make war upon Italy, he may be chased out of Italy and vanquish-"ed, if the goddels dame Cybele of Ida, were brought to Rome from Pessinus. This Prophese found by the Decemvirs, moved the Senat the more for that, the Embaffadors allo who carried the oblation and present aforesaid to Delphos, related, That as they themselves sacrificed unto Pyrhim Apollo, all the inwards of the beaft killed for facrifice, appeared good, and shewed prosperity: and the Oracle belides gave answer, That there was a far greater victory toward the people of Romethan that was, out of the ipoils whereof they brought gifts and offered to the God at this pieken, And for to make up and fully accomplish these hopes, they alleaged withal, how P. Scipio indemanding the Province of Affrick, did prefage (asit were) before hand in his mind the final ad of this war. To the end therefore, that they might with more speed obtain this honorable vidow thus fore-tokened, and offering (asite were) it felf, by all lucky prefagings of men and Oracles of the Gods, they thought and devised some mean to transport the said goddesses to Rome.

The people of Rome in those dayes was consedered with no States of Asia: howbeitthell. calling to mind, how long ago, upon occasion of a sickness, and to purchase health unto the people, Eculapius was fent for likewite out of Greece, before it was joyned with the City of Rome in any league or fociety; and confidering withal, that there was some friendship and amity begun already with King Attalus (in regard of the common war against Philip) and that he would be ready to do for the people of Rome, what soever lay in his power, they resolved to send unto him an honorable Embassage to wit, M. Valerius Levinus, who had been twice Consul, and had warredy in Greece; M.Cecilius Metellus, who had been a Pretor, and Servius Sulpitius Galba: likewife an Ædile, and two late Questors, C. Tremelius Flaccus, and M. Valerius Falco. For these five, they assigned five Quinquerems or Gallies of five ranks of oars, that according to the credit and dig nity of the people of Rome, they should make a voyage into those Lands, with whom they were to win a reputation and Majeffy to the Roman name and State. These Embassadors, as they held on their course toward Afia, to soon as they were put on Land at Delphos repaired directly tothe Oracle, for to know what good hope it might afford unto them and the people of Rome, of effecting that business and commission, about the which they were sent forth. And this answer by report, was returned to them again, That they should obtain their defire, and effectuate their purpole by the means of Attalus the King: advising them moreover, That when they had con N veighed the faid goddels down to Rome, they should take order, that the very best manofallothers in the City. should give her lodging and entertainment. But to proceed, to Pergamusthey came unto the King. Who having courteously received and welcomed the Embasizions, conducted them into Phrygiato Peffinus, and delivered into their hands that facred and holy flone, which the inhabitants of the country faid, was the Mother of the Gods, and willed them to carry it to Rome. Then M. Valerius Falco was fent back from the other Embaffadors to advertise them at Rome, that the goddess was coming, and that they should seek out the best man in all the City for to receive and lodge her in his house with all devotion that might be.

Now was Q. Cecilius Metellus nominated Dictator by the Conful in the Brutians country, 4 gainst the folemn election of the Magistrats. His army was disbanded and cassed, and L. Veuriato Philo created master of the horse. Then the Dictator held the Election. In which were chosen Confuls, M. Cornelius Cethogus & P. Sempronius Tuditanus in his absence, who at that time had the government of Greece, After them were elected Pretors, T. Claudius Nero.M. Martius Rallal Scribonius Libo, & M. Pomponius Matho. When the Election was finished, the Dictator refigned up his place of magiltracy. The Roman Games were thrice renned and fet forth, & the plaies Plebuleron times exhibited, The Ædiles of the chair were Cn, and L. Cornelius Lentuli both, This Lucinigo

A verned then the Province of Spain: created he was in his ablence, and ablent as he was he bate that dignity, The Adiles of the Commons were T. Ch. nature of ellus, and M. Junius Pennus. That year M. Marcellus dedicated the Temple of Varine, neer the gate Capens, the feventeenth year afyear are it was vowed by his father, at Classidium in Gallin, during the time of his furth Confulship.

There died also this year a Flamine of Mars, namely; M. Armylius Regulus,

For the last two years, the affairs in Greece had not been well followed, Philip therefore taking the vantage, that the Atolians were forfaken of the Romans (the only aid upon which they trusfled) forced them both to the for peace, and to contract the tame under what conditions and capitulations himself pleased: which if he had not made the better halt, an that ever he could to accomplifhingood time, P. Sempronius the Vice-Conful, fent to fucceed onlyities in the governn ment, had atterly defeated him whiles he waged war with the Ætonans considering that he was ten thouland foot and a thouland horsoftrong, and had five and thirty tall ships of war, headed withbrasen pikes befores a power of no small importance, I assure you, to aid and affist his allies. For the faid peace was not fo foon concluded, but news came to the King, that the Romans were arrived at Dyrrhachium; that the Parthines and other neighbour nations, upon hope of change and a new world, began to rife and rebel; and that Dimallum was already belieged and affaulted: forto that City the Romans bent their power (in flead of aiding the Atolians unto whom they were lent) upon high displeasure and indignation, that without their advise and consent, yea, and against the tenor of the accord and covenant they had made a peace with the King, Philip upon these advertisements, for sear less some farther troubles might arise among the nations and states Ctherebordering, took long journeis, & sped him apace toward Apollonia. Thither Sempronius was teired, after he had fent Letterius his Lieutenant with part of his forces and thirteen fhips into Esola to visit the country, and to see in what terms they stood, yea, and to disturb and break the peace if possibly he could. Philip wasted and spoiled the territories and lands of the Apolloniats, and approching the City with his whole power bad battail to Sempronius the Roman General, But after he law once that he kept himself quiet within the City, flanding only upon his guard and defence of the walls; diffrufting also his own ftrength, as not able to force the City by affault: & defirons withal to entertain peace with the Romans as well as with the Ætolians, if he could; if not, yet at leastwife to have truce with them without effecting any more (leeing he could but only rub an old fore, & renew cankred malice upon fresh contention & quarrel) he returned into his realm,

About the seme time, the Epirots weary of long wars, after they had first sounded the dispofition and mind of the Romans that way fene their Embassadors unto Philip, to treat about a general and universal peace: affirming, that they had assured hope of an honorable end and agreement, if his highness would vouch affecto come to a parly with P. Sempronius the Roman General, And soon they obtained thus much of him, as to pals overinto Epirus, for the King himself was not unwilling thereunto, Now there is a City in Epirus, named Phanico: there the King after communication had first with Eropus, Danda, and Philippus, Pretors of the Epirots, entred into an enterriew also with P. Sempronius. At this solemn meeting and conference, Aminander the King of the Athamans was prefent, and other Magistrates of the Epirots and Acarnans. And first Philippus the Pretor began to speak and request, as well King Philip as the Roman General, to make an end of all wars, and likewise to give the Epirots leave to do the same, P. Sempronius propounded and htdown the articles and conditions of peace in this wife, That the Parthins, Dimalism, Barguism and Eugenium, should belong to the Seignory of the Romans, notwithstanding that they had obtained of the Senat by their Orators sent to Rome, to be annexed to the dominion of Philip King of Macedony. When they were agreed for peace upon those capitulations, there were comprised within the league on the Kings behalf, Prusia King of Bithynia, the Achaians, the Berotians, the Thessalians, the Acarmans, and the Epirots: and on the Romans, the Ilienses, K. Attalus, Pleuratus, Nabis the Tyrant of the Lacedemonians, the Eleans, the Meffenians, and the Athenians. And hereof were infiruments and Indentures ingroffed and fealed, and truce made for two moneths, until hich time as Embassadors were sent to Rome, that the people might by their suffrages approve of the conditions in that form. So all the tribes in general granted the same, because the war now being intended and bent against Africk, they were willing for the present to be discharged of all

P. Sampronius having concluded peace, departed unto Rome for to enter his Confulthip. Now when as M. Cornelius and P. Sempronius were Confuls (which was the 15 year of the Punick wat) the Provinces were affigned unto them in this manner, namely, unto Cornelius, Hetruria with the old army: Har o Sempronius the Brutii, with the new legions that he was to enrol, And to the Pretors in this wife were the Provinces allotted that M. Martins should be Lord chief justice of the citizens pleas, and L. Scribonius Libo have the jurisdiction of foreiners, together with the government of Gallia, Itemsthat M. Pomponius Matho should rule Sicily, and T. Claudius Nero sit as L. Deputy in Sardinia. As for P. Scipio, his commission was renewed and continued for one year loneer, with the command of that army and Armado which he had conducted before. Likewife Lonius had his commission newly sealed for to have the charge of the Brutians country, with the power of two legions, so long as the Consul thought it good for the Common-weal that he food demain in the government of that Province, Also M. Livius & Sp. Lucrosius, with the affiliation firecast those two legions with which they haddefended Gallia againt Mago, continued ftill in their foom for another year. Moreover Cn. Ottavius remained in place, with commission, that when he had delivered upSardina,82 the legion there unto T. Claudins, himself should with 40 long st gallies fcour the feas, and guard the coalts along the river, within those limits, for which the senat had given order, Unto M. Pomponius the Pretor in Sicily were appointed the two legions of the Cannian army. And I. Quintins and C. H. Tubulus Vice-prerors, were to govern as they did the former year, the one Tarentum, and the other Capua; and both of them were allowed the old gainfons. As for the government of Spain, it was put to question before the people, what two Vicepretots their pleasure was should be sent into that Province. And all the Tribes with one accord gave their grant, that the same Pro-confuls L.Cor. Lentulus, and L. Munitus Acidinus, should fit as Governors in those Provinces as the year before. The Confuls began now to muster fouldiers as well to enrol new legions for to be fent into the Brutians country, as allo to supply and fulfil the number of the other armiesiaccording as they were directed by the Senate. And albeit Affrice was not yet openly declared a Province, but diffembled by the LL. of the Senate, (of purpose Ibe. lieve, that the Carthaginians should have no inkling and intelligence thereof before hand) yet the whole City was in good hope, and made full reckoning that this year the war would be determined and fought out in Africk, and fo an end for ever of those troubles. This perswasion of theirs had possessed their hearts with much superstition: and very forward men were, both to repen, and also to believe many prodigious and flrange wonders, which daily were blown abroad & divulged more and more: To wit that there were two funs feen; that in the night feafon between whiles it feemed day light; that in Seria there was a burning torch or blafing Star reaching from the East to the West that in Tarracina the gate, and in Anagnia, as well the gate as the well indivers parts were blasted and shaken with lightning; lastly, that in the Temple of Juno Solpita in R Lanuvium, there was a noise and a rumbling heard, with a horrible crack. For the expiation and purging of these prodigies, there was a supplication holden for one day: and a novendial solemn facrifice was also celebrated, because it had rained stones out of the sky. Besides all this therewas fome confulation about the receiving of dame Idea, For over and befides that M. Valerins one of the Embassadors was returned & had brought word that she would be very shortly in It.ch, there came a new messenger with tidings, that the was now already at Taracina. This deliberation (2bout no small matter, namely, whom they should give judgement to be the best man simply in the whole City) held the Senat much amused: considering that every one for his part was more defirous of true victory, and pre-eminence in this behalf, than of any promotions, honors or dignites whatfoever, awarded unto them by the voices either of Senators or Commoners, In conclution, I they judged P. Scipio, the son of that Cn. who was killed in Spain, a very young man, and as yet not offull age to be a Questor, the very best man without exception in the whole City. Upon what motives of his singular vertues they were induced thus to deem of him, as I could willingly have delivered unto posterity, what had been set down in record by the ancient and first writers of those times: fo I will not interpose mine own conceits, in guesting at a thing which hathlien dead and buried so long time. This P. Cornelius was commanded to go accompanied with all the dames of the City as far as to Oftia, there to meet the Goddessyand then to take her forth of the ship, and being once set on land, to deliver her unto the foresaid matrons for to be devoutly carried to she City. Now when the ship was arrived at the mouth of the river Tyberis, he, according ashe was directed, went abourd in a pinnace, & lanched into the fea: where he took the Goddels at the M Priests hands, and brought her on shore. And the dames which were the noblest and chief of the City, amongst whom, C. Quintia was the Lady most renowned, received her. This Claudia, who before time(as it is reported) was of no better name & fame than the should be, now by this religious and devout ministry, was for her chastity and continency recommended better to posterity. These women caried this Goddesscharily & daintily in their hands, and took her by turns, one in course after another. All the City came forth by heaps to meet her: and along the ftreers as she was conveighed, they flood at the dores with centers, making tweet perfumes, & burning frankincense: yea, & praied unto her, that she would willingly enter the City of Rome, and continue propitions & gracious unto it. Thus they transported her into the Temple of Victoria within mount?alatine, the day before the * Ides of April, which was alwayes after kept as a festival holyds. The N people with great frequency brought gifts unto Palatium, which they offred unto the goldes & The Plaies iolemnized a Lettisternium. And those plaies called Megalesia came up then & were first instituted. called Megale-

Now when the Councel were buly and fat about the supply of those legions which were in the Provinces, there were certain of the Senators began to whilper & blow into their heads. That the "time was now come, no longer to abide those things which during the troubles and danger or rous daies they made a shift to endure; considering that now at length by the goddels of the "Gods, all fear was past, and the dangers overblown. At which words the Lords of the Senather ing in great expectation and attentive to hear out the rest; they went on and said, That those 13 colonies of the Latins, which whiles Q. Fabius and Q. Fulvius were Confuls refuled to let on "fouldiers, now almost for six years had intermitted their service in the wars, as exempted from 0 "warfare altogether, and enjoyed that immunity as an honor and reward for their good delets: "whereas in the mean time, other loyal and obedient allies were by mustering every year conti-" nually, wasted and consumed, in performance of their faithful allegeance and dutiful service to "the Empire of Rome. At this speech, the Lords called not so much to mind a thing long sollet and almost worn out of remembrance as they were provoked to anger and grew very hot, where fore would not suffer the Consuls to pass any other matter before, but decreed that they should peremptorily

A peremptorily convent to Rome the Magistrats, and ten principal citizens our of every of these Colonies, to wit, Nepet, Sutrium, Ardea, Cales, Alba, Carfeoli Sora, Sueffa, Setia, Circeii, Narnia, and Interanna, (for these were the Colonies touched in that point above-named) and to lay upon them every one a double levy of footmen, to that number and proportion which they were charged with, when they fee out most in the service of the Roman wars, ever since that the enemies were come into Italy: befides one hundred and twenty horiemen a peece. And in case any one of those colonies were not able to make up that full number of horsemen, then to allow for every man of arms three footmen. Provided alwayes, that for foot and horse both, such should be chosen and noother, as were most substantial and of the best be haviour, and be sent to what place soever there was need of supply even out of Italy. And if any of them refuted thus to do, then the Con-B fuls hadcommission to stay the Magistrats and deputies aforesaid, and not to give them audience in the Senat, (although they should require the same) before they had performed those impositions, Moreover those Colonies were enjoyned to pay every year a tax or tribute, and that there should be raised and levied, one Ass in the thousand, of their substance by the month; and be assessed in those Colonies according to the rate and rule that the Roman Centors should set down; which they gave order to be the same that was laid upon the people of Rome: and the information thereof to be exhibited and presented at Rome by the sworn Centors of the foresaid colonies, before they went out of their office. By vertue of this Act of the Senate, the Magistras and chief men of thole Colonies were fent for and compelled to repair to Rome: and when the Confuls demanded of them, those fouldiers and tribute aforesaid, they began all of them (but some more than Cothers) to retnie and gain lay it, yea, and flatly to deny, that so many souldiers could possibly be made, nay, hardly were they able, although they should strain themselves to furnish the bare single number, according to the usual proportion and old prescript order: requesting and beseeching them, to give them leave to have recourse unto the Senat, and there to make sure for their release: neither have we (fay they) so much offended as thus hardly to be used, nor deserved worthily to be undone. And say, we must needs miscarry and be cast away; yet neither our offence, nor the writh of the people of Romescan force us to find more fouldiers than we have. But the Cost, resolute in their purpose, commanded the Delegates and Committees of those Colonies, to flay still at Rome, and their Magistrats only to repair home and take musters: for almuch as (unless the full number of fouldiers which was fet down unto them were brought to Rome) there was no Con-D ful there would grant them audience in the Senat. Thus when all hope was cut off, to have access into the Senat, and to obtain a release; those twelve Colonies took a levy and enrolled the full number. Which was no hard matter to be done, confidering how their youth was increased in that time of long vacation and intermission of warfare. There was likewise another matter (by as long silence forlet and well neer quite forgotten) proposed newly again by M. Valerius Lavinus: who faid, That it was meet and good reason, that those private persons which had credited forth their monies to the Common-weal, when himself and M. Claudius were Consuls, should now at last be latisfied, contented, and paid: neither ought any man to marvail why he (notwithstanding the City were bound for the debt) had a special care and regard to call upon them for to have it discharged: for, besides that the Consul for that year being, when those lones of money gweegranted, was in some fort properly obliged, to see that credit were kept; himself more over was the very man that made the motion of taking up those monies, in regard that the City chamber was so empty of treasure, and the Commons puries so bare of money, that they were scarce able to pay the ordinary tribut. This overture made by the Conful, was well taken of the Senat, who willed the Confuls to put up this matter to the house: and so they entred an Act and decree, that the faid debts should be discharged at three paiments; whereof the first should be made prefently by the Confuls then in place; the other twain, by the Confuls that were to succeed in the third and fifth years next entuing.

But there fell out one new object and occurrence, that drowned all other cares befides, and wholly possessed the heads of the Senate, by occasion of the miteries and calamities of the Locrianst whereof before that day, they had no knowledge nor intelligence, and now were by the coming of their Embassadors declared and divulged. Neither were the people provoked to choler and anger, so much at the lewd behavior and wicked pranks of Q. Pleminius, as the slacknes and negligence, or else the partiality and connivency of Scipio in dealing between them. These Embasfadors of the Locrians, ten in number, presented themselves before the Consuls sitting in the open Hall called Comitium; clid they were in homely weeds and course apparel, looking pale and poor on the matter; and carrying with al in their hands as tokens of humble suppliants, certain branches of the Olive, according to the manner of the Greeks, fell down prostrate upon the ground before the Tribunal, with pitteous weeping and fortowful lamentation. The Confuls demanded who they were: and they made answer again. That they were Loctions, who had endured at the hands of Q. Pleminius the Lieutenant, and the Roman souldiers, such indignities, as the people of Rome would not find in their hearts, that the very Carthaginians themselves should suffer and sustain: befeeching them to do them this favour, as to give them leave to have accels to the Lords of the Senat, there to make their mone and complain of their woful distresses. Being ad- The pictul mitted into the Senate and audience given them, then the ancientest man of the company spake in complaints of this wife. "Right honorable (my LL.) "informed sufficiently and knew the truth, as well in what fort Locre was first betraied unto An- H inibal, as also after what order the garrison of Annibal was thence expelled, and the City reflored : mom as and ance, while the religion of our revolt cannot be im-" puted any way unto the publick counsel and consent of our City; but contrary-wise, that our re-"turn under your fignory and dominion was not only performed with our good will, but also " first wrought and compassed by the means of our helping hand and valour; ye have the greater "caule to be discontented and displeased with your Lieutenant and souldiers, for offring us (your "good and loyal allies) fuch abuses, to cruel wrongs and unworthy indignities. As for the cause " of our double revoltment and change, I think it good to deler the speaking thereof to another "time, and that for two reasons: the one is, that the matter might be heard in the presence of P. "Scipio, who recovered Locri, & was an eye-witness of all that we have done, be it good or bad; "the other is this, that how loever we be, yet we should not have abiden those calamities in such "fort as we have supported them, We cannot dissemble (my LL.) nor conceal, how all the while "that we had the Carthaginian garrison within our Caitle, we suffered many foul outrages and " fhameful villanies, both at Amilear his hands (the Captain of the garrison) as also from the Na-" midians and Africans: but what are they in comparison of the abuses & indignities that we en-"dure at this day? May it please you (my LL.) to give us the hearing of those things withput-"ence, that I shall utter even against my will with grievance. All the world at this day is in fi-" spence, & standeth in great doubt, whether to see you or the Carthaginians, the Soveraign Lords "of the whole earth. But if they were to weigh and counterpoise the Roman and Carthaginian "Empire, by those injuries which have been offred to us of Locri, either from them or yourgain v "fon; and which at this day, more than ever before, we fill endure: there is none but would rather " make choice of them to be their foveraign LL, than the Romans, And yet confider, I pray you, " and see how well affected the Locrians are towards you : when we were nothing so hardly asid "nor fo ill entreated by the Carthaginians, yet we had recourse unto your Captain General: and " now that we are missified of your garison, and put to more sorrow than if we were professed enes mies, yet we have run no whither with our complaints but unto your selves. Either shall you my "LL.) vouchfafe to have compassion of our miserable state, or else we see not what we haveking wherein we should pray unto the immortal Gods, for to be good and propice unto us. Q.Ph-"minius Lientenant to the General Scipio, was fent with a strong garrison and power of mento "recover Lorri out of the hands of the Carrhaginians; and with the very same garrison was held to "there: but this Lieutenant of yours (for the extremity of miseries and afflictions wherewith we "are driven, maketh us bold, and putteth courage in us to speak our minds freely finding nothing "at all in him of a man, my Lords, but the bare shape and outward form; nor of a Roman citizen, " unless it bethe habit of apparel which he weareth, and the found of the Latintongue which he " speaketh. A very plague he is & no better, a monstrous & ugly beast, like unto that, whichsom-"times(if old tales and fables be true) haunted the narrow feas between us and Sicily, for to de-"ftroy all passengers that sailed by Who, if he could have been content himself alone to have pra-" Ctifed & wrought upon us your allies, all mischievous acts & pranks, of wickedness, of filthy lust, " and greedy coverousness, we would peradventure in all patience & long (ufferance, have filled up "that one gulf and pit were it never so deep, & satisfied one gorge never so unsatiable, But now y "fo great a delight & pleasure hath he taken that all lewd & licentious parts all shameful asts and " villanies should be commonly practised & in every place committed, that he hath made all your "Centineirs very Pleminii, yea, and your fouldiers as bad as himself. All of them can skill now of "robbing rifling, spoiling, beating, wounding, and killing: they are all good at forcing of dames and "ladies of honor, at ravifhing and deflouring of young Virgins, at abufing (against kind) of young "lings, free born and well descended, whom they pull perforce from between the arms, and out of "the very bosomes of their parents. Daily is our City affaulted and taken; daily is it facked and " pilled, night and day, there is no place free, but ringeth again with the piteous shrikes and lamenstable plaints and cries of women and children, harried and carried away in every place, Hethat " were a stranger to these things, and knew nothing, might wonder well enough, how either we N " can possibly hold out in suffering such outrages, or they which are the doers, not yet besisted " and full of committing to great wrongs and injuries. For neither will my tongue and unerance "ferve to deliver, nor needful is it and expedient for you to hear everything in particular, what "we have sustained, But in general I will comprise and knit up altogether, I will abide by it that "there is not one house throughout al Lorrs, I dare avouch there is no person either one or other, "exempt from the wrongs that he hath done. I fay, & fland to it, that there is no kind of wickede nels, no manner of filthy lust & uncleannels, no unfatiable avarice besides, that he hath not assisted 6. to practife upon as many as were capable thereof, & fit fub jects to work upon, Hardly can a man " devise and think, whether of these two mischiess incident to a City be more derestable, either "when the enemies force it by affault in time of war, or when a peffilent & cruel tyrant oppreficth 0 "it by force & arms during peace, All calamities we endured before, that Towns won and left are " put unto. And now at this hour, more than ever (my LL.) Pleminius hath perpetrated upon us, ed our children & our wives, all those excessive villanies, that the most inhumane, cruel & our 1980-6' ous tyrants can devile to exercise upon those subjects, whom they keep down with oppresson. "tread under foot. Yet one thing there is (right honorable) whereof both sense of religion impinted & engraffed naturally in our minds, conftrains us to make particular complaint by specialty

"and also our desire is, that ye should have the hearing, yea, and to assoil and discharge your Com-"mon-weal of the icruple of conscience, in case ye think it so meet and requisite. For we have obaferved and feen with our eyes, with what devotion and ceremonial reverence, you not only ho-"nor and worship the Gods of your own, but also receive and entertain those of strangers and "fortainers. We have in our City a Chappel of Proferpina, concerning the holiness of which chouse, I suppose verily, that ye have heard some report and fame, during the war of King Pyr-" thus who in his return out of Sieily, passing along the sea side with his sleet by Leeri, among o"thers shameful villanies and outrages which he committed against our City in despight of us, and "for our fidelity shewed toward you, pilled also and robbed the treature of this Proferpina, which " to that day had never been couched by any man what foever, And when he had fo done the em-"barked the mony, & fent it away by water, but journeied himself by Land. But see what hapned "my LL, hereupon! His, whole navy the morrow after, was all even toffed, split, & torna pieces in "a most hideous gust and horrible tempest, save only those ships wherein that sacred treasure was beflowed, which were cast upon our coast, & driven ashore. Whereupon this King, as proud & "fierce a Prince as he was, being taught by fo great harms and losses, to believe that there were "Gods in heaven that ruled all; made diligent fearch for all the faid monies, and caused the same tobe brought back again, and laid up in the treasury of Proferpina. And yet for all that, never sped the well in any thing that he went about, from that day forward. Hunted he was and chased clean Cour of Italy and coming by chance one night, & entering unadvitedly the City of Argos, he died "an obscure, bate, and dishonorable death. And not with standing your Lieutenant, your Colonels Cuand knight Marshals heard of this and a thousand more such instances & examples which were arecounted unto them (not for to amplify and fet out with the highest the great religion and "holiness of the place; but as we and our ancestors have had right evident proof, and that full "oftentimes, to flew the manifest power and puissance of that goddess) yet were they so hardy as "to lay their theevish and sacrilegious hands upon those treasures, that were inviolat and not to "be couched; and to by that curfed prize and booty have polluted themselves, their houses, and "your fouldiers. Whose service take heed my LL. as ye render your selves and your credit, how "ye employ either in Italy or in Africk, in any of your affairs and wars there; before ye purge and "expar this foul and heinous fact: for fear left they make amends, and pay for this deteitable for-"feir not only which their own bloud, but also with some publick lois & calamity of the whole D " State. And even already my LL, the ire and displeasure of the goddess hath been well seen upon "your Captains and fouldiers both, & at this present day continueth still, Sundry times they have " been together by the ears, and fouffled one against another with banners displaied, Pleminius the "Captain bare up one fide, and two Marshals or military Tribuns another, Neversought they "more fiercely & sharply with the Carthaginians in the field than amongst themselves in fraies at "the sword point, And through their furious rage they had given Annibal good opportunity and "vantage to regain Locri into his own hands; but that Scipio, whom we fent for, came in the mean "time upon him, But peradventure (fome will fay) this madness and fury hanteth and rormenteth "the fouldiers only, who are tainted with the foresaid sacriledge, and no power at all of the god-" dels hath been shewed in punishing the leaders and captains themselves. Nay I wot, in them it E "hathmost evidently appeared. The fribuns have been beaten with rods by the Lieutenant & the "Lieutenant again, being laid for by the faid Tribuns, and caught in a train, hath not only been " mangledall his body over, but when they had cut off his note, and cropt his ears, was left for dead in the place. And afterwards, when the Lieutenant was recovered and cured of his hurts, he " fift impr isoned the Tribuns; then he scourged them, & after he had martyred them, & put them "to all exquisite tortures that might be devited against bondsaves, he put them to death & when "they were dead, would not suffer them to be enterred. Thus ye see how the goddels hath puni-"shed and taken vengeance of them that have pilled and robbed her Temple: & never wil she give "over to torment and harry them with all manner of furies and hellish fiends, before the sacred "money be again bestowed in the chests & cosers of her treasury. Our ancestors long ago in time 14 of grievous and cruel war between them and the Crotoniats, because the Temple standeth without the City, were desirous to remove that treasure and money from thence, into the City. But in the night there was a voice heard from out of the shrine, that they should hold their hands off: for that the goddess her self knew well enough how to defend her own Temple. And because upon this warning they made it a matter of conscience, so were asraid to stir the treasure "from thence, they would needs cast a strong wall about the said Temple: & when it was brought "up to a good height from the ground, behold, suddainly at once all the work came tumbling "down, But both now, and oftentimes besides, hath this goddess either guarded her seat & chappel, or else if it hath been any way violated, she hath been grievously revenged by some searful cample of them that have seemed to offer violence to the same. Now for the wrongs that wea-"bide the is not able; neither is there any other but your felves (my Lords) to right us, and revenge "our quarrel. You are they whom we flie unto unto your protection only in all humble manner, where recourse, And all one it is to us, whether ye suffer Locrito be under that Lieutenant and "that garrilon or yeeld us unto Annibal in his anger, and to the Carthaginians, for to wreak their "teen upon us & our throats. Neither require we that you should credit and believe our com-"plaint of him that is not now in place, without liberty of his answer & pleading for himself. Let "him come hardly; let him be at the hearing himfels, and spare not, let him in Gods name clear

" and acquir himself if he can. If when all is done and faid, it can be proved, that he hath left un. H "done any mitchief against us, that one man can devise to do unto another; we will be content to "abide and endure all those miseries once again (if it were pessible) which we have suffered al-" ready, yea & to hold and declare him guiltless of all offences done both to God and man

When the Embassadors had laid abroad those matters, and Q. Fabius demanded of them, whe. ther they had complained unto P. Scipio, and uttered their griefs before him, they made anfiver and faid, "That they had fent Embassadors unto him, but he was busied in making prepa-"tion for the wars, and was either passed already over into Affrick, or upon his voyage mady to "take the Seas within few dayes: and they had feen by good experience in how great farcurthe Lieutenant Pleminius flood with his general: and namely, they were not ignorant how Sergio "after he had heard the matter between the Tribuns and him committed them to prifon: but as I "for the Lieutenant, who was as faulty as the other, if not more, him he left thereftill in his full "authority. Now after that the Embaffadors were willed to go forth of the Temple where the " Senat fate, the chief LL. of the Senat began with biting words to inveigh bitterly against Scipto "as well as Pleminius. But above all others, Q. Fabius girded at him, and iad, That he wasborn " even to corrupt and mar all military discipline. Thus (quoth he) in Spain also we have lost more es by mutinies of our own fouldiers, than by the wars with our enemies : for why ? after a firange "and forrainmanner, and according to the guise of Kings, one while he cockered his souldiers "and suffered them to have their will and head too much; otherwhiles he would be overshare "and cruel to them. After which rough words, he came upon them both thus with as heavy and "fharp a fentence, namely, That Pleminius the Lieutenant by his confeat should be had away a co bound in chains to Rome, and there clapt up in prison, until his cause were heard, and judicially "determined: and in case those challenges were true, that the Locrians have commensed against "him he should be put to death in prison, and his goods be confiscate and forfeited to the chamber of the City, As for P. Scipio, in that he prefumed to depart out of his province without com-" mission and direction from the Senat, he should be called home: and the Tribuns of the Com-"mons dealt withal, to prefer a bill unto the people for his deprivation, and to put him befides "his place of government. As touching the Locations, his opinion was, That the Senat should "give them their dispatch, and return them this answer: First, as touching the wrongs that they " complained of, it was not the will and pleasure neither of the Senat nor of the people of Rome " that they were done; who wished with all their hearts they had been undone: Item, that they L se acknowledged them to be good men, to be their friends and allies; and fo would accept of them "and call them. As to their children, their wives, and other goods taken from them whatlere, "their mind was that they should be restored again: Item, that enquiry should be made what "fams of money were taken out of the treasury of Proferpina, and that two-fold rellimiton ce should be made and laid up there in stead of it: I em, that there should be a solemn purgatory le-" crifice celebrated for amends and expiation of that fin; but fo, as the colledge first of the Priests "arid Bishops should be consulted with, and their advice taken in that behalf, (considering the " facred treasure was disquieted, laid open and violated) namely, what manner of expiations and "clenfings were to be used, to what Gods, and with what beafts they should sacrifice: Finally, "that all the fouldiers which were at Locri should be transported over into Sicily; and inthern " room four cohorts of allies from out of the Latin Nation should be brought to lye in garrilon there. But every Senator could not be asked his opinion and sentence that day, by reason of their difference and disagreement of minds so hotly incensed, some infavour, other in disavour of Scipio. For besides the lewd part of Pleminius, and the calamity & oppression of the Locrians, they began to speak against the apparel of the General himself, "How he went not like a souldierand " a warrior, no nor fo much as like a Roman: walking up and down, and squaring it out in the "fchools and open places of exercise with his mantle and cloke, and in his slippers and pantosles, et after the Greek fathion: And that he was over bookish, and set his mind too much upon read-" ing! and took delight to be in the fencing school and wreftling-place and all his men and guard "abbut him as idly and wantonly given as he, took joy in the pleasures & delightful seat of Syra- N cr brfa: As for Carthageand Annibal, they were quite forgotten; and his whole army through hoof-" ness and liberty was spilled and clean lost, like to that of late at Sucro in Spain, and all one with "them at this time in Locri, more to be feared of their friends than their enemies. And albeit these matters thus reported, were either true, or mingled with some truths, and therefore sounded all very probable; yer the opinion of Q. Merellus prevailed: who in all other things gave his aften unto Maximus, only astouching Scipio, he varied from him. " For I can not fee any reason (quoth " he) how this can fland, that whom erewhie the whole City chose at those young years of his "to be the only Captain for to recover Spain; of whom they made special choice to be their "Conful, after that he had gotten Spain from the enemies, to end at once the Punick war; and "in whom they reposed great hope, that he was the man to draw Annibal out of Italy, and to 0 " fubdue all Affrick: he now should all of a suddain be called for home out of his Protince, "as a person almost condemned, without pleading and hearing of his cause, as if he were ano "ther Pleminius: confidering that even thole lewd and cruel parts which the Locrians complained "of were by their own words and confession not committed whiles he was present in place we "ther could hebe charged and accused directly for ought else but only for his sufferance and con-"nivency, in that upon a tender and respective indulgence of his Lieutenant, he was too remis

the truth: and in case they could find that those things wherewith the Locrians sound them-"felves to much grieved, were done either by commandment and direction from Scipio, or with this will and confent; then to charge him to depart out of the province. But in case that P. Soi-"pio were already passed over into Affrick; then the fore aid Tribuns of the Commons, and the g" Edile, joyning unto them two of the Delegates above laid (in hearthe Preter deemed moth "meet) should fail into Affrick; and the Tribuns and Adile bring out them Scipe from thence:

" and the two Commissioners have the charge and government of the many, until the traine as a "new L. General succeeded and came in place, But it M. Pompomus and coren Delegaces above-" faid, found that neither by the direction, nor with the will of P. So pic their enormities were

"committed, then P. Scipio should remain still with the army, and go forward with the war as he "intended. When this decree of the Senat was once passed, and an act made thereof they were in hand with the Tribins either to agree between themselves, or else to cast lots, which two of them should go with the Pretor and the Delegates. And then the colledge of the Bishops were consulted with, about the expiation and making satisfaction for those things which in the Temple

Cof Proferpina at Locri were either handled polluted, or carried forth from thence. The Tribuns of the commons that went the journey with the Pretor and the Commissioners, were M. Claudius

Marcellus, & M. Cincius Alimentius: who also had an Ædile of the Commons to assist them, whom they might command, if Scipio would not obey the Pretor, whether he were in Sicily, or gone over into Affrick, to apprehend and attach his body; and by vertue of their facrofanct and inviolable authority to bring him home with them, And first they resolved to go to Locri before they went to Meffina, But concerning Pleminius, the report goeth two wayes. Some fay, that when he was advertised what was intended and devised against him at Rome, he purposed to go to Naples into banishment, and chanced by the way to light upon one of the Delegates abovesaid, and so by him was perforce brought back to Rhegium. Others affirm, that Scipio himself sent out one of his

Lieutenants, accompanied with 30 of the most noble Knights or Gentlementhat he had about him, with a warrant to commit Q. Fleminius, and with him the principal Authors of the sedition, and to lay them fast in irons. But certain it is that they all, were it by the commandment of Scipio before, or then by warrant from the Pretor, were put in ward and fafe-cuffody with the Rhegins.

The Pretor and the Delegats being come to Locri, first and formost, according to their commission on, had a principal care of Religion. For all the holy money which they found by diligent fearch in the custody either of Pleminius, or of the fouldiers together with that which they themselves had brought with them from Rome, they bestowed again in the privy vestries where the treasure waskept: and besides, they made a solemn purgatory sacrifice for the Sacriledge. After this, the

Pretor affembled the fouldiers together, and commanded them to carry their Enfigns out of the

E City: where himself encamped upon the plain; and proclaimed that no souldier, as he would answer at his uttermost peril, should either tarry behind, or bring forth any thing with him but his own. Then he gave the Locrians leave, that every man should lay hold upon that which he knew to be his own: and if ought were not forth-coming and to be seen, to challenge and put in his claim for it. And above all things, his pleasure was, that all bodies of free persons whatsoever, should without delay be restored unto them, and if any made default of restitution, he should a bide the smart and be grievously punished. Then he assembled the Locrians to an audience, and pronounced before them all. That the people and Senat of Rome granted unto them their ancient lberty, and their own laws: giving notice unto them, that who foever had any thing to fay against

Pleminius, or any other person by way of accusation, he should follow him to Rhegium, and there give attendance. Also if they were desirous to make a publick and open complaint of Scipio, namely, That the facts committed at Locri most impiously and wickedly, against both God & man, palled either under his warrant, or with his leave and liking, then they should send Embassadors to Messana, where he together with his Councel and assistants would give them audience of al matters, and determine accordingly. The Locrians yeelded great thanks to the Pretors and to the Delegats or Commissioners : as also to the Senat and people of Rome: and said, "They would go

"Loaccule Pleminius. As for Scipio, although he let little to heart the injuries and wrongs

"done unto their City, yet he was a man whose friendship they desired rather to embrace, than to

"entertain his entrity. And this they knew assuredly that so many lewd pranks, and so horrible parts there plaid, were neither by the direction nor yet with the connivency and toleration of

P. Scipiobut his only fault was that either he trufted Pleminius overmuch, or credited them too little. And some men (say they) be of this nature, that they will have a careful regard for to prevent fin, and an earnest defire that no offence be committed, rather than courage and heart to punish and correct faults when they are once done and past Hereupon both the Pretors & also the Commissioners with him, thought themselves well eased of no small burden and charge of making (arther inquificion and fitting upon the cause of Scipio, But Pleminius and two and thirty perfour more with him; they condemned and fent bound in chains to Rome. They themselves went also in perion to Scipio, to be eye-witnesses and to make report at Rome of their own knowledge, H as touching the manner of apparel, the idle lite of the General, and the loofe, diffoline, and corrupt military discipline of his couldiers; fo rife and common in many mens mouths. Against their coming to Syracuse, Scipio was provided of deeds to approve his innocency, and not of words to excule his folly. He gave order for all his forces there to meet, and for his armado to be in readinels, as if he were that day to give battail both by Land and Sea to the Carthaginians. Therere same day that they arrived thither, they were friendly received and courteously entertained by Serpio. The morrow after he shewed them all his forces, as well for Land as Sea service, not only furnished, well appointed, and in readines; but the one fort, namely the land fouldiers, running and charging one another at turney; and the Sea servitors likewise within the haven, representing anaval combat with their ships. Then he led the Pretor and the other commissioners all about, to ke I the arienal and armory, the store-houses, the garners of corn, and all other provision and sumiture for the war. At the view and fight whereof, they were firiken with fuch exceeding admiration. both of every thing in particular, and of all in general, that they were fully periwaded, that either by the conduct of that Captain and valour of that army, the Carthaginians might be overcome and conquered, or by none other in the world: yea, and they willed him in the name of God. without more ado to pass over into Affrick, and with all speed possible to make the people of Rome to enjoy the effect of that hope which they conceived that very day, on which all the Centuries nominated and declared him with one voice the former Conful of the twain: and with fo joyous hearts they took their leave and departed from thence, as if they were to bring tidings to Rome of a glorious victory; and not to make relation and report of a magnifical and stately prepa- K ration for war, Pleminius and all they that were likewise attaint and guilty, after they cameto Rome, were immediately clapt up and laid fast in prison. At the first time when they were brought out before the people by the Tribuns, they could find no grace, no favour nor mercy amongst them, their minds were io forstalled and possessed aforehand, with the consideration of the world miseries and calamities of the poor Locrians. But afterwards, being produced oftner unto themas the hatred conceived against him, began to wear and decay, so mens anger grew to asswage and fosten: besides the pitious plight and deformed hew of Pleminius there present, and the remembrance withal, of Scipio now absent, gat him some favour with the people. Yet he died in prilon, before his cause was judicially tried, and definitivesentence of him passed. Clodius Licinius reporteth in this third book of the Roman stories, that this Pleminius in the time of the games which I Affricanus second time Conful exhibited at Rome, according to a vow by him made, went about (by the help of some whom he had corrupted and waged for money) to set the City on fire indivers places, thereby to have opportunity to break prison and make an escape: but when his wicked purpose was once disclosed and brought to light, he was condemned and awarded by anacos Senat to the dungeon Tullianum. But as for Scipio, there were no words made of him, neither come he in question any where else but in the Senat: where all with one accord, both commission oners and Tribuns by extolling and magnifying with glorious words, the navy, the army and the Captain, brought it io about, that the Senat thought good and were agreed, that with all convenient speed Scipio should over into Affrick, and have liberty granted out of those armies which were in Sicily, to make choice of those whom he would himself transport over with him into y Africk, and whom he would leave behind for the guard and defence of the Province,

Whiles these things passed thus amongst the Romans; the Carthaginians also having spentall the wintertime in much inspition and continual sear, hearkning to all news, and enquiring searfully of every messenger, and keeping watch upon all their promontories and high hills by the Sta fide, bestirred themselves likewise, and procured the society and alliance of K. Syphax, a matter of no small importance for the safeguard and desence of Africk, in hope and confidence of wholeamity and friendship especially, they were periwaded, that Scipio intended to fail over into Africa Now there had been already between Afdrubal the fon of Gifgo and the King, not only familiate acquaintance by way of kind welcoming and reciprocal hospitality, since the time (as hath been faid before) that Scipio and Afdrabal fortuned to meet at one time together in the Kings house, N when they came out of Spains but also some treaty was already begun of alliance and affinity, and a motion made, that the King should espouse and wed the daughter of Astrabal; Fortherinrance of this matter, and the appointment of a certain day for the folemnifing of the mattige (for now the Damoiel was ready for an husband, and mariageable) Afdrubal took a journey, and iceing the King burning in love (as these Numidians of all other barbarous nations are molt given that way, and exceeding amorous) he sent for the maiden from Carthage, and hastened the wedding. And among other congratulations that passed between to the end, that besides the private affirmity there should be also a publick league, there was an alliance concluded between the people of Carthage and the King, by giving and taking their faithful promise interchangeably and obliging themselves by a solemn oath one to the other to observe it as well offensive as detention. 0 and to have the same enemies, and the same friends for ever. But Asdrubal remembring both the friendship begun between Scipio and the King, and also how fichle and variable the natures of the Barbarians are and fearing if Scipio should pais over into Africk that this bond of wedlock would not be ftrong enough to hold the King in; took the time whiles this Numidian Prince was enflamed with his fresh love, induced him what with reasons, and what with the fair words and allurements of his young spoule, to send Embassadors into Sicily to Scipio, for to advise him not to

A pals over into Africk, nor to relie upon any confidence of him, nor yet to build upon his former pals over the promises. For himself was not only linked in matrimony with a Citizen of Carthage, the daugher to of that Afarabal whom he saw entertained as a guest in his court, but also joyned in a publicit eleague with the people of Carthage. And first he exhorted him that the Romans would war with the Carthaginians far from Africk, as hitherto they had done; for fear lest he should of anceeffity be forced to have an hand, and intermedale in their quarels; and fo while he defired to avoid the danger and holtility of one part or other, be driven at length to fide all one way : givwing him more plainly to understand, that if Scipie would not forbear Africk, but needs come with an army against Carthage, then must be necessarily fight in defence of the land of Africk, wherein himfelf was born, and for the native country, for the father and honfe of his own wife. With this g commission and direction were certain Orators sent unto Scipio, who met with him at Stracule. and there delivered their meisage. Scipio, albeit he was disappointed greatly of his ground-work that he had laid for his wars in Africk, and put belides his good hopes ; gave the Embalsadours letters into Africk unto the King, and tent them back again in all halt, before the thing were publifted and come abroad. In which letters he requested him earnestly to be advised and bethink himtelf that he brake not the rights either of friendship & hospitality begun with him, or of the league and fociety entred with the people of Rome : nor violated juffice and faithfull promite made by giving right hands: nor yet beguile and abuse the gods, the witnesses and judges of all covenants and agreements made. But for a much as the coming of those Numidians could not be concealed (for they went all about the City, and were daily convertant in the Generall his lodging : and if it - should have been kept secret wherabout they came, it was to be doubted lest the truth the more it was imothered and diffembled, the more it would oreake forth and come to light : and to the armywas to stand in fear, that they were to war at once both with the king and Carthaginians. Scipio therefore buzzed aforehand into mens he ds. falle deviled matters, and fo withdrew them from the understanding of the truth indeed. He affembled all his touldiers together, and said unto then c "that now it was no longer staying and trifling out the time : bearing them in hand, that the "Kines, his allies and conferats, importuned him to fet over into Africk with all convenient speed, "that Mafaniffa beforetime himfelf in perion came to Laline, grieving and complaining that the "time ran thus on in delaies and doing nothing: & Syphax now fent his Emoaffadors, muling much "and wondring what the cause should be of so long temporising : and requiring that either the ar-"my without more ado, should be sent over at once: or else if their minds and purposes were chan-D, aged, to certifie him fo much, that he likewife might provide for himself and his kingdome. And " therefore he did them to wit and understand, that he intended (now that he was sufficiently prois vided and furnished of all things; and considering that the imprese might abide no farther stay,) "to conduct his armado to Lilybaum, to wait the first good day of wind and weather, to take the "less for a bon-voiage, and with Godsgrace and favour to fet fail for Africk. His letters he difpatched to Marens Pemponius to this effect, that if he thought fo good, he should repair to Lilybeam, to the end they might commune and confult together," what legions especially, and what number of fouldiers he should transport over with him into Africk. In like manner, he sent a labout the maritime and fea coasts, to stay all the carricks and ships of burden, and to bring them a-E way at once to Lilybaum. Now when all the ships and serviceable men in Sicily were affembled to Lilybaum, to as neither the City was able to receive the multitude of fouldiers, northe haven contain the number of the veffels; to earnestly minded they were all, and to hotly fet upon their voiageinto Africk, that they seemed as if they were conducted not to fight a war, but to enjoy the affored rewards of a victory. But especially above all others, the souldiers remaining of the Cannian army, were verily perswaded, that under this captain, or else none, by valiantly quitting themselves inthe service of the Common-weal, they should be able to end and finish their ignominous and hamefull fouldiery. And Scipio himfelfmade no base account of those kind of souldiers, as knowing full well that the defeat received at Canna, was not occasioned by their cowardise: neither were there throughout the Roman army any fouldiers to ancient and of to long continuance, or fo well experienced not only in many and fundry foughten fields, but also in the affaulting of towns and Cities. And these Legions of Canna were the fift and fixt in order. Now when he had once refolved and given out, that he would transport them over with him into Africk, then he took a particular view of them, man by man. And having culled out those, and left them behind, whom he supposed unmeet and unsufficient, he substituted in their place those whom he had brought with him out of Isaly: and to fully he tupplied and made up his number of those Legions; that either of them had fix thousand and two hundred foot, and three hundred men of arms. He chose also out of the same army of Canna, both horsemen and footmen, of the allies and confederats of the Latine nation. What power of fouldiers in the whole were fet over into Africk, writers differ not a little in the number. In some authours I find, that they wereten thousand foot, and two thousand and two hundred horse : in others, fifteen thousand footmen, and fifteen hundred horsemen. In some records again, they were more by one halte and better, namely, that of horse and soot there were embarked sive and thirty thousand. And others there be that have fet down no number at all, amongst whom, as in a matter to doubtfull and uncertain, I would my felt be counted for one. But Calina for his part, as he forbeareth to Dur down any number at all, to be feemed for to imply an infinite multitude of them, in that he faith that with a cry and shout that the fouldiers set up, the very touls of the air fell down to the ground: and he that had feen the multitude of them when they went a shipboard, would have faid there u bad not been a man left behindeither in Italy or in Sicily. Well how many or how few foever they were, Scipio himself took the charge to see the fouldiers embarked in good order, and without any tumult. As for the failers and mariners, who were forced before to shipboord, C. Lalim the Ad. mirall of the navy, kept them ftill and quiet within their fhips. M. Pomponime the Pretor had commission for to furnish the armsdo with corn and victuals; who made provision of food and fullenance for 45 daies : of which there was of baked meats and other viands already dreffed, as much as would suffice for 15 daies. Now when they were all embarked, he sent about to all the ships, certain pinnaces or cock-boats, and commanded all the pilots and mafters of every ship, with two fouldiers apeece, to come into market place, there to receive their charge. When they were all met and affembled together, first he enquired of them whether they had provided and taken into I their vessels fresh water sufficient both for man and beast, to hold out so many daies as their com would serve? and when answer was made that they had water in their ships to last five and forty daies then he charged and commanded the fouldiers to keep filence and be quiet during their navigation, and without any strife and contention to be obedient unto the mariners, and wiling to help in any ministery and service whatsover, saying, that himself and L. Scipio would keep on the right wing with twenty strong ships with brasen beak heads, and C. Laline the Admiral with M. Percise the Treasurer on the left, with as many of the same lort, to wast over and guard the hulks and ships of burden : willing and requiring that there should be light in all their vessels, namely, that every brafen headed ship should have one; each Carrick twain; and the Admiral thip, wherein the Generall was, three lights, for a speciall mark, to be discerned from thereft in K the night. And so he commanded the Pilots to steer and direct their course for Emporia. [The territory hereabout is most fertile and frnitfull, whereby the whole country aboundeth in plenty of all things : the barbarous pealants (as commonly it falleth out in battell and plentifull lands) are cowards, and unapt for war, and it was thought they might be surprised and subdued before any inccour could come from Carthage.] When their directions were given, they were commanded to retire to their ships, and the next morrow at the fignall, with the help of the gods to weigh anchor, house up fails and away. Many Roman Armadoes had aforetime set out of Sucil, and the very same port : but never any voiage all the time of that war, no, nor during the former, made to goodly a thew, and was to much looked on. And no marvell, for most of their other flees were fent out only to rob and to fetch in booties and prizes. And yet if a man would efteem at L vies by the number and greatnesse of ships, there had been aforetime two Consuls together, who went over with a power of two complete armies: & in every of those fleets therewere wellett as many war ships with brasen beak heads, as hulks & carricks in those that Scipio transported over For belides fifty long thips of war, he had not all out four hundred thips of burden and passes to transport over his army with. But if we would compare both wars together, the second seemed anto the Romans more sharp and cruel then the former; both because it was fought within Italy, and also by reason of to great overtorows of to many armies, together with the loss and death of their Generall captains. Moreover great expectation there was of Scipio the Commander and Ge. nerali of this voisge, a man much renowned and talked of, both in regard of his own noble acts of cavalry, and also of a speciall and singular fortune that followed him in all his exploits; where: M by he grew every day more glorious then other: which caused all mens hearts to be set upon him; beside his very resolution and mind that he carried, to pass in Africk, which all the while of the war entred not into the head of any Captaine before him: in that he gave it out abroad, That he meant to go over, with intent to draw and fetch Annibal out of Italy, and to divert and trusflate the war into Africk, and there to finish and make an end of it. There came running mio the haven to see the setting out of his Armado, the whole multitude, not only of the inhabitants of Lilybanne, but also the train of all the Embassages out of Sicily, which werecome together for to accompany Scipie, and to do him honour, and also attended upon the Pretor of the province M. Pomponius. Over and besides, those legions also which were left behind in sicily, went forward to bear their fellow fouldiers company. So that not only the may N Was a goodly prospect unto the beholders upon the land, but also the strand so overspread all about with numbers of people, made a brave and pleafant thew unto these passengers, that were in the flips. When day light once appeared, Scipio from out of the Admirall after filence comminded by voice of the crier) praied in this wife "O ye gods and goddelses all, that haunt and inhabit "feas and lands both, I befeech and pray you to vouchfafe, that all that ever bath been done allow "dy, is now intended, or shall hereafter be enterprised, during my conduct and government, may speed well, and turn to the good of my self, the people and commonalty of Rome, our "allies, and especially those of the Latine nation; who by land, by sea, by rivers, follow the diprection, command, government, and fortune of my felt, and of the people of Rome, and that in all our actions ye would be good, gracious, favourable, and belofull unto us, and advance 0 et all our proceedings: that ye would grant us the victory over our enemies: and after we will " tubdued them to continue fafe and found : and adorned with their goodly spoils laden withheld "rich pillagesto return home all together with glorious triumph : & give us the hand and opportunity to be revenged of our foes and mortall enemies : and deign me and the people of Rime " that power and strength, to execute upon the City of the Carthaginians those fearfull exemof ples of cruelty, which the people of Carthage intended to practile and bring upon our City

A and flate. After these prayers thus pronounced, he took the raw inwards and purtenance of the best killed for sacrifice (as the maner is) and flung them into the sea, and with that by sound of tumpet, gave the signal of departure.

Now were they under fail: having a good great gale of a forewind, they foon loft the fight of land. In the afternoon, there began to fall a thick mist; by reason whereof the ships could hardly avoid running one upon another. But when they were once in the main and deep fea, the wind became more mild : and all the night following, the same dark mist continued still. After the fan was once up it brake and dispersed, and then the wind again grew big and high, by which time they might discover land. And not long after, the pilot faid unto Scipto, that they were not full too leagues from Africk; and that he faw well and difcerned the cape or point of Mercarius B and if his will and pleature were thinher to direct their courfe, presently the whole armado should be in the rode, Scipio to foon as he was within view of land, after he had made his prayers unto the gods, tobleffe this first discovery of Africk to his own good and the benefit of the common-weal; gave commandment to fail still, and to put with the shore and ride at anchor in some bay beneath. So they made way with the same wind. But about that very time as the day before, they were milted again, and loft the fight of land. And as the fog increased, the wind fell , the night also that came upon them belides, made all things more doubtfull. Whereupon they calt anchor, for fear that the ships should hit one against another, or run aground. When day light arose, the same wind was up again, but the foggy milt icattred; and then they might fee plainly all the coalt of Afreik. Scipio then demanded what promontory it was that he faw next; and hearing that the name of it C was The head Pulchrum, [or The fair Cape] the name (quoth he) pleaseth me, and the presage thereof I like fall well; even thither put the thips aland, and fo the armado entred the bay, and all the holt was fer ashore. Thus have I reported that they had a prospetous voyage without any fearfull danger, or much trouble; giving credit herein to very manny writers, as well Greeks as latines. Only Caliss (letting afide that the ships were not cast away and drowned amid the surging waves) writeth how other dangers both of water and weather encountred them: in so much as at the last the Armado was driven by tempest from the coasts of Africk, and fell upon the Iland * Agimurus, from whence they had much ado to recover their direct course again; and finally when the ships were at hand to fink under the water, then the souldiers faring like men at point to fuffer shipwrack, without lience and commandment of their Generall and without their armor. ingreat fear made shift with boats to recover the shore.

The Romans thus being landed, pitched their tents among the hils next adjoyning. By which time the terror and fearfull fright of this their arrivall was not entred only into the Maritime coasts and territories bounding upon the fea, first upon the discovery of the fleet, and afterwards by reaion of the rumor and turnult of the army, as it came alhore; but also spred forward as far as to the good towns and very Cities. For not only the high waies were all filled and overfored with multitudes of men, women and children, who went by heapstogether one with another; but also the country pealants drave before them whole herds of cattelias a man would have faid that had feen it, how all Africk was like to be abandoned at once on a fuddain : in fuch fort, as they put the Citics indeed in greater fear & perplexity then they were themselves, and especially Caribage above allothers: where there was no leffe trouble and hurliburly, then if it had been surprised and forced by the enemie. For fince that time that M. Attiline Regulas, and L. Manline were Cost. for the space almost of fifty yeers, they had not once so much as seen an army of Romans, but only certain fleets of rovers and men of war, 'who had landed at times, and made some rodes into the lands lying aponthe fea fide: and when they had harried fome prizes, fuch as came next hand, they ever were retired again to the thips, before the alarme could be given to raise the country. The greater therefore now was both the flight and fright within the City. And to speak a truth, good canfe they had; by reason that there was neither at home in readiness an army of puissance to encounter the enemy, nor a captain of valour to conduct and lead an army. Afdrabal was the ion of Gifgo, for nobility and high parentage, for honour and renown, for wealth and riches, and beides for the new affinity then contracted with King, was of all others the personage by many degrees, yea, and the only man of the whole State. And him they remembred very well to have been foiled, discomfitted and beaten out of the field in Spain, by the felf-same Scipio in divers and fandry battels. Also they made accompt, they were no more able to match the Captains man for man, than to compare and fet their tumultuary power railed in halt, with the staid and experienedamy of the Romans. Therefore they gave the alarm prefently, as if Scipie were ready to affinit Carthage out of hand: the gates with all speed were shut and made sure: the wals manacd with foundiers : the corps de guard fet : watch and ward kept : and all the night following the Sentinels duly relieved and mainteined. The next day, 500 light horse were sent out as espials and vancurriers to discover and scour the quarters to the sea side; and withall to impeach them that were a difbarking and coming land : who chanced to light on the Romans corps de guard. For Scipio had fent away the fleet already to Vioa, and before he was gone up into the land far from the fea, had encamped upon the next hils thereby, placed guards of horfemen in convenient places, and put out certain foragers into the fields and villages for to raife booties. These having chtred skirmish with the Carthaginian cornet and horsemen, slew a few of them in the very confife, but most of them as they fied and were followed in chase, amongst whom was Hanno also the provolt marshall, a noble young gentleman. Scipio not only wasted the country all about, but allo wan a City of the Africans that flood neerest, and was of sufficient wealth; where besides a other fillage which was presently imbarked in the ships of burden and sent into Sieity, there were taken prisoners eight thousand polles of free and bond one with another. But the great taken prisoners eight thousand polles of free and bond one with another. But the greatike joy and contentment that the Romans took in this new entrance and beginning of their warske affairts, was for the coming of Masaissa whom some report to have presented himself with 200 horse and no more; but the most do write that he came with 2000. But for as much as this Manoriffa was of all other Kings for histimethe greatest Prince and most puissant, and withill he state that stood the Romans in belt stead and helped their state, none like unto him: me thinks it were worth their labor, and would quit for all the paines, to digresse skilled on to the way, to to shew with their labor, and would quit for all the paines, to digresse skilled on to the way, to to shew with their labor, and would quit for all the paines, to digresse skilled, both in the loss and also in the recovery of the inheritance of his stathers kingdome.

This Mafaniffa, whiles he was employed during the wars of Spain, in the defence and quarrell of the Carthaginians; his father, whole name was Gala, hapned to die : and then the king. dome fell by delcent, according to the custome and manner of the Numidians unto Defalces the ldte Kings brother, a man of great years and very aged. And not long after, when Defalces also was departed his life, Capuja the elder of his two fons, (for the other was a very child) succeeded in his fathers Kingdome. But for as much as he the forefaid Capafa maintained his royall flat and throne, more by reason of the authority and reputation that he carried among his friends and favorites, than by power and ftrength; there arole up in arms one named Mezetulu (who also was delcended of royall bloud, but of an house that was ever of the adverse and contrarie fide) w and contended in much variety offortune about the crown, with those who then swayed the feepter. This Mezetulus having gathered a power of his tenants, followers, and pealantsofthe country (with worm he carried a great stroke and was highly esteemed, by reason of the hatred that they bare unto the Kings race) encamped openly and the wes himself in action, yea, and torced the King to come into the field, and to trie the title of the crown in a fet battell by dintof iword. In which conflict, Capufa, together with many of his peers and nobles were flain, and the whole nation and feignory of the Matilians, was reduced under the rule and obedience of Mezetules. Howbeit he forbare to be called King; and contenting himself with the mean name of Tutor or Protector, gave the Kings stile to the child Lacuman, who only remained alive of the Kings iffue and line. He took to wife a noble dame and lady of Carthage, Annibal his necesty his fifter who had been lately wedded unto King Defalces; hoping thereby to enter into league and alliance with the Carthaginians . and befides, for to renew the ancient familiarity and aming with Syphax, he tent Embaffadors unto him of purpote. Thus made he himfelf ftrong aforehand sgainst Mafaniffa. Majaniffa likewise for his part, being advertised of his uncles death, and also how his coulin german was decealed, croffed the feas out of Spain over to Mauritania, at what time as Buebar was King of the Moors. At whole hands by humble fute and importunat praiers in mollowly manner, he obteined a power of 4000 Moores to accompany him in the journey, for otherwise to employ them in war he might not. And after he had dispatched a messenger afore-hand to thole that were his fathers friends and wel-willers to himfelf, by that time that he was come with them to the confines of his realm, there met him almost 500 Numidans. Having therefore fent backagain the Moores from thence unto the King, according to covenant, albeit there was affembled together a imalier number of people then he hoped and looked for, and not io sufficient that he dust adventure upon to great an enterprite; and supposing withall, that by entring into some action, and by travell and endeavour, he fhould gather firength ftill to perform fome great exploit, he encountred at Thap/us the yong king Lacumax, as he journied unto Syphax. And when the Kings company in great fear fled into the town, Mafaniffa both at the first affault won the faid town, and also of the Kings train received some that yeelded themselves, and slew othersome that maderal stance in their own desence. But the greatest part with the child himself the young Prince, got away in that tumult and escaped unto Syphax, unto whom at first they intended their journey, The fame of this small thing, so happily atchieved in the first beginning and entrance of his affith, N caused all the Numidians to revolt and side with Masanifa. So as there flocked unto him from all parts of the country, and out of the villages, the old fouldiers of King Gala, and incited the page Prince and fet him on to recover his fathers kingdome. Now in number of fouldiers, Meraining was a good deal superior . for both himself and the same army still entire, with which he haven qu' shed Capufa, besides had some others that after the slaughter of the King, he had receivedupon their yeelding and allo young Lacuman the infant, had brought great aids from Sphan: 10 that Mezetulus was fifteen thouland foot, and ten thouland horse strong With whom Majoriff. albeit he were nothing so puissant either in toot or horse, fought a battell; yet atchieved hethe victory through the approved valour of the old fouldiers, and his own politick wifedome, being a captain well experienced and exercised both in the Roman and Punick wars. The young C Prince together with his tutour and protectour, and some small number of Massilians, sled and escaped into the territories of the Carthaginians. Thus Masanisa having recovered his tathers Kingdome, and forefeeing that there remained still behind a far greater bickerment and encounts With Syphan, & taking it to be the best course and policy for him, to be reconciled and made friends with his coutin german : addressed certain messengers both unto the child, for to put him in good hope and affurance, that if he would submit and yeeld himselfe under the protestion

And Majoriffa, he should live in as honourable place and degree with him, as Defaless sometime haddone with his states Calas: and allo to Messaulias to give their word and promise unto him, not only for impunity or all trespasses, but also for faithfull relativition of all things that were his given him to be persuaded both of them to take part with him who made choice of a mean class at home in their own-country, rather than to live in exile: not with standing the Carthaginians is boured all that ever they could to the contravition.

Aldrabal hapned at that time when these occurrences fell out, to make his abode with Syphax: who finding the Namidian King Sphax refolved upon this point, and fully perfusaded, That it mattered not, nor imported bimleif much, whether Lacumax or Mafanifa were King of the Maffilians, replied unto him and faid, that he was fouly deceived if he thought that Majaniffa B would keep himfelf within thote terms, that either his father Gala or his uncle Defalces, held them comented with: No, no, (quoth he) there is much more towardnesse in him and far greater fignes of hauty mind and forward wir and spirit apear in him, then ever shewed in any of his house and line before him Full often hath he in Spain made good proof of rarevalour and fingular prowelle, as well unto his friends as his enemies. And let both Syphan and the Charthaginians look as well about them as they can, for unleffe they put out this fparkle of fire betimes, and even arthe first beginning, it will be their chance to be caught therewith, when it shall burn forth; and able they shall not be to help the matter and quench the rage thereof. Mary, as yet his strength is imil and flender, his forces frail, tender, and feeble, and not well united together to maintainhis state, unselted as he is in his Kingdome. Thus he importuned him still by reasons and per-C [wallons, untill at length be reduced him to lead forth an army into the confines of the Malfillians and there in that teritory, about the title whereof he had oftentimes not only contended by plea and words with Gala, but also by arms and dint of fword, to encamp himself as in his rightfull ans undoubted inheritance; with this direction, that if any came against him to warn him off the ground, then to trie his interest by sword : which was the only way to be taken and most for the purpole : but in case for fear of him they quit the possession quietly, then to advance forward into the heart of the kingdome; for either the Massilians would without battell render themselves under invication, or elle in a pitched field not be able to frand out against him. Upon thele fugueftions by bax was incited and pricked on; infomuch as he made war upon Mafan ffa, andin the first battell discomfitted and put to flight the Massilians. And Masanifa with some few horsmen fled out the held and eleaped unto a mountain which the inh bitants call Balbus. Certain whole families and housholds with their sheds and tents, together with their cattell (which is all their riches) went after and followed the King. But all the multitude of the Maffilians besides, did homage unto Sphax and came under his obedience. This mountain aforefaid, which their exiles that fled their country were possessed of, was plentifull of grasse well watered; and being so good for palture to feed their cattell, it yeelded fufficient maintenance and food abundant, for the people that used to live upon flesh and milk, From hence they began at first to steal out by night and make rodesibut afterwards in open day light to rob and spoil all the country about but above all others to fire and burn the teritory of the Carthaginians : both because there were more prizes to be had from thence, than from the Numidians; & also for that it was more fafe robbing and harrying there E without danger. This they practifed to long, to licentionfly, and in such scornfull manner, that now they would carrie their booties to the fea fide, and make markets & fale therof to the merchants . and for this purpose divers ships arrived thither to traffick : yea, and other whiles there were many of the Carthaginians cut off and came short home, and more of them were either flain or taken priloners then often times in open war and fet battels. The Carthaginians bewailed and complained of thele matters unto Syphax, and spurred him forward / disposed well enough as he was of himtelito revenge) for to pursue the reliques of the war, in his own person. But for asmuch as it was not thought to stand with the royall Majestie of a King, to chase and hunt a rabble of vagrant theeves about the mountains; therefore Bocchar one of the Kings Captains, a right hardy and valorous man, was choicn to do the feat, and to perform that fervice. Who had the con-Fauct of four thousand foot, and two thousand horse : and was promised besides, great gifts and mighty rewards, in case he orought, away the head of Majaniffa: but if he could take him prifeher slive, that were alone indeed, and a peerleffe peece of work, of ineftimable joy beyond all meainte. He waiting his time when the enemies were ftragling retchleffely abroad, came upon them at unawares and charged them, and having fingled from the guard of the armed fouldiers, a huge number both of people and cattel, he forced Majaniffa himfelf with some few horsmen to take the top of the mountain. From whence after he had fentaway unto the King (as if the war had nowbeen at point of an end) not only a great booty of people and cattell, the which he had taken, but also part of his forces, as being much greater in proportion, then for to dispatch the remnants of a war, accompanyed with no more then five hundred foot, and two hundred horle, he purfued Masanifabeing come down from the hill tops, and there having belet and stopped the passages at both ends, enclosed him within the streight and narrow vally. Where there was committed a great execution and flaughter of the Maffillaus, but Mafaniffa with fifty horiemen and not above, got away through the unknown and hidden cranks of the mountain, and elcaped the hands of the puriners. Howbeit, Bocobar traced him still, and followed him at heels so narrowly, that neer to the City Clapea he overtook him in the plains, where he fo itreightly cavironed him about, that he killed all his company every one, fave onely four horsemen.

With whom in that tumult he let slip as it were out of his hands Majawiffa also himself fore H wounded and loft him clean. As he fled, he had ftill in his eie certain cornets of horimen differied all over the plain, and some of them crossing the waies overthwart to meet the enemy at every turn, and to intercept him. But he and the four horimen with him fled forwards fill, and tookthe great tiver before them : for their fear and fright was greater then to make any flay at the bank fide, but to put their hories to it, and plunge in . where they were carried with the current of the ftream and born to a fide: two of them in the fight of the enemies were swallowed up of the deep hurlpits; himfelfalfo was supposed to have perished with them, but he and the other two horimen besides caught hold of certain twigs of oisiers that grew under the banks on the farther side, So Bocchar made an end of farther purfuit, as neither daring to take the river, nor believing that he had any enemy for to chair. And thus returned he to the King with falle news, that Mafanifia] was drowned. And divers posts and curriers were fent out to Carthage, to report these exceeding joyfull tidings. This rumout and same of Masan sia his death being noised all over Africh wrought diversly in the minds of men. But Majaniffa keeping himself close in a secret care. whiles he cured his hurt with certain herbes, lived for tome dates by the foraging and robbeyof the other two horfmen. So foon as the wound was once healed up and skinned over, and that he thought himself able to abide the sitting and shaking of his horse, with exceeding courage & boldnesse he set forward again to claim and recover his kingdome. And having in the way as he passed gotten together unto him not above forty horfe, by that time he was come among the Mallilans, and gave out openly who he was, he prevailed to much with them, that as well in regard of their ancient favour and love toward him, as also for the unexpected joy that they faw him alweard K found, whom they verily beleeved to have been dead; within few daies there were gathered and assembled unto him 6000 foot, and 4000 horse. So as not only he was restored again, and pur in full polseffion of his fathers Kingdome, but also wasted and spoiled the confederat nations of the Carthaginians, yea, and the frontiers and confines of the Maixiyli, which belongeth to the Kingdome and dominion of Syphax. Having thus provoked Syphax to war, he fet him down and encamped between the Cities of Cirtha and Hippo,upon the ridge of certain hils, places of advantage and commodious in all respects. Then Syphax supposing it a greater peece of work, and of more importance then to be managed by his captains, lent part of his forces under the conduct of his fon, the young Prince named Vermina, and gave order unto him to wheel about with his power, and whiles the enemy was amuled upon himfelt one way, to charge upon him behind anothe L way. So Vermina let forth, and took his way by night, because he was to give the charge closs, and infectet. But Syphax, who was to thew himfelt with banner difplaied, and to bid the enem battell, marched openly by day light, and advanced forward. And when the time (as he though was come, wherein they that were tent about to fetch a compais, might reach to the place appointed, himfelf allo trufting as well in the multitude of his men, as in the ambufh laid before the enemies back, let his battell in array; directly upon the fide of the hill, which with gendend easie alcent ariseth, and leadeth towards the enemy. Masanifa likewise arranged his men, prefuming most of all in the plot of ground, which terved much better for his advantage to fight, The battell was sharp and cruell, and tor a long time doubtfull. Whiles the site of the place, and valour of the fouldiers much helped Majaniffa; and the number again on the other fide, which M exceeded beyond all measure, and made too great odds, availed Syphan. This multitude divided into two battaillons, whiles the one wa opposed affront the enemy, and the other compassedsbout their tail and back part, gave the victory elecrunto Sphaz : infomuch, as the enemy thas enclosed both before and behind, had no way in the world to escape. Whereupon all the footmen and horimen both were either killed or taken prifoners. Only two hundred horimen or very neer to many, which were gathered in a ring together about Mafaniffa, he commanded to call themfelves by troups and foundrons into three leveral companies, and fo to pierce and break through the first he appointed them a certain place before, where they should rally and meet together again after their scattered flight. Himself in person, at one side which he had proposed to himself being, "Golfo di Caps. made means to pass through the very pikes and darrs of the enemies, and escaped. Two of thole N These Syries, quadrons tarried still behind, the one for fear yeelded to the enemy, the other sticking toil, and as well the making more refiftance, was overcharged with thot of arrows and darts. But Mafaniffs wising greater as the in and out, to and fro, deluded Vermina, who prefied hard upon him, and followed himidiat lefts are in the in and out, to and fro, deluded Vermina, who prefied hard upon him, and followed himidiat Mediteranean heels : and after he had wearied him out at length in tedious travail and desperate pursute, cused him perforce to gave over the chair. Whiles he himfelf with feventy horlegat away as fat as to the less * Syrees, where he set up his rest, and quieted his conscience, in that he had so often right bars; and are valiantly fought to recover the inheritance of his fathers Kingdome : and led his life between the * Punick Emporia and the nation of the Garamants, untill the arrivall of the Roman navy, and C. Lalius into Africk. These presumptions induce me to think and believe, that Majaufacime afterwards also unto Scipio with a small power of horimen, rather then with any great aid. For 0 that multitude was befitting the flate of a Prince, established in his Kingdome, but this small num the Syries, fo ber beleemed the mean condition and fortune of a poor exile and banished man.

Now to return again unto our story. The Carthaginians having lost the cornet of horizonforesaid, together with their captain, and raised another power of horse, by taking new mules, made Hanne the ion of Amilea commander over them. And first by messengers and icurs Amissive they sent for Afarabal and Syphax one after another, and at left also even by Embassadors and Orstors. As for Afdrahal, they required him to succour his netive country, before manner round about: Syphax they belonght and requested to provide for the lafety and fence of Carthage and all Africk.

The nine and twentieth Book of T. Livius.

At that time Scipio was encamped neer Vices, within a mile of the City : for he was removed from the fee fide, where some few daies, he kept a standing camp close to the fleet. Hanno having received a power of Cavalry, nothing tufficient and ftrong enough to charge upon the enemie nor to much as to guard and defend the country from wasting and spoiling, first before allother things c ft about and deviced, how he might augment his number of horlemen by a new levy and enrolment. And albeit he rejected none of other nations, yet he levied and waged the Numidians e-Bipecially, the best hortemen simply in all Africk. Now had he gathered together upon four thouand boile, when he surprised a City named Salera, almost fifteen miles from the Roman camp, And when word was brought to Scipio, that io great a Cavalry took up their fummer standing barhour within a town ; Tush (quoth he) I passe not, if they were more then they are, so long as they hae fuch some to be their leader. And thinking with himself that the more flowly the enemies went to work, the leffe he was to flack his bufinefs, he fent Majaniffa before with the horiemen. and give commandment to ride up and down before the gates, to brave the enemy, and to train him forth to fight : with this direction, that when their whole multitude w siffned forth, and the skinnifigrown to hot, that he might not well endure the charge, he should give ground and retreat bylittle and little, for he would himfelf come in due time to the battell. And flaying no c longer bebind, then whiles he thought Mafanifa who was gone before, had time enough to train the cnemies forth, he followed after in person with the Rom n horimen, &m rehed closely under the hils (which flood fitly for the purpole, opposit between him and the enemy Jabout every turning of the way. Mafaniffa for the purpose according to the direction given him, one while right coursejoully gallopped before the gates, as one th. t would brave and terrific the enemy, another while sif he had been affre id himself, gave b ck; and by this counterfeit shew of fearfulnesse, he made the enemies more bold and venturous, and drew them on to purine him rashly. But as yetthey were not all gone forth, and their captain was diverfly troubled, and had much ado with them, while he was fain to force and compell forme that had taken their load of wine, and were heavy-headed and fleepy withall, to arm themselves and to bridle their hories, and to ftay others from maning out of the gates at once confuledly, without order or array, and without their colours. Majanifacaught up thole, and cut them thore, that a part from their company at the first fetting out, rode venturoully forward, and took no heed to themselves: but anon when more of them tulaction that once out of the gate, the skirmith was maintained with equal valour on both fides and at last, when the horfmen were abroad and joyned in battell, Mafanifa was not possibly able to hold out any longer. How beit he fled not outright, but as he gave back leilurely, he received them as they violently charged upon him : fo loog, untill he had trained them to those hils, under which the Roman Cavalry lay hidden. Then role the horsemen from out of their ambush, themselves in heart, and their horses fresh; and environed Hanne and the Africans, who with fighting andfollowing were tired out and overwe-ried : Mafaniffa likewife turned his horfes fuddainly, andmade head ag in, and returned to battel afresh : so there were environed, intercepted, and kiledinthe place together with Hanno himfelf the Generall, fast upon a thousand, even as many as were in the vanguard, and could not well retire themselves backward. The rest affrighted with the denh of their leader, fled with bridle on horse neck: whom for the space of three miles the conquerors followed in chase upon the spur, and either slew and took prisoners two thousand horsemenot them besides. Amongst whom there were, as it is for certain known, no fewer than two bundred naturall Carthginians, men of armes, and divers of them of good mark, both in regard of wealth and riches, as also of birth and noble parentage.

lifortuned that the very fame day when this hapned, the ships which had transported over the booty into Sicily, returned back charged with provision of victuels, as if they had prefaged & foretokened by their arrivall, that they were come for a new pillage and freth prizes. But all witters do not accord, that two Carthaginian captains of one name were flain in two battels, of the Cavalry for fear (as I verily take it) left by telling one thing twice, they might feem to deceive and stude the reader. Certes Calius and Valerius report that Hanne was taken prisoner. Then Scipio beflowedrich gifts upon the captains and horsemen according to their good service, and as they everyone deferved : but above all the reft, be highly rewarded Majaniffa. And when he had pleed a strong garrison in Salera himself with the rest of his army made rodes; and not only walied and spoiled the lands and villages all the way as he went, but also forced and won certain Ciits and borough towns : and so having filled all places far and neer with the terror of war & hostility, be returned to the camp, the feventh day after he fet forth, bringing with him great numbers of prople, much store of cattell and prizes of all forts; and to dispatched away the ships a second time faight and laden with spoils of the enemies. After this he set office all light expeditions, small edes and increase of the country towns, and bent his whole power and all his forces against Veimending it he had once won it, to fattle himfelf there, and to make it his feat from thence and, and a fure place of defence in .ll his other exploits that he meant to perform. Thither the time were the lea-servitors brought from the armado, to that part of the City where entrateth upon the wals. likewife the land fouldiers advanced from the hill that overlooketh

The nine and twentieth Book of T. Livius. mean time at Rome, M. Livius and C. Claudius held a new choice and review of Senators; and O. Fabius was once again chosen the principall Senator and President of the Senat. Seven in number of them were noted with ignominy and difgrace, but not one of all those had fitten in the ivoly chair and born office of state. They looked narrowly and most faithfully to the Publicans, that had the charge of the City-buildings to fee them kept wind-tight and water-tight, and in sufficient reparations. They publickly gave order for a paved causie to be made, from the beatls market unto the temple of Vinus, and all about the shops and scaffolds in the shew-places. Also the church * Magna Mater [the gre t mother of the gods] they c uled to be built in the mount Palatine. They * Cybele, or Iinflituted allo a new tax and impost out of the provision of falt. And whereas both at Rome and dea Acthis throughout all Italy, falt was fold at a * Sextant by the Modius, they let and fermed this commothroughout an Italy in the same price ftill in Rome; but in the market towns and fairs, they enhanced the price higher, and in fundry pl ces they rated it at divers prices. This tax was deviled that affes were as all men verily believed, by the one of the Centors, for anger, and an old grudg that he bare un- Sextentarit and to the people; because he had been in times past unjustly judged and condemned by them, and not Librales, at therefore in the penfion and price of f.lt they supposed that those tribes were most pinched Scatters which and charged who were the means of the hard doom that passed against him. Hereupon it came that before was the this Living was furnamed Salinator. The cenfe and numbring of the Citizens was finished the la- fixth pare of tet, because the Censors had sent about into all provinces, that the full number should be taken of an Affe, a cue all Roman Citizens, who were without in the armies, and prefentment made accordingly. So or halfarthere were registred in all, with those abroad two hundred and seven & fifty thousand persons. And now was raised C.C.Clandins Nero was he that performed and accomplished this numbring and affeliment. After to the worth this there was a Cenfe or tax ition taken of the twelve Colonies, a thing then brought up and never of the whole histhere was a cente or rax from taneous tipe were concerns then great prought up and never before. And according to the relation of the Cenfors they were entired into the fubfidy book and valued at the capital from the property of the capital from the property of the capital from the property of the capital from the capital from the property of th at Rome : that it might appear upon record in the publick inftruments and writings, what number ing, the price of able men for war they could make, and what every man was worthin money and goods of a Modius of Then they began to take a furvey of the gentlemen and knights at Rome. And it fortuned to, that fale in Rome, both Centors had hories of the City provision and charges. And when the crier came to cite thole fet down by of the tribe Pollia wherein the name of M. Livim was enrolled, & made fome flay to call the Cenfor himself by name : Cili hardly (quoth Nero) for M. Livine. And whether it were upon the reliques of an old cancered malice, or that he took a foolish pride and vain delight to seem for sooth D to be severe and precise, he commanded M. Livins to sell his horse of service, because he had been fometimes a man condemned by the doom of the people. Semblaly M. Livins when the crier was come unto the tribe Narniensis, and to the name of his collegue, awarded C. Claudius to fell and make away his great horse likewise; and that for two causes, the one for that he had born fail witnelsand depoted wrongfully against him: the other, because he was not foundly and in truth of heart reconciled unto him, when they were made friends. Whereupon there grew a foul jar and contention between them, whiles they passed not to impeach and stein the credit one of the other even with the touch and h zard of their own good name and reputation. At the end of the Cenforthip, when C. Claudius had fworn to keep and observe the lawes, and was alcended up into the chamber of the Cities treasure; among the other names of those that he left as disfranchised and tributaries, he declared his collegue for one, and gave up his name in the roll. Afterwards came M. Living into the chamber aforelaid, and fetting afide the tribe Metia only (which neither had condemned himself, nor elected him a condemned person for Consul or Censor) he declared the whole people of Rome like wife inspended, even four and thirty tribes; and left them all no better

Surely that reciprocall debate between the two Cenfors, in depraving and defaming one another wasbut a lewer and naughty part by them plaid: but this chaftifement of the peoples levity and inconstancy, was a worthy thing, and beseeming the Censors gravity of that time. While the Ceniors flood thus in exceeding difgrace and hatred with the people, Cn. Bebins a Tribune of the Commonstaking his time and occasion hereby to rife and become great, endited them both and commenced an action against them before the body of the people. But this delignment of his was foundalist and came to nothing, though the generall accord and content of the LL, of the councells to the end the tin time to come, no such example might be extant upon record, that the Censors dignity should be exposed to the variable and inconstant pleasure of the people.

The lame summer in the Brutians country, Petilia had been already forced and won by the Cof. when as Confentia and Pandofia, with other mean and base peeces, willingly yeelded themselves to his devotion. Now when the time drew neer of the election of new magiltrats, it was thought good that Cornelius should be sent for to Rome out of Inscany, where there was no war at all, rather then the other Conful out of his province: who being come, created for Confuls Cneus Servilius Capio, and Cn. Servilius Geminus. After this, the court was affembled for the chusing of Pretours, the town, and joyneth in manner hard to the very wals. As for artillery and engines of battery H and affault, some they had brought with them, and others were sent out of Sicily with the victuals. and daily new were made in the common Armory and Arcenall, where there were of purpose artificers continually kept at work for the framing of such fabricks and pecces of battery. The menof Vica belet thus round about on every fide with to great preparation and ordinance of war, repoled their whole hope and confidence in the Carthaginians; and the Carthaginians relied themselves upon Asdrabal, in case he should sollicite Syphan for to set to his helping hand. But all things went but flowly forward, and they bestirred themselves not so quickly, as they should have done, who wanted fo much aid as they did. And Afdrabal when he had with all the means and the best shift that he could make, gathered together thirty thousand foot and three thousand horse, yet durst he not approach the enemy, before the coming of Syphan to joyn with him. At length came I Syphax with fifty thousand foot, and ten thousand horse and immediately departing from Carthage, encamped not far from Vicca and the Roman camp. Whole arrivall yet was lo important, and wrong ht this effect; that Scipio after forty dayes welneer (during which time he had invested Viva and tried all mastries but in vain) was compelled to remove his siege & dislodge, without doing any good at all. For now the winter approached, and he fortified his flanding leaguer for winter harbour upon a promontory, which joyning to the continent by a thin and narrow ride of a bank, lieth out a good way and beareth into the fea. And with one and the felf-fame trench and rampier, he empaled both his army, and also the thips that lay up in the dock. The legions were quartred and lodged in the midsofthe (aid cape : the ships that were drawn up to land, and likewise the failers and mariners, kept the strand on the north fide of the hill; the horsemen took # up the vail towards the fouth, upon the hanging and fide therof, shooting to the other shore. And thele were the acts atchieved in Africk untill the end of Autumn.

Besides the provision of corn garthered from all parts out of the countries pilled and wasted round about, and other flore of victuals brought out of Sicily and Italy, Cn. Ottavine the Vicepretor arrived with a mighty deal of grain out of Sardinia, tent from T. Claudius the Pretor, who had the government of that I land: fo as not only the old garners aiready made were replenifhed, but also those that were newly built. Only there wanted apparell for the army. Whereupon Odani. m had in commission to break with the Pretor about that matter, namely, what liveries might be provided out of that province, and lent for the fupply of that defect. Which business was not flackly followed, but with all diligence performed in such fort, is in short space there were sented.

During the time of that immer wherein thologecurences passed in Africk, P. Semprenius the Contul who governed the Province of the Bruji, skirmished suddainly in a disordred manner with Annibal upon the very way, within the terstory of Croton: where the fight was mainteined rather by iquadrons and companies one to one, then by any fet body of a ranged battell. The Romans were discomfitted; and having lost in this conflict (which might more truly be called a tumultuous scutsling than a full fight Jupon 1200 of the Consuls army, they retired in great halt and fear into their camp. Yet durit not the enemies make an affault upon them within their hold. But the Conful dislodged from thence in the dead time of the next night, and having dispatched acourier before unto P. Licinius the Vice-conful, for to come forward with his legions, he joyned his M power unto them. So they returned again unto Annibal, being now two Generals, and two entire armies. And without any stay, to battell they went : whiles the Conful on the one fide stood upon this his power redoubled and reenforced, & Annibal on the other fide took heart for his fresh victory aforelaid. Sempronisus advanced with his legions into the vanguard; P. Licinius with his, kept the rerewards. The Conful at the very first shock and beginning of the conflict, voweds chappell to Fortuge under the name of Primigenia, in cale he might have the honour of that day, and vanquish his enemies. And furely his vow was heard, and he obteined his defire : forthe Carthaginians was discomfitted and put to flight, and more than four thousand armed mensione, three hundred or somewhat under taken prisoners, forty horie of service got alive, and a 11 enligns won and carried away. Annibal dismayed and daunted at this adverse and unlucky battell, with N drew his forces to Croton.

At the same time M. Cornelius the Consul, in another side of Italy held in swe Hetrarianot so much by force of armes, as by rigorous processe of law and severe pultice: for all that country in maner was turned to Mago, and by his means and favor hoped for a change, and were altogether ict upon novelties & an alteration of the state. The examinations and judicial trials of these matters the Contul followed by vertue of commission from the Senat, and not upon his own motive and feeking : and went through therewith, fetting afide all partiality, nothing respective of favour of displeature. In such fort, that many of the nobility of Tyfcane (fuch as enther nad repaired themfelves in perion, or had fent their agents unto Mago, for to treat with him about the revolt and rebellion of the States wherein they lived) were at first, as many as ma be per sonall apparance, con 0 demned : out afterwards, such as had guilty consciences, went into voluntary and end condemned in their abtence, in stead of their bodies which were gone out of the way, they) ecided and left behind them their goods only, which might be forfeit and confitcat a pawns to paylor the punishment of their persons.

N Africk, Scipio by the help of Malanissa in fundry battels vanguished the Carthaginiaus,togethe with the afore-faid Syphax King of the Numidians, and Aldrubal. He won and facked ino campif the enemies, wherein there perished by fire and sword, to the number of 40000 men. By the mian of C. Lalius be took Syphax alive. Malanisla when he had taken prifoner queen Sophonista, the wife of Syrhax and dangbeer of Aldrubal, by and by fell in love with her, and by may of marriagent her to mife : but being chaftifed and rebuked therefore by Scipio, he fent unto ber a cup ofpoila; which the drank & therof died. By manifold victories of Scipio it came topals, that the Carthaginan driven to despair, were fain to call for Annibal out of Italy, to fave the main chance, and defendibir whole state: Who, in the 16 year of the wars, departed out of Italy, sailed over into Atrick, & asaidh means of enoference to make peace with Scipio. And when they could not agree about the condition of capulations thereof, he fought of was overthrown in the plain field. The Carthaginians at their laid Grequest had peace granted. And when Gilgo dissipaded that peace, Annibal plueked himback within had, with had, of o after some excuse made of his ruderasmest in that behalf, himself space Magowin had fought with the Romans in the country of the Insubrians, was grievensty wounded, & being in to home into Africk by certain embassaders, in the way died of his hurt. Malanilla was fully refined to his kingdome. Scipio being returned to the City of Rome, had the glory of a most kononrable and noble triumph : whom, Q. Terentius Canco, a Senator, followed wish a cap [of freedome] upon his head. Scipio was surnamed Affricanus : but doubifull it is, whether he came by that title through thefe M voir of his fouldiers before,or the general applante and affection of the people. But this is certain,but he was the first general that ever was intitled in his stile, with the someone of a nation by himself or

Hen Cn. Servillius Capie, and C. Servilius Geminus (Coff. in that year, whichly computation was the 16 of the 2 Punick war) proposed unto the Senat, contrning the affairs of the State, the managing of the wars, and the government of the provinces : the LL ordained and gave order, that the Coff. should either spree N beween themselves, or else cast lots whether of them should go into the Brutian land against Annibal : and whether should take upon him the charge of the province of Herruria and the Ligorians : with commission for him, whose hap it was to rule the province of Brutis, to receive the army from P. Sempronise the Conful; and the faid P. Sempronises (for he also as Vice-conful was to continue in place of government one year longer) to succeed in the room of P. Licinim, who was to return home to Rome. This P. Sempronius among other commendable parts (whereinno Citizen in his time was counted more sufficiently furnished than himself) was taken also lora brave warrior and man at arms. For being richly endued with all those good bleffings that either nature or fortune can afford unto a man, he was both noble in birth, and wealthy in substance. In beautifull personage he excelled, for strength of body he far surpassed. Of tongue and speechhe was thought most eloquent, whether he were to plead a cause at the bar, or occasion offered either in Senat house or before the assembly of the people to perswade or dissiwade to give counsel one way or other. In the Pontificiali canons and laws, he was fingularly well learned and skilfull. Befides all these praise-worthy qualities (I say) his Consulship had given him exeperience also in military affairs, and made him a worthy fouldier. The fame order that was taken for the Brutians province, was also decreed for Herraria and the Ligurians. M. Cornelius was commanded to put over and deliver up his army to the new Conful and himfelf to continue still in government, and to ple the province of France with the Arength of those legions which L. Scribonius the Pretor had under his charge the year before. After this, the Confuls cast lots for their provinces. Unto Canio fellthe Brutei, unto Servilius Geminus, Hetruria. Then the Pretors provinces also were put to the choice of lottery. And P. Elim his lot was to have the jurisdiction of the City of Rome: P. Len. talus to rule Sardinia : P. Vilius to govern Sierly : and Quintilius Varus to have the charge of Ariminum with two legions, which were commanded by Sp. Lucretius. And Lucretius had his commission revived again for a longer time, to the end, that he might recdific the town Genna. which by Mago the Carthaginian had been raied and destroied. As for P. Scipio his commission Band government was not limited by any expresse time, but only with the end of the wars, and to continue untill those wars in Africk were fully determined. A decree also passed, that there should he afolemn procession and supplication holden to this effect, and in these terms, that wheras he had failed over into the province of Africk, this voiage and expedition of his might turn to the lafety and good of the people of Rome, of himself, and his army. In Sicily were enrolled thice thousand louldiers. And for as much as the whole strength and manhood of that province had beenshiped over into Africk: for fear lest some Armado should cut over out of Africk, it was thought expedient to goard all the fea coalts of Sicily, with a fleet of 40 fail. And Villing had with him into Sicily 13 thips, newly built; the rest of the old ships in Sicily were repaired. For Admirell of this armado was apointed M. Pomponiss the Pretor of the former year, whole government was prorogued, and he embarked the new fouldiers brought out of Italy. The like number of thips the LL of the Senat affigned unto Cn. Offavine the Pretor of the former year, with the tame commillion of government, for to defend the coalts of Sardinia. And Lengulus was commanded to allow unto the Pretor 2000 fouldiers for to man and furnish those ships. Moreover, the sea coasts of Italy, because it was uncertain to what parts the Carthaginians would make out their navy (and like it was, that where they should espy any place weak and disturnished of sufficient strength and garrison, thither they would direct and bend their forces) were committed to M. Martin the Pretor of the former year, that he should scour the seas, and keep that side, with as many ships as the other. And for to furnish that fleet of his, the Confuls by order from the Senat enrolled three thouland foundiers, and referved two legions befides, against all doubtfull chances of war D whatloever. As for the two provinces of Spain, together with the armies there, and the whole government, they were appointed to the old Generals, L. Lentulus, and L. Manlins Acidinus, So the Roman wars for that year were mainteined with 20 legions in all & with a hundred and fixty thips of war. Then the Pretors were commanded to take their journey into their feveral provinces. But the Confuls were charged before they departed from the City, to exhibite those great Games, which T. Maulius Torquatus the Bictator had vowed against the 5 years end, if to be the Commonweal remained in the same good and fortunat estate, during that time.

Now there entred into mens minds new doubts and strange scruples of conscience, by reason divers prodigious fights and tokens reported out of many places. For believed it was that certaine ravens not only pecked and rafed with their bils, but also eat and devoured the gold in the Ca-Epitoll. At Antium the mice and rate gnawed a crown of gold. About Capua, a huge number of localts (but from whence they came, no man knew for certain) overspred all the grounds, and filkethe fields. At Rease there was a horse-colt foled with five feet. At Anagnia were seen in the element, at the first divers fire-lights shooting and flashing here and there; and afterwards a mighty blafing comet burning. At Frufino a certain arch compaffed the fun with a thin courie like aline a and afterwards a greater circle of the fun enclosed the faid rundle from without-forth. Inthe territory of Arpi, the earth in a plain champain field fetled and funk down and made an exceeding great chink. As one of the Confuls killed the first beaft for facrifice, the liver there-of was found headless. These monstrous tokens were expiat and purged with facrifices of the bigger fort : and the colledg of the Priests and bishops shewed unto what gods the acrifice should be made. These things once done and performed, the Consuls and Pretors went forth into their provinces : yet fo, as all of them had a speciall regard of Africk, as it it had been their own province fallen unto every one of them by lot; either because they saw that therein reited and confilled the whole importance of all affairs, and the main state of the war: or elie because they Would gratifie and currie favour with Scipio, whom now the whole City made court to, and chiefly respected. And therefore not only out of Sardinia as is beforefaid, but also out of Sicily and Spain thre was transported thither raiment and corn : yea, and armour also out of Sicily, and all kind of victuals, for the maintenance of the army. And about it was winter featon, yet Scipo flaked no affairs and works of war : which being many, amuled his mind at once on every fide, and kept him continually occupied. For Vica he befreged and encamped he lay opposit to Annibal, and even within his fight; the Carthaginians were with their thips affore, and put to lea, and a navy they had rigged, furnished and trimmed, for to intercept all victuals that came. Amid thefe cares he forgat not to win again the love of Syphan, it haply now he had his fill of love-delights with his fresh wife, since he had the plentitual truition thereof, as much as heart could delire. But Syphox rather tendred conditions of peace between the Romans and the Carthaginians, to wit, that the Romans should depart out of Africk. and the Carthaginians out of Ita-Is than feemed to give any hope, that he would revolt from the Carthaginians, in case the war

continued ftill. And for mine own part, I would rather believe that these matters were treated up. on by entercourse of messengers, as most writers do report, than that Sphan himself in person, as Antial Valerius recordeth, came into the Roman camp to aparle and conference thereabout. At the first the Roman Generall, would scarcely lend his ear to hear those overtures but afterwards, to the end that there might be some colourable and probable cause for his people to refort unto the camp of the enemies, he seemed not so streight-laced, nor to deny the same articles so stiffly, but pretended some hope, that by often debating thereof to and fro between them, they should at length grow to some good point and finall agreement. The wintering harbours of the Carthaginians were in a manner all of wood, but built of flender ftuff gathered out of the fields at a venture hand over head, where they could meet withall. The Numidians for the most part lay in cabbine and flieds, watled and wound with reeds especially, and covered and thatched with mats of sedee ! and such like, here and there scattering without all order : in such fort, as some of them taking up their lodging at their own pleasure, without direction and commandment of any officer, quattered without the trench and rampier. Scipio advertised hereof, conceived good hope to find some opportunity one time or other to fire the camp of the enemies. Upon a certain day therefore, he tent in train of those Commissioners whom he addressed unto Sphan, in stead of pages and drudges, and difguited in flaves and bondmens weeds, the bravest fouldiers of a band, men of approved valor, wildome and discretion) who whiles the commissioners were buse in conference, should range about the camp, some one way, some another; to espie and mark all the passess and waies in and out; the fite and form generally of the whole leaguer, and particularly of every part ; where the Catthaginians quartered ; where the Numidians lodged ; what distance there ! was between Afdrubal his tents, and the Kings pavilions ; to observe also and learn with al, the order & the manner of their fentinels, their ward and watches, whether by night or by day they lay at more vantage to be surprised by an ambush. And according as there were divers meetings & conterences, and fo of purpose some were sent one time, some at another; to the end that more & more ftill should have the spialt and full knowledge of all things in the enemies camp. Now whenas of ten that this matter was treated of, the greater hope of peace both Syphan had and the Cartheir mians likewife by his means; the Delegates or Commissioners aforelaid of the Romans, laid that they were expresly forbidden by their Generall to return without a full and resolute answer. And therefore they willed him to make thort work at once, and to bethink himlels what to do, eithr to frand upon his own determinat purpole (it he were resolved) or else to consult with Aldride L and the Carthaginians, and determine accordingly. For now high time it is, fay they eithern conclude peace, or to profecute war freshly, and to go through with it lustily. Thus while Spher consulted with Afdrubal, and Afdrubal with the Carthagians, both the espials had sufficient time to view and tee all, and Scipio allo good leafure to provide necessaries for his purpose. Moreover, by this movive and hope of peace, as well the Carthaginians as the Numidians, began (a commonly in such cases it fallethout) to be negligent and slack in forecast, and to provide that in the mean while they came by no harme and detriment from the enemie. At length an answer was returned and some clauses put in, without all reason, and sounding to much inconvenience by occafion that the Rom ins feemed too too fain and defirous of a peace. Which fell out very fitly for Scipio whole only defire was to pick fome just quarrell for to break the truce and abstinence of war: and so the next day (for in the mean time he faid he would confer with his Counsel) he answered the Kings messenger in this wite, that besides himself alone, who laboured all in vain and could do no good, there was none liked of the peace : and therefore he willed him to report unto the King his mafter, that there was no other hope for Syphan to have peace with the Romans, unleft he renounced and cast off quite the friendship of the Carthaginians. And thus he ended the trut, that with free conference being discharged of his promise in that behalf, he might go forward in his defignments, and bring his enterprife to his defired iffue. So having put his thips to let (for now the prime of fpring was come) he embarked in them his artillery, his ordnance andergins of battery, as if he meant to affault Vtica on the fea fide. And fent out two thousand foul diers, to possesse themselves of the hill that overlooked Vica, which he had held and kept before, N both to withdraw the minds of the enemies from that which he fecretly defigned and intended & amule them upon the care and regard of another thing; and also to prevent a mischief, that whiles himself should go against Syphax and Astrabal, they might not fally forth of the City, and shill his camp, left with a small guard to defend it. Having made this way, and laid this ground aforehand, he affembled his councell, where he commanded as well, the forefaid fpies to lay forthand utter what they had seen and found, as also Masanifia, who was acquainted with all the maner and isthions of the enemies : and then at last he declared and she wed unto them, what himself intended to execute the next night. Then he gave commandment to the Tribunes or Kn. Marshals, that to foon as the councell was rifen, and the court difmified in the Generals pavilion, at the first found of trumpets immediately they should bring their legions out of the camp. Thus according to his 0 edict, the enfigns began a little before fun-fetting to fee forth. About the first watch they put the fouldiers in array ready for to march, and by midnight (for they were to journey feven miles) they going a fair and foft pace, approached the enemies camp. There Sergio gave unto Lalius part of the forces together with Majaniffa and his band of Namidians, with direction to invade the camp of Syphax, and to let fire thereupon Then calling them by themselves both spart one from theother, Lalius I me n and Mafanissa, he earnestly belonght them of all love to make up and

A recompence by carefull industrie and devoir that providence and forecast, which the darkness of the night disappointed them of. As for himself, he meant to let upon Afdrubai and the Carthaginian camp : but begin he would not, before he faw the fire amongst the kings tents. And it w s not long first ere it began : for as soon as the fire caught hold of the next pavilions whereupon it was calt, by and by it took all that were neerelt, and fo forward to those that joyned unto them, it fored into all places of the camp. And verily into a great fright they were all pur, as they could not choose, but needs mult in a night scarefice, which was run all over in so thore a time. Howheit they thought it some fire by milchance only, and not the hand of the enemy, by occasion and means of war : and therefore unarmed as they were, and lightly appointed without weapons they ran forth by heaps to quench the fire, and light full upon their armed enemies, the Numidians e-Bipecially, who by Mafaniffa that was well acquanisted with the maner of the Kings camp, were bellowed in convenient places, at the ends of every avenue and path ge. Many in their very beds and couches, between fleeping and waking, were confumed with the fi me : many running headlong in this their hally flight, one upon an other, were in the flreights of the garestroden under foot, or elfe thrust and crusht to death. The Sentinels and wetch of the Carthaginians, espied at fift the fire shining and flaming out ; after whom others awakened and railed out of their nefts by this nightly tumuli and alarm, might behold and plainly feethe same; but they like wife were descived as well as the other, and believed verily that the fire began of it felf by tome misfortune, no man wift how. The confused notice and cry allo, which was heard whilesthey were a killing, Il ying and wounding, would not suffer them to know the truth indeed, whether the same arose Cupon their affright and luddain fear by night, or otherwife. And therefore every man naked as he was, and suspecting no practife at of all the enemy, at all the gates as they stood next did what he could to bring with him such instruments and means as were to put out the fire : and happed unawates upon the army of the Romans. Now after they were all maffacred and put to the iword to to the lalt man, not only upon an ordinary hatred between enemies, but also bec use there might not eleape to much as one to carry newes unto the reft : Scipio immediatly entred the gates, being not warded, but altogether neglected, as in tuch a fearfull garboil and hurlyburly it was no muvell. They fell a flinging of fire upon the lodgings and flieds that flood next, to as the flame brake out and shewed at first as if it had been dispersed in many places: but afterwards catching and foreding from one tent to another as they joyned close together, they were all at once on a n light fire, and burnt every flick down to the ground. Men and cattell both, finged and fcorched at the full as they ran in piteous and fearfull fort away : but afterwards as they tumbled one upon another by heaps, stopped and choked up all the waies and avenues of the gates. And look who eleged the fire, felupon the edge of the fword | Thus in one day were 2 camps clean confumed. Howbeit, both the Generals, and of fo many thoulands of armed men, only 2000 foot and 500 horicarmed by halfs, and many of them either wounded or elfe finged and half rofted with the fire. got away and escaped. There either were flain or burnt to ashes u pon 40000 men . taken priloners there were above 6000: among whom there bapned to be many gentlemen of the Carthagia nians, and 11 Senators. Of enligns were taken 178, Of Numidian horses for service more than 2700. Six Elephants got alive, eight perished either with fire or sword and a mighty deal of armor Ec me to their hands : all which the L. General Scipio consecrated to Vulcan, and set on fire. Afdrubal with some few Africans that fled with him, rid away upon the spur to the next City: and thither got all reft, who remained alive, following the tracks of their captain, and there faved themselves. But afterwards left that City should be yielded to Scipio, he quit the place and departed. Anon the Romans were received within the fame at the gates standing open for them : and becale willingly of themselves they rendred the town, there was no kind of holtility or violeace offered unto them. But two other Cities one after another were forced and put to the ranface. All that pillage, as also whatsoever was saved out of the fire in the two camps, was freely given to the fouldiers, Syphax encamped and fortified himself in a strong hold, almost eight miles off. But afdrabal made halt to Carthage, for fear left upon the fuddain fright occasioned by this fresh and late overthow, things should go backward, and the Senat resolve upon some unmanly and unworthy course. Thirder at the first arrived such fearfull news, that all men thought verily that Scihe would give over Vica and forthwith lay fiege unto Carthage: whereupon there Suffetes (who are the Confuls as it were, of the City) called the Senat : where three opinions were delivered amongst them. The first advited to dispatch Embassadors to Scipio to treat for peace : the fecond, to fend for Annibal home to the defence of his own country, against fo dangerous and deauly a war : the third gave countell, by example of the Romans conftancy and resolution inthin advertity, to repair the army and gather new forces, and to requelt Syphan not to abandon and give over the quarrell. This opinion, because Afdrabal was in place (and all those that sided with the Barchine house and faction, evermore inclined to war) prevailed and took effect. Here-Gupon thespegan to take multers in town and country . Orators were addressed to Syphax, who of himself with all his might and main, was busied to levy fresh forces, and preparing for new was. For his wife now, not as aforetime, by inticing words, flattering speeches, and plea-" fant allurements, that might serve the turn to win and move the heart of an amorous lover, "but by way of prayer and pititull compassion had prevailed so much with him already : yea, "and with plenteous tears belonght him, not to betray her naturall father and native countrey, "nor tuffer Corrbagato be burnt with flaming fire, like as the camps were confumed already.

Now when Scipio was wholly set upon the assault of Visca, and at the point to bend his ord. nance and artillery against the wals, as thinking verily that the war was already done with Siphase and the Carthaginians; the fame of the war renewed by them afresh, averted him from his purpofe, and cauled him to give over that enterprise for a time. So leaving behind him cessis imal guards, as well by water as land, only for a fign and show of fiege; bimfelf with all the frength of his army, fet forwards to meet the enemy. At the fift he face him down and enemp. ed upon an hill, four miles (or very neer) diftant from the Kings camp. The next day after, hedefeended with his cavalry down into the great Plains or Downs (for to they call them) lying net the fame hill; and fpent that whole day in braving the ftanding corps de guard of the enemiesbefore their camp, and playing upon them with skirmishes. And to for two dates together ten enfuing, they passed the time in divers tumultuous excursions between the one part and the other, without doing any great exploit worth the remembrance. On the fourth day, thy entredon both fides into the field, and embattsiled themselves. Sespio marshalled his men in this wife: Behind the Principes in a vanguard, he placed the formost ensigns of his Hastati, or Spears; and the Triarji he bestowed in the rereward, for to tecond them. The Italian bortemen he fet in the right point: the Numidian horte and Majaniff beranged in the left. Syphan and Afdrubal putther Numidians horie opposit to the Italians, and the Carthaginians to affront Majaniffa, In the main battell were planted the Celtiberians, to make head against the ensigns of the Romanlegious. Thus ordered and arranged, they encountred one nother, and joyned battell. At the fifth oniet, both wings at once. as well the Numicians as the Carthaginians, were put back and inced to give ground: for neither the Numidians (being for the most part country people and ruftic II) were able to receive the Roman horfemen ; nor the Carthaginians (raw and unitsined fouldiers) fufficient to hold out with Mafanifa; who (belides all other things) for his late and fresh victory, was to terrible, as there was no dealing with him. So the battell of the Chiberians, (naked and disfurnished of both her points) stood ftill; for neither saw they any likely bood to eleape and tave themselves by flight, confidering they knew not the coast of the country; nory hope to obtain pardon at Seipie his hand, against whom, (deserving so well of them and their nation) they were come into Africk with a power of waged mercenary fouldiers. So being the vironed on every fide with the enemies, they fell one upon another, and oblimatly dyed to the lat man, But whiles all the enemies were wholly employed about them, Syphax and Afdrabal gind themselves some time to get a way & escape. The victors (wearied rather with continual killington long fighting) were overtaken with the night. The morrow after, Seipio fent unto Leliumi Majaniffa, with all the Roman and Numidian horie, and the nimbleft and appointed footner, after Syphax and Afdrabal for to follow the chafe. Himfelf with the ftrength and body ditat army, jubdued all the Cities thereabout that were within the feignory of the Carth ginjans whom be partly forced by afsault, and partly took by furrender for tear. Great was the frightyemy be fure at Carthage: and they thought no other but that Scipio being now in the train of conga would make half to overrun the countrey; and when he h donce brought under his subjection (and that with speed) all the other States therebordring, then at once he would come to shall Carthage. Therefore they fell to repair and make up the breaches of their wals, and to fortife them with strong bulwarks: and every man did his best to bring out of the country all kind of provision, against the time they should abide a long and tedious siege. Few words or none st all of peace, but much talk of fending Embassadors to call home Annibal. The greatest part wet of mind & gave advice, to make out the armado which flood ready rigged, for to intercept the Romans victuals, and to surprise and assault the Romans fleet, riding before Prica retchielly without fear, and diffrusting nothing : for peradventure they might also force the navall camp, left with fmall guard for the defence thereof. And to this countell the most enclined : yet they though it good to lend Embassadors to Annibal. Por suppose that their navy should speed full well, and have the happielt inceels that they could wish, this only good would come thereof, that Vista thereby might be in some fort caled of the streight siege wherewith it was invested : astorthe defence of Caribage it felf, they neither had any other Generall befides Annibal, nor amy left but only his. Whereupon the next day after, the fbips were shot into the water, and fet where and withall the Embassadors took theirs way towards Italy. All things were hudled up and dotte A in halt; such was their fortune that pricked them forward, and gave them no further time. And look if any one man flacked his business never so little, hewas reputed to betray the whole state, and the safety of all.

Scipio now marching with an army, loden with the spoil and pillage of many Cities; seut the priloners away, and all the prizes befides, unto the old camp before Vica. And wholly fet upon the conquett of Carebage, he surprised Tunes (a City abandoned of her guard left for desence) situat from Carthage almost tweive miles. The place, both by mans hand was strongly fenced, and by nature furely feated; and as it might be easily feen from Carthage, lo it yeelded a goodly prospect to Carthage, and allo to the fea all about Carthage. From thence the Romans (as they were hard at work in fortifying themselves with a trench and rampier) discovered the enemies fleet, failing from Carthage towards Vtica. Laying therefore their work afide, they founded the remove, and prefently in all haft advanced their enfigns, to prevent that their own thips which flood close to the shore, bent wholly to the fiege, and nothing fitted and furnished for a tea-fight, might not be survised and boorded. For how possibly could ships heavily charged, carrying artillery, ordnance and engins of battery, be ever able to withfland an Armado nimbly appointed, rigged and trimmed for the purpose with all thip furniture meet for battell, and manned besides with armed souldies? How might our ships (I say) withstand the enemy, which either are converted to the we of merchant-ships of burden; or else so neer set to the wals, that they serve in Read of a platform and bank, or elfe of bridges to enter upon the City? Scipio therefore, after he was thither come, and had besto wed his wars ships with brafen beaks behinds in the rereward near to land, C which (as the manner is in fight at lea) might guard and defend the reft: opposed the Hulks Cand Caricks in a four-fold rank and course, in stead of a wall afront the enemie. And because that in the tumult of the right, those ranges might not be broken and disordered, he laid the masts and fail-yards over-croffe, reaching from thip to thip; and with strong cables he linked and fastned them all in one together, and laid boords and planks over them, that men might paffe every way from one thip to another. But under those very bridges, he left certain spaces between, from whence the light pinnaces and frigots might make out to charge and recharge the enemy, and remethemielves thither again in fafety, Having thus in half (according as the time would give him leave) fer these matters in order ; there were to the number almost of a thousand elect and choice fouldiers put aboord into those ships of burden, to make head in the forefront, & withstand the violence of the enemies , and furnished they were with offenfive weapons, but missive especially to Denote and fing from them and fuch flore thereof they had together, as might ferve for the affault were it never to long. Thus appointed and prepared, they waited the coming of the enemies. The Carthaginians, who if they had made good speed, might have surprised them unawares, and found all pell-mell and out of order whiles they were troubled, frighted, and to feek what to do upon that fudden occurence) fearing still as men out of heart and dismayed with so many foils by land, and thereupon diffrulting themselves even at the sea also; where (no doubt) they were the better and more puissant : and having trifled out all the live-long day, and failed but flowly ; about the fun-fet arrived in the haven, which the Affricans call Rufeinon. And the next morning by fun-rifing, they put forth into the open fes, and ranged their thips in order, as against a fee navall pattell; suppop fingthat the Romans would make out and receive them. When they had flood thus a long time, and perceived the enemies not to stir or once to set forward, then at last they charged upon the forefaid hulks and ships of burden. The service was nothing like a sea-fight, but resembling for all the world the ships that are to affaile the wals of some Town. For the bulks were a good deal tallerand flood a loft over the enemies. And the Carthaginians out of their war ships armed and brefled with brasen beaks let flie many a dart in vain, as lancing them from beneath faintly against the higher place; whereas the shot from above out of the Caricks, was levelled with more strength and by reason of their own posses light also with greater force. The light pinnaces for spial, and the other (mal barks, which made fallies from under the bridges aforetaid, framed of planks upon malts and fail-yards, at the first were encountred, overcharged and hidden only with the violence and greatness of those war-ships: but afterwards they were some trouble to the defendants of their own fide; for that being intermingled amongst the enemies ships, their own fellows were fored oftentimes to stay their hands, and neither shoot arrow, nor lance dart, for fear of milling their enemies, and lighting amongst their own part. At the last, the enemies from out of the Circhaginian ships, began to cast out certain loggets, with iron books at the end (which the souldienule to call Harpagonet) [Grapples] for to take hold upon the Roman ships. Which when the Romans were not able to cut in funder, no more then the very chains whereto they hand, and whereby they were flung, then ye might have feen (as any one of their enemies war-thips and gullies rowed back, and towed after it a Roman Carick hanging by the grapple end) the boords and ropes cut afunder, by which it was tied and faltned unto others, or elle another range and comfe of more ships together, to follow after the tail of the other. By this device especially were all the bridges torn and rent in peeces, and fearcely had the defendants any time and space to retire and passe into the second rank of ships behind. Thus there were about six Carficksof the Romans drawn away to Carthage, hanging at the poops of their gailies. Their gadness and rejoyeing hereat was much greater than the thing it felf came to, and the more Fff 2

acce ptable in that smidt fo many continual loffes and plenteous tears of theirs, one only joy as H final as it was, thining upon them beyond their expectation, eafed and lightned their hearts : confidering withall how neer by all likelyhood and appearance the Roman armado was to a milehief nacting within now meet by an interpretation of their own gallies for flowed for much, and Seipie come and finall destruction, had not the captains of their own gallies for flowed for much, and Seipie come

It fortuned about the same time, that Laissu and Majaniffa were come within 15 daies into Numidia; the Malælylians rendered Majanifa the ancient realm belonging to him by inheitung from his father, and received him with joy, as their King whom they had long time defired, syphas feeing his captains and garrifons diffeized and difflaced, kept himicite within the ancient limits of his own Kingdome, but was not like to be long at reft and quiet. For his wives father on the one fide, and his wife again on the other, fet him on, and pricked him forward continue I ally to make arms against the Romanssand so doted he on her in excessive love, that needs he make yeeld to her, there was to reniedy. Besides, to mighty he was in numbers of men and horse, that the pullance of a Kingdome flourishing to many years together, offering and presenting itest daily to the cie, had been enough to have made a Prince proud, that was not to barbarous and uncivil as he, and had some better rule and mattry of his affections then himself had. When he had affembled together as many as were able for tervice, he furnished them with horses, and with semour, as well oftenfive as defensive. The Cavalry he torted and divided into fmall troops and coincis, the infantry into the cohorts and iquadrons, according as he had learned long fince of the Roman centurions. And thus having raifed an army, equall for number to the former, but flundang altogether in manner, of new and untrained fouldiers, he put himself on his journey squal K the enemies. And after he had encamped neer unto them, at the beginning some few light house men advanced forward from the corps de guard, in cipiall, fo neer as they might with fafety, but being ict back from thence with arrows & javelins, they retired unto their companies. After this they began un both fides to make out one against another, and to maintain light skirmishes; and when of any part they had taken the foil, they would again for anger return in greater number which is the wonted manner to kindle a battell between horfemen : for whiles the winners hope Hill of better, and the loofer chairs for having the worle, the company ever encreasethon both fides. And thus now, after to me few had cuffled and blowed the coals, at length the wholesmie oteither part, came forth into the field eager of fight, and to ftrike a fet battell, So long auth horse ie. vic., the Matz tylians were to many, as there were hardly any dealing with them, Syber fent them out in such great troops . but after that the Roman footmen once had fuddainly ented between the cornets of their horlemen, which gave way as they came, and had gotten fore footing and made head, and to frighted the enemy charging fofree upon the four as he didthends Barbarians began to ride their horles more calily, and within a while gently to stand still and in the end, not only to give ground to the footmen, but also to retreat from the horsemen, who may were the more bold and hardy, being flanked with a guard of footmen.

And now by this time the standards of the legions advanced forward, and approached neer hand. But when the Massatyli were lo far from receiving and enduring their first charge, that they might not abide the very fight to much, as of their enfigns and armour, to mightily wrough with them either the remembrance of former overthrows already passed, or the prefent fear of immi- M nent danger. Where Syphax, whiles he rodebravely in the face of the enemies troops and fquadrons, if happily for very thane, or for the perill of his own person, he might stay his men from the ning away, had his horic under him fore wounded, and being cast off his tack to the earth, as ore. presses with the number, taken pritoner, and brought alive unto Lalius, for to representation Majanifa above all others a goodly thew and joyfull fight to behold. Now was Ciriba, thebas City of all the Kingdome of Syphen; and thither after the flight, betook themselves a mighty mistitude of people. The flaughter in this battell was less in proportion, then the victory, because the hotemenonly maintained the conflict. Not above five thousand were flain, and not halfe former tiken priloners. And when they had made an affault upon the camp whither the frighted muliude after the lofte of their King, had retired, Majaniffs came unto Laliss and faid, that for the present there could be nothing more pleasing and honourable unto him, then upon his victory to will ad fee his fathers Kingdome, which he had recovered and won again after fo long a time. Bursia advertity, to likewife in prosperity (qd, he) tract of time and delaies are never good. In each before Laline would permit him and his horsemen, together with conquered Syphan to gobelore unto the City Crebs, he would susprise them on a suddain, finding all out of frame and to see by reason of this to suddain and unexpected fear a and Leline with his sootmen might travell far and fortily, and come after with easie journies. Lalins yeelded hereunto. Whereupon, being good to tore unto Ciriba, he commanded the principall Citizens of Ciriba to be called forth unto a pule But all the whiles that they were ignorant of the Kings unhappy fall, and fo long as Majori uttered nothing of that which was happed, he might not prevail either with threats or face 0 words and perfusions until be prefented the King before them a bound prisoner. Then at foldvy an object and miferable spectacle, they lift up a pitifull ery, and made great lamentation.

And partly for fear they abandoned the defence of the wals, and partly by a general conjecto court the Conqueror, and to feek for grace and favour at his hands, they fet the gatesoren Then Majaniffs, after he had bestowed about the gates, and in convenient places of the will, certain firing guards, to keep that no manshould fir and make an eleape, he rode a gallop to the

A roiall pallace, for to be possessed of it. As he entred within the fore-gates thereof, even in the very entrance of the porch, Sophonisba the wife of Syphax, and daughter of Afdrubal the Carthaginian, met him on the way: and espying in the mids of the armed train Masaniffa full gorgeously dight, as well in his brave armor, as in other goodly array and ornaments, imagining him to be the King (as he was indeed) the fell down proftrat at his feet, and spake in this wile: " True it it is (quoth the) O Mafaniffa, that the Gods above, together with your own vertue aud fidelity se have given you full power and puissance, to doe with us according to your pleasure; but if it be "lawfull for me a poor prifoner and captive woman, to open my mouth and make an humble " fpeech unto my Lord, and in whole only bands lieth my life and death; if I may be so bold to stouch your knees, and that victorious right hand of yours; I would befeech and pray you for B c the honour of the roial majefty of a Prince, wherein we also our felves crewhile were interefis fed; in the love and name of the Numidian nation, which now is common to you and Syphax. "by the domesticall gods, protectors of this regali houte and princely palace, who vouchfate to " receive you into it at this prefent with better prefages and more fortunat tokens, then latel, they " fent Syphax out of it; to deign me a lowly impliant this favour, and grant me this petition, as to "determin your felt of me your captive what loever pleafeth you, & not to fuffer me to fail into the a proud hands and inhumane disposition of any Roman. If there were nothing else but this, that I "was sometime wife and Queen to Syphax, yet would I rather trie the courtesse and bumanity of "a Numidian, and one born in Africk as well as my felf then of a ftranger and alien. But "what hard measure a Carchaginian lady, and the daughter of Afdrubal, may fear at a Ro-C" mans hand, you fee and know full well. Wherefore once again I request and intreat your highneffe upon my knees, to regard my init and if there be no way elle to fave and keep me troin the will and appetite of the Rom. ns, to put me to death out of hand. For beauty the furpaffed and wasincomparable : for years lufty, and in the very best of her age. And therefore when as now she held him fall by the hand, and requeited his protection and nonourable word, only for this, that the might not be delivered and beirayed to a Roman, placing & certing her words to well, and couching them to cunningly, that they founded neerer to speeches for to win love, then prayers to crave pity. feethe fanfie and affection of this victorious Prince! he enclined prefently not only to mercy and compassion, but alto (as all the kind of these Numidians are ful of love, and have no stay of their wanton luft la conqueror othere wife though he were yeelded himself prifoner to the love of his captive: D and therhe had given her his right hand for assurance to perform her request, be went into the palace. This done he began to call bout with himfelf how he might make good his promife unto Sophoniba: but finding no meanes elle to compais and bring it about, he borrowed foolish, rash, and shameless countell of blind love. He made no more ado, but commanded to all hast to prepare that very day for the tolemoization and matriage with Sophonisha, because he would give neither Lalius, nor Scipio himfeif, any liberty at all to proceed against her as a prisoner, after the were once the wedded wife of Majanifa. The wedding was no former cone, but behold Lelius came, aguelt unfent for and nothing welcome: who to little differabled how much he milliked the thing, that he was once about to have plucked her forth of the bride-bed, and fent her away even with Syphar and other prisoners to Scipio. But overcome with the earnest prayers of Masamssa, who E belought and importuned him to refer the matter over to Scipio, for to arbitrat and decide unto whither of the two Kings Sophonisha should be awarded, for to mend their state, and better their fortime the fent away Siphan alone with the rest of the priloners, and by the help of Mafanisfa, wan and recovered the other Cities in Numidia, which were held by the garrilons of the King. When news came into the camp that they were bringing Syphax thither, all the multitude went forth asit were to behold a triumph. Himlelf went bound before all the reft, and a number of Numidian noblimen and glentlemen followed after. Then every man to let forth and amplifie this victorie, magnified what he could the greatness of King Siphan, and the glorious renown of the nation, in these termes: That he was the King, unto whote majelly the two most mighty and pullant states of the world, to wit, the Romans and the Carthaginians attributed to much, that Scipio the Generall of the one, for to leek his amity, left the province of Spain and the army there, and with two Caravals or Gallies ruled with five banks of oars, failed over into Affrick: and Afdrabal the great commander of the Carthaginians, not only repaired himself in perfon unto him into his Kingdome, but also gave him his daughter in marriage : so as at one time he had in his power the two grand-captains, of Cathaginians and Romans both. And like 4 both these nations killed sacrifices unto the immortall gods, and craved thereby their grace and tayour, so of both parties at one time was his friendship sought for, and defired. And as for his power and puissance, it was so great, that he expelled Mafanisa out of his own Realm, and drave him to this narrow point, that the best meanes he had to preserve his life, was either the running runnour of his death, in the lurking holes of the wild woods, wherein he was glad to live by rapine and stealth, after the guise of savage beatts. The King thus talked of in every mans month that flood about him, was brought at length into the Prætorium or General's pavilion, and there presented unto Scipio. And Scipio verily was much moved in mind to confider the former state and fortune of the man, compared now with his prefent condition : and to remember withail and call to mind the hospitall interteinment, the giving interchangeably of the right hand, and the covenant between them made both in publick and private. In their regards like wife Syphax took heart, and spake more trankly unto the conquerour. For when Scipio dem inded of him

"What he meant, and for what intent he not only renounced alliance with the Romans, but also H was ac meant, and to what more them : he made an wer again and confessed. That he had " indeed done smile, and plaid the fool. As for his taking armes against the people of Rome, that was not the beginning of his folly, but rather the very end of his fractick fottiflues. Then it et was, and never elfe but then, that he went befides himfelfe and was bereft of his wits; then he was, and never ene out then, that and clean forgat, as well private entity by a hospitall entertainment, 4 as all publick alliance by folemn covenants; when as he received into his house a Carthaginian lady for his wife: then his royall court and palace was let on fire & burned with thole imputal at lawy for this wife; then also (quoth he) and pettilent dame, that by all kind of pleafant al-"luring baits, and flattering enticements poffeffed my mind, drew away and alienated my heart; and "inting pairs, and nattering enticements plants the laid upon my body impious and ingody arroug mover reflect the, untill with her own hands the laid upon my body impious and ingody arroug I against my owne goest and loving friend. And yet as desperate and as world as my cate is, in all "my mileries and calamities, this one thing doth me good and enjoyeth my heart, that I feethe my interies and carefully of the lim of the Devill, gotten into the house and family of  him who is the molt deadly and mortall enemy that I have in all world. Neither furely will Me "fariffa demean himself more wifely, soberly and constantly then Syphan: nay, considering his "youthfull years, he wil be as apt to be mit-led by love, and more subject to the temptations of a 65 woman. Certainly in this action of espousing her, he bath shewed more folly a great deal, and s want of government. When he had uttered these words not only upon a spitefull hatred sgainft an enemy, but shio upon fome new pricks of jealoufie rifing in his heart, feeing her whom helps ed, in the policifion of his concurrent, Seipio was driven into no fmall dumps, and wift not well K what to make of it. And as he began to be suspicious of Majanifia for this marriage, so, to peak a truth, the circumflances thereof hammeted in his head, and made him conceive hardly of him; for fear that another day by the (uggestions of the same woman, he would play faile, and trepasse as well as Syphax. The marriage was to hudled up as it were in the mids of war and hostility, without the advice, without the privity, and without the expectation of Latine his company. Such half he made all on the head, & without advicement, the very same day that he fet eye fift upon the queen his priloner, he must needs espoule and marry her out of hand, and in the very house of his greatest enemy confummate and folemnife the complements of facred wed-lock. Moreover to aggravate these matters and make them seem more foul and shamefull, Scipio knew full well, the Mafanifia during the time that he remained in Spaina lufty young gentleman, it was never knows that he was enamoured upon the lovely beauty of any captive woman. As he toffed and revolved thefe things in his mind, Laliss and Majariffa chanced to come in place. And after he had welcomed them both alike, and shewed them a loving and gracious countenance, years honoured them with fingular praise and commendations openly in a frequent andience and cour, he within his lodging took Mafaniffa into a fecret place apart, and began to fpeak unto him in this manner: I suppose Majanifa, that you law in me some good part, for love whereof both at the fifth "you were induced to come into Spain and contract amity with me; and afterwards shoin A-" friek, you repotedy our felf and all your hopes in my fidelity and protection. But of all tholevers' tues, for which I have feemed worthy of your affectionat love, there is is not one wherein I may fo much glory and take jos and take comfort, as in temperance, continency, and the bridingol M "carnall delights, and flethly pleasures. This vertue Majaniffa, I with that you allo would have " joyned unto the reft that are in you for are and and excellent. For our ages (truft we truly) hand-"et a not fo much in danger of armed enemies, as of those earthly pleasures that compasses on "cvery side. And he that by his sobriety and governance hath been able to rule and tame the lane, "hath won himfelt more honour, and gottten a greater victory, then we have done by the con-" quest and subduing of Syphax. What valiant exploits and worthy acts you have atchived in mine " ablence I have willingly reported, and ftill remember. For the reft I had rather you would conse fider of them by your felf, then change colour and olufh at my rehearfall of them. Syphanithough "the good fortune, and by the forces of the people of Rome, is vanquified and taken priloner "And therefore himfelf, his wife, his tealm, his lands his towns, the inhabitants thereof, and N if finally all things elfe whatfoever that belongeth unto Syphax, are become a bootie to the prople of Rome. The King himlelf, and the Queen his wife, in cafe she had not been a citizen bonof "Carthage, in case we had not feen her Father to be at the grand Captain of our enemies, ought "by right to have been fent to Rome; that the Senat and people of Rome might passe their car-"fure, award and judgement of her, who is reported to have alienated a confederat King from the " and to have caused him rashly and inconsiderally to take armes against us. Strive then to rule sand mafter your lusts and affections, take heed you stain not many good vertues withore and "vice. Marte not the grace, deface not I say, the thank of many worthy defects, by one suit and trespais greater indeed, then the subject cause and occasion thereof. Majaniffa, whiles he best thete words, not only blushed as red as fire, but also began to water his plants. And when he had 0 promited for his part to be overruled and let down by the Generall, and requested him within io far forth as possibly the case would permit, to tender and regard his promise, wherein niby and inconsideratly he had entangled himself, (for given his faithfull word he had, that he would not deliver and octray her into the hands and power of any other) he departed out of the Pretorium or Generall his court, all difmaied and exceedingly troubled in spirit and betook himlesto his own pavillion. Where all folitary and alone by himfelf, after he had paffed over fome time.

A with fetching many deep fighs and fobs, fo as he might caffiy be overheard by them that flood about his tent, at the last he gave one grievous grone above the rest, and with that called for one of his trulty grooms, who had under his hand the keeping (as the maner was of Kings and Princes) of a speciall poyson, against all doubtfull chances that might happen. Which he commanded him to temper in a goblet of wine, and to carry it to Sophonisha, and withall to tell her thus much from him. "That Mafaniffa would have been most willing to perform his plighted troth and first pro-"mile, which an husband ought unto his wedded wife. But fince that the superiour powers, and "those that were mightier than himfelf; had bereft him of that pulffance and liberty, he was ready "andable yet to accomplish a tecond beneft, namely, that the should not come alive into the " hands of the Romans; and therefore he advised her, that in remembrance of her father a noble B warrior and Commander, of her native country, of two Kings to whom the had been married, " the would provide for her felf, and fave her own honour. This credence and message, together with the poylon, the fervant when he was come unto Sophonicha, delivered unto her. Whereat I accept (quoth she) this marraige present, and welcome be it to me, if this be the best token that "a busband could find to fend unto his wife. Yet thus much fignifie unto him from me again, that better content I would have been to die, if my marraige bed had not flood fo neer to my grave. "She spake not the word so stoutly, but she did the deed as resolutely; for the took the cup in hand, "and shewed no fign at all of fear, the roundly drank it off. When tidings hereof came unto Scipio, forfear lest the hot, humorous, and passionat young Prince, might do him telf some mischief, he presently sent for him. One while he gave him good & comfortable words; another while he gent-Clyrebuked him, in that he would feem to make amends for one folly with another, and to play a more cruell and tragicall part then there was need. The next day after, to the end that he night withdraw his mind away from this prefent fit of troublefome fancies, he mounted up into his Tribunali feat, and affembled an audience. There first, he openly styled Mafaniff : by the name of King, and honored him with fingular prailes and commendations . which done, he gave him a golden crown, a fair cup like wife of gold, a chair of estate and a scepter, both of ivory, a rich long robe imbrodered of divers colours, and a coat wrought with needle work, representing the Date tree. These honourable presents wanted no words to set them out. For as (quoth he) there is nothing among the Romans more stately and magnifical than triumph, so they that ride in clavata pretegtriumph have no ornaments more rich and sumptuous then this, which the people of Rome esteem- ta, sic palmata, Deth Mafaniffa only of all strangers and aliens to be worthy of. After this he gave Lalius alio his due toga pitta reand deletved praises, and bestowed upon hima coronet of gold. Other martial men likewise accord. Sponder. Then Scipio having fent C. Lelius with Syphan and other captives unto Rome, accompsnied also with the Embassadors of Masanissa, returned himself with his power again to Tunes. And there what fortifications and works he had begun afore, now he finished parfectly and brought to an end.

The Carthaginians who were filled with a kind of joy that was not only short, but also in maner E vain and foolish, grounded upon their late affault of the Armado, which (considering their prelent flate) was fortunat enough; after they heard that Syphan was taken priloner, in whom they had reposed more hope (well neer) then in Astrabal and their own army, were mightily affrighted and daunted; and would give no more ear to any that periwaded war, but ient as orators to fue for peace, thirty of their principall ancients: and they amongst them were (as one would say) their privy councell of state, and had the greatest power and authority to sway and overrule the whole body of the Senat. Who being entred into the Roman camp and the Generall his lodging and pavillion, fell down profits (after the manner and guife as I take it, of the countrey * from whence they were first descended) like those that worship & adore the gods. And to this their hum. Thenicia. ble reverence, their language was futable and correspondent; not excusing themselves and Where like as their fault, but transferring the beginning and occasion thereof, upon Annibal and his favorites a- in other counbout him and foothed him and bare him up in his wilfull pride and infolent ambition scraving par- tries of Afia, don for their City of Carebage, which twice already had been subverted and overthrown by the most fervile inconsiderat folly of her own citizens : yet once again you would gladly be saved and stand up- and very Idoright by the meanes and goodnesse of their enemies : for as much as they knew full well, that the latrous to their people of Rome fought not the utter extermination and destruction of those whom they had van- Princes. "quified by force of arms, but only the loveraignty and rule over them: promifing fealty and ho-"mage to them ready to ferve in all loyalty, and to perform what foever it should please them to im-" Pole and lay upon them. Scipio made them this answer again, and said, that as he came into Africk "upon hope to return home with conquelt and not with peace; so that hope of his by the prospe-G "rous and happy successe of his wers hitherto, was much bettered and augmented. Howbeit although he affured himfelf of the absolute victory, as if he had it fast enough in his hand, yet a good accord he would not refute: that all nations of the world might know, that the peo-"ple of Rome can both begin wars rightfully, and also end the same as justly. My will therefore (quoth he) and pleasure is, that the conditions of peace shall be these. Inprime, that the Car-"thaginians shall restore and diliver back all the pritoners that they have taken in the wars : with "all the renegates and fugitives that have fled to their fide from us. Item, that they remove their

"forces out of Italy and France, Item, that they forbear to meddle in Spain. Item that they abandon H " and quit all the Hands between Italy and Africk. Item, to yeeld up all their fhips of war laving "only twenty. Item, that they deliver unto the Romans, of wheat 500000 Modif, and of bar-"ley 300000. [Now what was the fum of money that he required or demanded of them, it is "not certainly agreed upon. In some writers I find 5000 talents: in others, five thousand pound weight only of filver and there be that have fet down, that they laid upon them a double pay of all the fouldiers | Upon these conditions (faith he) whether ye will like of peace or no, ye of shall have three daies reipit and liberty to confult and confider. If you will accept the of in thefe etermes, make a truce with me for the prefent, and fent your Embaffadors unto Kome to the Senat there. Thus the Carthaginians, when they had agreed together, and concluded to refule no articles and conditions of peace whatfoever, were difinified. But in truth they fought for nothing , elfe but delaies and tract of time until Annibal were failed over into Africk. So they addressed certain Embassadors unto Scipio to enter a truce: others they disparched to Rome to treat for a peace: who brought with them for a flew some few captives, renegates, and fugitives, to the end they might obtain their fute more easily. But Lalins with Syphan and other captives (the principall nobles and gentlement of the Numidians) was many daies before arrived at Rome, and had declared unto the LL of the Senat all things in order as touching their good speed and successe in Africk, to the great contentment and joy of all men for the prefent, and with exceeding hope for the time to come. Then the LL after consultation had, gave order that the King should be lent to Alba, there to lie in ward and lafe cultodie, and that Lelim (hould be kept ffill at Rome, untill the Carthaginian Embassadors came. A solemn procession for four daies was decreed. And P. Atlina K. the Pretor, after he had dismissed the Senar, called presently an attembly of the people, and together with C. Lalim went into the Roftra (or pulpit for publick orations,) Where the people hearing that the Carthaginian army was defeated, that the King of great name and renown wasovercome and taken priloner; that all Numidia was overrun from one end to the other with a noble and fingular conquest; they could no longer contein their joy in silence, but in shours and acclamations and other tokens (ulusli in the affembly of a multitude) expresse and fignifie their exceeding gladness and contentment of heart. Whereupon the Pretor immediately made proclimation, that the Church-wardens and fextons should fet open all the holy temples and chappels throughout the City, and give the people liberty and leave all the day long, devoutly to go about the gods, reverently to falute them, and heartily to render thankigiving for this atchieved victor, I The next day following, he admitted the Embassadors of Masaniffa into the Senat house, and gare them audience. Who first and formost rejoyced in the behalt of the Senat, for the prosperous " wars and happy faccesse of P. Scipio in Africk : than they gave thanks, that he not only had entituled Mafaniffa their lord and mafter by the bare name of King, but also invested him a King indeed by restoring him to his fathers Kingdome. Wherein it it pleaseth the LL. of the Senit, he "might reign, now that Syphax was removed and gone, without fear and trouble at all. Allo for "that he folemnly in the open affembly praifed him in most honourable terms, and adomed him "richly with right stately and precious gifts. For to deserve which favors and honours done anto "him, as he had indeavoured already, to would be henceforth not fail to do his belt. Then they made a petition that the Senat would confirm and ratifie by their act and decree, his royall flyle M and title of a King, with other benefits and favours received of Scipio, And this moreover particularly Masanifa would request (if he might be to bold, and that it stood with the pleasure of the Senat) that they would enlarge and fet at liverty all the Numidian captives that lay in prilon in Rome for this would be a thing whereby he should acquire much honour and reputation, and gain great love and favour amongst his people and countreymen at home. To these points the Embassador received this answer. Concerning the prosperous affairs of the wars in Africk, they congratulated likewife, and rejoyced reciprocally with the King. As for Scipio, they liked well, and confirmed his a & in giving Masams at the name of King and therein he had done well and jully and according to good reason. And whatioever he had passed elle to the honour of Majanija, the LL. approved and commended the same. Then they decreed certain presents that the Embissa- N dors should carry unto the King : to wit, two purple souldiers cassocks, each of them with a class of gold; and as many rich coats embrodered and bestudded with purple. Also two couriers bate bed and trapped, with their rich capacifons : two complete armours for horfes, with their cuitaces : likewife pavillions, with all their military furniture, in as full and ample manner as a Conful is allowed. There prefents (1 fay) had the Pretor direction to fend unto the King. As for the Embalsadors themselves, there was beltowed upon them no less then 5000 Alses a peece; and upon their followers in the train, each of them 1000 Aises. Alio a double fuit of apparell for either of the Embalsadors, and one fingle fute to every one throughout their train; as also to those Numidians, who being fet at large out of prison, were to be delivered again to the King. Over and befides, there was appointed for the Embassdors, lodging of free-cost; gardenage and walking O places of pleature; allowance for their rable, and all provision elle whattoever, at the Citiesex-

In that summer when these decrees passed at Rome, and those affairs were atchieved in A-frick, P. Quintilius Varus Pretor, and M. Cornelius Vice-conful, fought a set battell with Mago the Carthaginian, in the territory of the Insubrians, within the province of France, In the carnotted various of the Carthaginian, in the territory of the Insubrians, within the province of France, In the carnotted various of the Carthaginian in the territory of the Insubrians, within the province of France, In the Carthaginian in the territory of the Insubrians, within the province of France, In the Carthaginian in the territory of the Insubrians, within the province of France, In the Carthaginian in the territory of the Insubrians, within the province of France, In the Carthaginian in the territory of the Insubrians, within the province of France, In the Carthaginian in the territory of the Insubrians, within the province of France, In the Carthaginian in the territory of the Insubrians, within the province of France, Insubrians, Insubrians vanguard were placed the legions of the Pretor. Cornelius kept the legions in the rereward, and himself in person rode to the standards in the forefront. And before both wings, the Pretor and Vice-confull encouraged all that ever they could, the fouldiers for to advance the enfigns, and give a charge upon the enemy. But feeing he could not prevail nor do any good, then quoth Outstiling to Corneline : you fee how the fight flaketh and waxeth cooler, and the enemies that were timorous, are hardned and heartned by this refutance beyond their hope and expectation: yes, and it is to be feared, that they will turn to be hardy alfo, and make head againft us. We must needs raife up a storm of Cavalry, if we would disorder them, and put them out of array. And therefore either do you maintain fight either in the front, whiles I bring the men of arms into the battell, or elfe will I fight here in the vangaurd, whiles you fend out the horfemen of four legions upon the enemies. And when the Vice-confull was willing to accept of whether fervice the B Pretor would, then Quintilism the Pretor, with his fon aforenamed Marcus, a lufty young gallant. went to the horfemen, commanded them to mount on horfeback, and fuddainly all at once fent them against the enemy. The tumust and no lewbich the horiemen made, was answered& redoubledby the shout that the footmen set up. And verily the enemies battell had not been able to have kept their ground, but that Magoat the first stirring of the Cavalry, made out the Elephants forthwith into the battell, whom he had in readinesse for such purpose. At the uncouch braying, the frong fmell, and hideous fight of which beafts, the horles were affrighted : and fo the aid of hotle-fight proved vain. And as the Roman Cavalry interlaced among the Infantry was more frong and torcible, where they had the nie both of lance point aloof, and of iwords edge close athand : to when they were transported and carried far off with their panting and fearfull horses, Cthe Numidians horsemen had the more room to shoot their darts against them with better advantage. Befides this dilorder, the twelfth legion of footmen (whereof a great part was beaten down and flain, more for fhame then upon any ftrength and valour, kept their place ftill; but never hid been able to have held out any longer, but that the thirteenth legion drawn forth of the rereward into the vanguard, reenforced the battell that was in hazard and lay a bleeding : and Mago withall for his part, came in with the Frenchmen out of the rereward, and opposed them against this fresh legion; but when they were once discomfitted and put back (which required no great ado nor long fight) the Halfati or Iaveliniers of the eleventh legion gathered round together and charged upon the Elephants, which now also began to break the ranks of the footmen. But when they had lanced their javelins against them standing thick together in multitudes (and lightly D there was not one of them hit amifie but did his errand) they forced them all to turn back upon their own battell; fo four of them were fore wounded and fell down dead. Then the vanguard of the enemies began formewhat to give ground; and withall, the whole firength of the Roman footmen feeing the Elephants turn tail, came for ward at once for to encrease the disordered tumult; and put them in greater fear. But so long as Mago stood stoutly to it, and standing in the forefront of the enligns, the ranks and files as they went back foftly, and retired by little and little, still maintained fight as before in good order: but after that they faw him shot through the thigh and fallen, and therewith carried forth of the battell for dead, incontinently they were all defeated and pur to flight. There were flain of enemies about five thouland, and of military enligns eighteen won and carried away. The Romans likewise bought not this victory without losse of blood. For of the E Pretors army were loft two thoutand and three hundred, and the greater part of them by far were of the twelfth legion. Whereof two Tribunes Military or Colonels also loft their lives, M. Cofconim and M. Manim. Likewise of the thirteenth legion, which came last to the conflict, (n. Helvisia Colonell, in renning the fight was flain, and eighteen men of arms befides, most brave and excellent horsemen, with Centurions who were by the Elephants troden down, trampled under foot, and so perished. And no doubt the battell had continued longer, but that by occasion of the Generall his hurt, the victory was given away and yeelded. Mago in the dead time of the next night diflodged and departed; and stretching out his journey so far as possibly for his wound be might, he marched away untill be was come to the fea fide, unto the Ingauni in Ligaria: where the Embaffadors fent from Carthage (who a few daies before were arived in the French gulf) respaired unto him a commanding him with all speed possible to fail unto Africk, for as much as his brother Annibal likewise (unto whom also there were Embassadors gone with the like message and commission) would do the same. For the State of Carebage now was not in case, nor upon terms to defend and keep in obedience by force of armes France and Italy, but to fee to home. Mago not only moved with the commandment of the Senat, and the danger of his countrey, but feating also left the enemy following the train of his victory, would purfue and set upon him, if be made long flay; and doubting left the Ligurians likewife, feeing Italy abandoned by the Carthighians, would revolt and turn unto thole, under whole obedience they were like thortly to be reduced albeit he had no hope that his burt should have lesse shaking at sea by failing, then on land by travelling, or to find things there more handlome and ready for the cure, embarked his samy and departed, But before he was well gotten beyond the point and lands end of Sardinia, he died of his wound beforefaid. Certain fhips also of the Carthaginians, being scattered a-funder in the deep sea, were by the Roman Armado, that kept about the coast of Sardinia sur-Priled and boorded. Thefe were the Acts performed both by fea and land, on the fide of Italy Which lieth along the Alps. Cn. Servilius

Cn. Servilins the Conful having performed no worthy and memorable exploit, either in his H province Hetruria, or in France (tor thither he went also in the end) but only that he redeemed his father Cn. Servilius and his uncle C. Lastatius, from servitude and bondage, now fixteen years after they had been taken prifoners by the Boii before the village Tanetum, returned to Rome, with with his father going on the one fide, and his uncle on the other: a man famous rather for his privat deeds, then renowned for any publick and honourable act worthy of remembrance. And a bill was preferred unto the people, that it should not be imputed for a trespasse unto Cn. Servi. line, that whiles his own father (who had fitten upon the ivory chair of effate) was living (and that unknown to him) he had been both Tribune and Ædile also of the Commons against the laws in that behalf provided. This act being passed and granted, he returned again into his province. Unto Cn. Servilius the Contul who was in the Brutians countrey, there revolted Confensia, Uf. 1 fugum, Verga, Besidia, Hetriculum, Syphaum, Argentanum, Dampetia, and many other pecces of small accompt, upon occasion that they saw the Carthaginians war to wax cold and feeble. The same Conful fought a battell with Annibal in the teritory of Croton : the maner of which fight is darkly and obscurely reported. For Valerius Antias faith, there were flain five thousand of thee. nemies: a thing of such consequence, that either it was meer impudency to forge it, or great negligence to overflip it. But the turth is, from that time forward nothing was done by Annibal in Italy: for to him alfo there came from Carthage Embaffadors to cal him home into Africk, even about the same time that the others did unto Mago. And as it is reported of him, all the whilesthat he gave audience to the Embassadors, he gnashed and grinded his teeth, he kept a sighing and groning, yes, and hardly could forbear to fled tears. After they had delivered their Medigesc. K cording to their committion, Yea, mary, qd. he, now they go no more about the bu th withme es by covert means and under hand to fend for me home, but openly are feen in the action : who all ethis while in tuffering no tupplies either of men or money to be transported over unto me, longht to draw and hale me from hence. Well then, It is not the people of Rome to often by me defeat. "ted and put to flight, that hath by armes overcome Annibal, but it is the Senat of Carthage, with st their backbiting and malicious envy. Neither will P. Scipio rejoyce to much, and beare himself or proud upon this diffrace of my return, as Hanno will; who with the ruine and subversion of Conesthage, hathoverthrown our houle and family, when by no other means he could effect it. Now Assibal, whose mind fore-gave him that such a thing would fall out, had prepared shipping aforthand. And therefore after he had sent away the multitude of souldiers that were of small or no L fervice, into the towns of the Bacians countrey, under a colour and thew of garrilons for defence, which towns were but few, and the same rather held in by awe and fear, then abiding in obedience for love and loyalty, he took with him the whole strength and flour of his army, and crossed over into Africk. But before he went to tea, many of the Italian nation, who refuling to follow him into Africk, had taken for fanctuary the chappell of Iuno Lacinia, which never to that day had been violated and broken; not withit anding the liberty of the place, he cruelly maffacred in the very temple. Seldome by report had ever at, man been known to leave his native foil and country, and depart into exile with more heavy heart, then Annibal did when he went out of his enemies land. Oftentimes helooked back to the coatts of Italy, blaming both God and man, yearcuring himself and his own life, for that he sed not straight waies upon his fresh victory at Canna, his soul- M "diers embrued as they were with blood directly even to Rome. Scipio (quoth he) had the heart " to go to Carthage, who when he was Conful, had never feen in Italy the Carthaginian enemis: "and my felf, having flain at Thrafimenus and Canna 100000 armed men, have fitten still about " Casilinum, Cames, and Nola, wearing and decaying in strength every day more then other. In this "manner he blamed himtelf, and complained of his hard hap and curied fortune : and io he was pulled out of the possession of Italy that he hald so long.

News came to Rome about one and the tame time, that both Mago and Annibal were depated and convarion their journey: The joy of which twofold gratulation was the lefte in two regards, both for that their own expatins feemed to have either little courage or finall force to flay them behind, and impeach them for going, confidering they had exprette order from the Senat for to do. No as also because they at Rome were pensive and douotfull, what would be the issue and end of illifering the whole weight of the war to bear and rest upon the shoulders of one only Captainand army.

And much about this time came the Saguntine Embassadors, bringing with them certain Cartagoians prisoners, who were taken with sums of money upon them, and had failed into Spain for to levy and wage men for aid. The mony they laid down in the very port-hall or entire of the Senat-houle, amounting to 250 pound weight of gold, and 800 pound weight of filver. The men they received and clapt them up fast in prison, the silver and gold both, they delivered again to the Embassadors, with many thanks, over and besides they gave them rewards and ships to require again into Spain. Then the grave and ancient Senators began to reason and discourse in this wise "That men naturally have lesse feeled of good things then of bad and seel not follow their own weal as their woe. We remember say they, what fear, what fright and terrour we were put in, when Annibas paised over into Italy. Lord, what losses, what lamentable missore tunes happed thereupon! The enemies camp was discovered and seen from the wals of the City: what vowing, what praying was there then, both of all and some I How often in assemblies and councels were men feen to Itretch out their hands to heaven, & to utter these words & ery alouds

Notes will that day come? and will it never be, that we shall see Italy again elected enemies, obtain repote, and source more injoying happy peace? Now at length, even at 16 yeersend and not before, the gods have vouchiased us this blessing; and no man saith a word, nor maketh as amoing of the banklgiving to their divine majelly therefore. And surely, if men know not how to accept with joy and thanklgivinesse a benefit when it first cometh, they will be far short, and fail and much more to remember the laste when once it is past. Hereupon they cryed out and called bold with one voice from all parts of the Senat-house to P. Estima the Pretor, for to propose the matter to the court there assembled: and a decree was granted, that for five daies there should be sale processions and supplications in every church and chappell before the shrines of the gods and goddelless and greater beatts killed for factifice to the number of 120.

Now when Lalins and the Empafiadors of Mafaniffa had their dispatch and were dismiffed, B tidings were brought of the Carthaginian Embaffadours coming to the Senat to fue for peace, were leen at Partols, and that from thence they would travail by land unto Rome. Whereupon it was thought good unto the Senat, that Lalius should be fent for again and called back, that he might be prefent, and at the hearing of the tre ting of peace. Q. Fulvius Gillo a Lieutenant of Sensio had the conducting of the Carth ginian Embaffadors to Rome: who being forbidden to fet foot within the City, were lodged without the in great hall named Villa Publica, and had audience given them of the Senat, affembled in the temple of Bellows. Who made in manner the very fame iprechtbar they had before unto Scipio, cleering the whole State and their publick councell, and laving all the fault and blame upon Aunibal for m. king war : faying, that he had no warrant, commission, and commandment from the Senat to passe over the Alps, no, nor to much as over Iberus: and that of his own head he took arms; and warred not upon the Romans only, but also upon the Signifies. In confideration whereof, he that would effect all things aright, and weigh the truth indeed, wult needs judg, that for any thing done by the Sen t and people of Carthage, the ancient league made with the people of Rome, hath continued to that day found and entire. And therefore nothing else had they in commission to sue for and request, but that they might maintain and and remain it ill in that accord & league which was lait concluded and contracted with Lullaisus the Conful. Now when the Pretor, according to an ancient cultome of their forefathers, had given liberty to whomfoever that would for to put interrogatories unto the Embalsadors; and the elder fort, such as had been prefent at the making of the capitulations and covenants concerning the faid D peace, and demanded of them, fome one thing, and iome another; and the Embassadors answered again, that by occasion of their yong age (for they were all in manner but yong men) they remembred no fuch thing: the whole court from all parts thereof cryed out and faid, that this was but a fraudulent and traiterous Carthaginian trick, to chuse and send such for to sue for the old peace which they them elves could not not remember. And when the Embassadors were voided out of the Senat hon'e, and the opinions of the LL demanded, M. Living was of this mind, that (". Servilias the Conful, who was the neerer of the twain, should be sent for, that the treaty of peace might in his presence be consulted upon. For since that there could not lightly a weighter matter then it was, come afore them to be determined of, he thought it flood not with the honor and reputation of the people of Rome, that such a matter should be debated of without the personal presence of both, or at the least wife one of the Contuls. Qu. Metellus (who three years before had been Conful and Dictator) fpake to the cause in this manner. For as much as P. Scipio by defeating and putting to the fword whole armies, by walting and spoiling the territories of the enemies, had driven them to this exigent, that in humble fort they came to crave peace: and confidering that no man living was better able to judge with what mind and intent they fixed for this peacethen himself, who warred ever before the gates of Carehage; therefore no mans advice was to be heard, but only his, either to accept of the faid peace in question, or to reject it. M. Valerim Levinsa, who had been twice Conful, argued, that they were spies and not Embassadors, who now were come; and that it were a good deed to command them to avant and be packing out of the confines of Italy; & to lend with them certain men of purpose to guard them to their thips: Fyen& to write unto Scipio to go forward with his wars & not to flack one jot. Lalins & Fulvius added moreover and faid, that Scipio laid this especially for his ground, to hope there might be peace, in case Annibal and Mago were not called out of Italy: As for the Carthaginians, they would make femblant of any thing whatfoever, fo long as they expected those leaders and those nimies: but afterwards without remembrance of covenants, were they never to fresh and new, ye, and without respect of all the gods, they would (no doubt) maintain and continue the wars. In these regards they enclined the rather to Lavim, and approved his opinion. So the Embassadors were lent away without any peace obtained, or certain answer returned note them.

Mach about that time, Cn. Servilan the Conful, who made full reckoning that he should have the honor of bringing fraily into quietness, and pursuite after Annibal, as it he had been courted & Grivenout by him? and first failed over into Seily, and then into Africk. Which being commonly moiled and bruited abroad at Rome, at the first the LL. of the Senar thought good, that the Pretor should write unto the Confuls to this effect, that the Senar judged it meet and reason for him to tearn into Italy. But afterwards upon the Pretor his words, taying that the Conful would stronge by his letters, P. Sulpition was created of purpole Dickator, who by vecture of that more soveraligne rule and authority, called the Confull peremptorily home into Italy. And the reft that year, be together with M. Serviles, the Generall of the horfe, fpent in pregreffe and vi. fitting all the Cities of Italy which in time of war had shaken off their alleageance, and in taking due knowledge of all their causes and reasons severally.

During the time of the truce, there let forth allo out of Sardinia from Lentulus the Pretor, an bundred hulks laden with victuals, together with a convoy and guard of twenty gallies of war, and passed over into Africk safe, both from the danger of the enemy, and also from the perill oftempells by fea. But Cn. Odlavim as he was in his voyage from Sicily, with a fleet of two bundred bulks and thirty flrong gallies, had not the like good speed. For as he failed well near J within the kenning of Africk, first he was calmed; then the wind turning South, troubled and disordered his ships, rea, and scattered them over the sea one from another. Himself with his gallies of war wrought against the wind and the current, and with exceeding toil and labour of the oare-men, dout led the point of the cape of Apollo, & there in the bay rode at anchor, but the holks for the most part fell with the lland Egimurus (which shutterhupon the foreland, and lieth in the very mouth of that creek from the fea wherein Carthage flandeth) almost ten leagues from the City and some were driven by wind to a place called the Hot waters, over against the City. All this hapned within the light of Carthage. And therefore out of all parts of the City, was great running to the market place. The magiltrats affembled the Senat; the people at the entry and porch of the Councell house, called upon the Senators and cryed out, that they should not let slip to great a booty out of their eies and hands. Some alledged against them, the fidelity of treating of peace: others allo objected the faithfull promife of truce (the terme whereof was not yet expired.) But at life when both Senat and people were intermingled all in manner together, agreed it was by a general K consent, that Afdrubal with a fleet of fifty fail, should cut over to Agimurus; and so from thence rally and gather together the Roman ships dispersed along the coalts and the havens. And the hulks (abandoned of their marriners that were fled, first from the lland Egimarus, and afterwards from the Hotmaters aforefaid) were drawn and towed as it were at the tails of their own thips to Care hage. As yet the Embaffadours were not returned from Rome, neither knew they what the resolution of the Roman Senat was concerning war or peace, nor the day of the truce determined, Scipio taking the wrong and indignity to be more bainous, in that the hope of peace and the affurance of truce should be violat by them first, who sought both for the one and the other; prefently dispatched an embassage to Carthage M. Bebins, L. Servilius, and L. Fabins; who being by the concourse and running together of the people, neer to a shrewd turn and mischief; and L forefeeing their return like to be a dangerous, craved of the magistrats (who saved them from violence) to fend certain ships to wast them. So they were allowed two gallies called Triremes. which having conducted them until they were srived at the river Bagrada, where they were within fight of the Roman camp; returned back again to Carthage. Now the Carthaginian Armado lay in the rode before Vica. From thence there made out three gallies of four ranks of oars; whether it were upon some secret direction from Carthage so to do, or that Afdrabal the Admiral of the fleet, upon his own head adventured to foul an action (the state baving no hand therein, and therefore not to be blamed) and elpying the Roman Galley of five banks of oars past the point of the cape, fuddainly affailed her from the main fea. But neither could they invest and strike her with their beak heads, making so good way, and shifting so well by reason of her swiftness: neither M could the armed fouldiers from out of their lower vellels boord her being fo tall a thip overthem. And right valiantly the detended her felf as long as thot latted; which when it once failed, and that the had no other means to help her felf, but only the nearnels of the land and a number of fouldiers who from the camp were run to the shore, with the losse only of the ship all the passengers eleaned fafe to land.

Thus the truce being doubtless broken with one wickedness coming in the neck of another, Leline and Fulrum came in the very nick from Rome, together with the Carthaginian Embafisions; unto whom Scipio, having given his word, that though the Carthaginians had not only broken the faith and affurance given of the truce, but also the law of arms, in abusing and evill intreating the persons of the Embassadors, yet himself would do nothing to them unworthy either the order of N the people of Rome, or unfitting his own maner and cultome, difmiffed the Embaffadors, and made preparation for war.

When Annibal now approached the land of Africk, one of the mariners was commanded to climb up to the top of the mail to discover the coals, and to see what part they were directed to: and when he made answer and said, that the prow made head upon a place called, the Ruinat fepulchre; he milliked the omen and prefage of that place, and commanded the pilotto palleby, and leave it : and to he put his fleet within the bay of Leptin, and there fet his army a shore. And thele were the affairs of Africk for that year. The acts enfuing, reach to that year, wherein M. Serviline Geminus, who then was Generall of the horfe; and I. Claudine Nero were made Confuls. But in the end of that former year, when the Embafiadors of the confederat Cities of Greece O made complaints, that their territories were walted by the Kings garrifons . and when they feat their Embassadors into Macedonia, for to demand satisfaction and restitution, they could not be admitted unto the King, nor have audience: and moreover, they gave intelligence, that there were four thousand armed souldiers transported over into Spain, under the conduct of Soparer to aid the Carthaginians: and certain lummes of money likewife tent with them: the Senat gave order that Embassadours should be addressed unto the King; to give him to understand,

A that the LL of the Senat took all this to be done against the tenure and form of the league, So these were lent C. Terentius Varro, Cn. Manlins, and M. Aurelius, And three gallies of five course of oarsthey were allowed.

This was a year of special note, for a great scare-fire, whereby the publick cliff was burnt to after down to the ground: also for much abundance of rain and many flouds, and exceeding cheapness of victual. For besides that all Italy was open by reason of a general peace throughout. M. Valerius Falto, and M. Fabius Buteo, Ediles of the chair, divided the great flore of com that was sent out of Spain, among the people, street by street, and set the price at "four Asses the Mo- "Three pence diis. The same year Q. Fabius Maximus departed this life, a man of great years and exceeding English, old, if that be true which some writers report, that he was Augur 42 years. But certain it is that he was a man worthy of to great and honourable a furname, yea, and if it had begun first in him-B felf. He surpassed the dignities of his father, he was equal in honor to his grand-father: Rullus his grand-father, I must needs say, had more titles of victories, and of greater battails; but one enemy of his, Annibal, may countervail them all, as many as they were. Howbeit, this man was counted more wary and advised, than hardy and forward: and as a man may well doubt whether by natural disposition he loved to take leisure in all his actions, or that it was a policy of his agreeable to the wars properly then in hand; so verily nothing is more certain than this, that as the Poet Ennius faith :

This only man by wife delay, Restor'd our state fall'n to decay.

C His fon Q. Fabius Maximus was invested or installed Augur in his place, and for Bishop in his room (for two facerdotal dignities he had) Ser. Sulpitius Galba was chosen. The Roman plaies were exhibited one day, and the Plebeian Games thrice wholly renued by the Ædiles M. Sextus Sabinas, and Cn. Tromellius Flaccus. They both, were made Pretors; and with them C. Livius Salinator, and C. Aurelius Cotta. The folemn election of the Magistrats for that year, whether Cn. Servilius the Conful held, or (because of important business in Tuscany, about the examinations of the confipiracies there of certain great men, by commission from the Senate, which might keep himthere) P. Sulpitius the Dictator by him nominated; it is uncertain, by reason of the variety and difference of writers in that behalf,

In the beginning of the year next following, M. Servilius and T. Clandius, after they had affemble the Senar in the Capitol, moved concerning the Provinces. And for afmuch as both of them defined Affrick, they were willing that Affrick and Italy, thould be put to the choice of a Lottery, But by the especial travail of Q. Metellus, the Province of Affrick was neither granted nor denied to either of them. And the Confuls were commanded to deal with the Tribuns of the Commons, that if they thought fo good, they would prefer a bill unto the people, to know whom they would have to war in Africk. So all the tribes in general gave their voices with P. Scipia, Nevertheless, the Consuls (for so the Senat had decreed before) cast lors for the Province of Affrick. Thus Affrick befell unto T. Claudius, namely, that he should fail over thither with an amado of fifty ships; all gallies of five ranks of oars, and be joyned in equal commission with Scipio, And M. Servilius had Hetruria allotted unto him. In the same Province Cn. Servilius also wasto continue in government, in case it pleased the Senat to stay the Consul in the City. Of Pre-Eton, M. Sestius by lot had the rule of Gallia, with order, that P. Quintilius Varus should make overunto him the Province and two legions. And C. Livins took the charge of the Brutii with the two legions, which the year before were commanded by P. Sempronius the Vice-conful. Cn. Tremelini was appointed to govern Sicily, and to receive of P. Villus Tappulus the Pretor of the former year, that Province and two legions. And ordered it was, that Villus as Propretor, should kep in obedience and defend the coast of Sieily with twenty ships of war, and a thousand souldiers; and that from thence M. Pomponius should in the twenty ships behind embark one thouhad and five hundred fouldiers, and transport them over to Rome. Unto C. Aurelius Cotta was the civil jurisdiction of the City affigued. All the rest continued still in their government, and had their commissions newly signed, according as they had either provinces or armies under their hand, And with fixteen legions and no more, was the State of Rome that year maintained. Now to the end they might begin all enterprises in the name of the Gods and proceed therein with their grace and favour, order was given, that the Confuls before they went out to war, should fetforth those games and plaies, and sacrifice those greater beatts which T. Manlius Dictator, in the Yearthat M. Clanding Marcellus, and T. Quintius were Confuls, promifed by folemn vow, in case the Common-weal continued for five years following, in the same good estate as then it was. So thesimes were exhibited in the great Cirque or shew-place four daies together, and the sacrifices flainaccordingly, as they were vowed to the Gods.

"Buall this while, as mens hope, so their fear also encreased daily more and more, whiles they could not certainly resolve with themselves, whether they had more cause to rejoyce, that An-"nibal ster fixteen years had abandoned Italy, and left the possession thereoffree unto the peo-"ple of Rome; or to be afraid, for that he had passed over into Affrick with the safety of his army, For why? the place was only changed, and the danger all one. And furely Q. Fabius late "For why! too place was only changed, and the danger an one. Only this was ever decasted, no vain Prophet of to great a peril and hazard, was wont to foretel, and this was ever his fong. That Annibal would be a more dangerous enemy at home in his own country, than "behad been abroad in a forrain Land. And Scipie flowed find, that he had to deal neither this of Suphan "Suphan".

" Syphax (King of a rude, untaught, and barbarous country, who was wont to lead armies of stale H "grooms, and little better than water-bearers and camp-flaves to keep one place, and not re-"move) nor with Asarubal his father in law, a Captain of all others most light of foot, and rea-" dieft to run away nor yet with tumultuary armies taken up in haft and raifed fuddainly, confit-"ing of a rable of ruftical clowns and peafants armed by the halfs; but with Annibal, born in manor ner within the camp, yea, and in the royal pavillion of his father; a most valiant Captain, bred and brought up amongst armed men: who long ago was no sooner a child, but he was a fouldier. and before he came to the prime and flower of youth, became a General: who growing to be old in a continual course and train of victories, hath filled Spain and France from the one fide " to the other, and Italy from the Alpes to the narrow feas, with the marks and memorable monuments of worthy and noble exploits; and leadeth fill an army of as long standing and continu-" ance in warfare as himfelf, hardened and beaten to endure all those things which hardly one would believe, men could abide and juffer, embrued and bathed a thouland times in the blood of Romans, and carrying with him the spoils not of common fouldiers only, but also of most brave Generals themselves, Scipio should be sure to encounter and meet in battail those who with their own hands had flain Pretors, and killed Confuls of Rome; all bedight and goodly to be feen in mural and vallare coronets, for their good service in scaling of walls, and mounting over rampiers; those I say who at their pleasure have ranged through the won camps and forced Cities of the Romans. Neither at this day have the Magittrats of the people of Rome fo many bundels of rods, with axes born before them, as Annibal hath taken from the Roman Generals whom he hath flain. & can if he lift shew and carry before him, Casting and tossing these doubts and sears in their mind, K they themselves encreased their own care, and doubled their dread in this point also, that whereas they were wont for certain years to make war in fight of home, in diverse and fundry places of Italy, with a lingring kind of hope, without regarding any iffue thereof like prefently to enfusion Scipio and Annibal, Captains matched together (as one would fay to make a final end & tryal of al, had fet all mens minds awork to expect the event now or never. And even they also who had reposed exceeding confidence, and grounded no small hope of victory in Seipio, the more their spirits were amused upon it, and desirous to see a speedy effect, the greater was their care and doubt of the sequel. The Carthaginians for all the world were likewise affected and disquieted in mind, One whiles, beholding Annibal, and confidering his noble and worthy acts, they repented that they fued for peace. Another while again, when they looked back and remembred, how twice I they had been defeated in battail, Syphan flain, themselves driven out of Spain, chased and hunted out of Italy, and all this by the valor and policy of one man Scipio; they trembled for fear of him, as if he were the fatal Captain born for their ruin and utter destruction.

Now by this time was Annibal come as far as Adrumetum; from whence, after he had beflowed some sew dayes in refreshing his sea-sick souldiers, he was roused with searful poststhat brought news, how all about Carthage was full of enemies and hostility: whereupon he made long journies till he came to Zama. This Zama is a Town distant from Carthage five dayes journey, From thence he sent out espials, who being taken by the Roman warders, were brought before Scipio, and he caused them to be delivered unto the Tribuns or Marshals, with commandment, that they should be led throughout the camp: and suffered without all fear, to see whatfor M ever they defired. And when he had asked of them whether they had perused and confidered every thing to their content, and enough to serve their turn; he sent them back again to Annibal, with a fafeconduct to accompany them. Annibal took no pleasure at all in hearing of any thing that they reported: for (among other particulars) they brought news that Masanifa chanced that very day to come thither with fixthousand foot and four thousand horse. But most of all, he was troubled and cast down with the resolut confidence and assurance of the enemy; which no doubt (he thought) arole not of nothing. And therefore albeit himself was the only cause of that war, and by his arrival had disturbed the truce concluded, and the hope of peaceable covenants : yet supposing, that a more indifferent accord might be obtained, in case he sued therefore while he was entire and unfoiled, rather than after he were vanquished and overcome; he addref- N ied a meffenger or purfivant unto Scipio, requesting that he might confer and commune with him. Whether hedid this of his own accord, or by direction from the publick Councel of the State, I have no reason to set down or avouch for certain, either the one or the other. Valerin Antias writteth, That he was by Scipio defeated in the first battel, wherein were slain in field 1 2000 armed men, and 1700 taken prisoners, whereupon himself in person came as Embassador, with other ten Orators into the camp unto Scipio. But how foever it was, Scipio refused not to emparle; and fo, both Generals of purpose advanced forward and approached with their camps, to theen they might be neerer one to the other when they should meet in conserence, Scipio made choice of a plot of ground not far from the City Nadagura: which as it was handsome and meet in other respects, so especially in this, that it had a watering place within an arrow shot. Annihal O took an hill four miles from thence, fure enough and commodious otherwise, but only that they were far from water. In the mid way between they chose a plain, open on every side, where they view of Scipio might discover and see all about them, that no ambush there were laid: and after they had caused their armed fouldiers to retire a like distance from either party, then came together with one truch-man or interpreter apeece, not only the greatest and bravest Captains of their time, but alfo equal to the mightiest Kings or Emperors of realm or nation that ever had been aforethem

Neither began our predecessors first to make war for Sicily, nor we fince for Spain. But as then the danger wherein our allies the "Mamertins flood; fo now the ruin and destruction of Saguntum, moved us to take arms most " justly, even for pity and compassion. That you began the quarrel and provoked us first, your self "confels, and the Gods do witness who, as in the former war, they granted and gave the iffue, ace cording to right equity, and justice: fo they do in this, and so they ever will. For mine one part, "I remember well, and think upon the frailty of mankind, and the ticklishnes of this world: I con-"fider also the power of fortune and what she is able to do: I know likewise that all our actions " what soever, are subject to a thousand hazards and inconveniences. Wherefore, it besides those points and capitucolations, under which the peace at that time was like to be concluded (and what those were you "know as well as I can tell you) you bring with you any recompence and amends for our thips, "which being charged with victual and munition, you took perforce from us in time of the cella-"tion of armsias allo for the outrage and violence committed upon the persons of our Embalia "dors; there is some reason that I should consider the reupon and be advised by my Councel. But O er if you think hardly thereof also, as being thereby too fore presedilook for battel, you that could "not like of repose: provide for war, fince you would abide no peace. Thus without any conclusion of accord they left parling; & being returned to their own companies, they related unto them, how their conference came to nothing, and all their words were but wind, and did no good: and thereforethe matter was to be determined and tried by dint of fword, and they to trust to that fortune which the Gods had appointed for them. So foon as they were come into their camps, both cofthem made proclamation, that the fouldiers thould buckle themselves, make ready their at-"fped well, they were to be victours not for one day, but for ever and aye. For before the mor-From next at night, they should know, whether Rome or Carthage should give laws unto all nati-"ons of the earth. And as neither Affrick not light, but the whole world shall be the prize and "guerdon of the conquerors; to they, whose hap were to lose the field, must make account of danger and damage, equal to the winnings and gain of the other. For as the Romans had no way to elcape, nor place of fafe retreat, being in a strange and unknown land; to Carthage (having laid all upon this one calt) if they now milled, made accompt that all was gone, and prefent defirm tion at hand. So the next day there advanced forward to this doubtful and dangerous tryal, two most R noble and renowned Captains, of two, right mighty and puillant feates: two most valiant and hardy amies came forth into the field refolute that day either to win the fours or lofe the faddle; to gain more glory to their former honour, or else to lose all that ever they had gotten. Thus therefore her ween hope and fear their minds were perplexed and diffracted; and beholding one while their own torces, and another while their enemies power ; measuring rather by their eye, than weighing by reason their strength they had at once presented unto them, objects of joy and content as well as of forrow and heaviness. And look what the fouldiers themselves could not think upon, the ethings their leaders put them in mind of; juggetting unto them by way of admonition and exhortation, whattoever was thought expedient and good. Annibal rehearled his nobleachs archieved in Italy for the space of fixteen years, he reckoned up how many Roman Captime he had flain, how many armies he had defeated and put to the fivord: and ever as he met with any fouldiers of note and markfor some worthy and memorable battail, he put them in remembr n. e of their honourable service and good deserts : Scipia related the conquest of Spain, recounted the fresh fougt ten fields in Affrick, alledged the very confession of the enemies; who neither for jear could do other but feek for peace, nor yet upon an inbred fallhood imprinted in their hearts, continue long in the same. Besides, he interred the communication and speech of Annibal had with him in secret and apart from others: which according as he was disposed to devise, he might turn at his pleasure to he his purpose. And for simuch as the Gods had she wed unto them as they went out into the field the fame figns and tokens of birds, by direction whereof their fathers before them fought in times past before the llands Agatet; he offed and prelaged that the war was come to an end, all dangers and troubles overblown, that the spoil and pillage of Carthage was at their devotion, and they at the point to return home unto their countrey, their parents, wives, children and domettical Gods. And this he spake with such a losty getture of his body, with so plestant and lovely a countenance withal, that a man who had teen him, would have thought verity he had att hieved the victory already. Then he embattailed fitth his Haftati (or spears) in the vanguard behind them the Principes; and the rereward he guarded and fortified with the Triarit, Neither marshalled he whole cohorts thrust thick and close together, in the head of the battail before their entigns, but divided them into Squadrons, dittant a prety way alunder one from the other: to the end there might be room and space to receive the Elephants of the enemies, that they should not break the arraies and ranks. As for Letius (whom he had emploied before as Lieuenant bur that year in quality of a Questor by a special order and direction from the Senat, and not by choice of lot)him with the Italian Cavalry he put in the left point; and Masinifa with the Numidian horsemen in the right. The open waies and void spaces between the Squadrons aforefaid, placed in the front before the enfigns, he filled with the Velites or Iavelotiers, who at that time were light armed fouldiers; with this commandment, that prefently upon the violent charge given by the Elephants, they should either retire behind the files, or elserun to a side, both on the right hand and the left, and joyn close to the formost ranks, and make the Elephants way to run upon their shor from the one side and the other. Annihal to strike a terrour into the enemies, hill arranged the Elephants in the front, who were in number four-fcore, and more than ever he had before in any barrail. Then he embarrailed the aid-fouldiers of the Ligurians and Frenchmer's with the Baleare flingers and the Mores interminaled among them. In the main battail he placed the Carthaginians and Affricans, with the legion of the Macedonians: behind whom (leaving a lule space between) he fet in array the battailon of the Italian fouldiers in the rereward for sucsour: and those were most part of them Brutis; who followed him more perforce and by confraint, than of any good will, when he departed out of Italy. The Cavalry also he displaied and irediound like wings about the two points: whereof the Carthaginians kept the right, and the Numidians the left. Sundry and divers were the exhortations throughout the army, amongst so manymen; whose language was dissonant, whose complexions far unlike, whose manners and conditions were divers, who differed in laws and cultoms whose armours were not alone, whose raiment and appared not furable, and finally, whose quarred and cause of war was not one and the same. The auxiliaries and aid-fouldiers sed shemselves with the hope of ready and present payment and wages for the time past, yea and with a duple and triple augmentation thereof to boot, out of the spoil and pillage. The Frenchmen upon a special hatred of their own, and the same eeply feeled, were foon kindled and enflamed against the Romans. The Ligurians who were brought out of the rough and cragey mountains and whole teeth watered at the fruitful and plenteon fields of that, were quickly by him moved to hope after victory. The Mores and Numidians he fighted with the ground and yrannical rule of Malaniffs, under which they should ever after live. Before the Carthaginians he presented the walls of their native City, their houses and house H Gods, the sepulchres and tombs of their ancellors, their children and parents, yea, and their timorous and fearful wives: he fet before their eyes either final destruction of all those things and flavery of their perions, or elie the empire and loveraign dominions of the whole world: andno

mean between these extremities either of sear or hope. When as the General was most butte thus in exhorting the Carthaginians and the Captains of the firangers, amongst the souldiers of their own Nations, and that for the most part by means of interpreters, intermingled for the same purpose with them; the I rumpets sounded, and the horns bew from the Roman holt. And such a wonderful shout arose from thence, that the Elephants turned upon the Mores and Numidians of their own tide, especially in the left point of the battail. Whom M. faniff a feeing once affrighted, he toon redoubled their fear; and riding upon t them with a hot charge, laid naked the battailion of tootmen on that fide, and clean without the aid of their Cavalry. Howbeit, some sew of the Elephants driven without sear full upon the enemy, made foul work among the ranks of the light armed Velites, and overthrew a number of them, not without many a wound and much hurt done to themselves. For the Ventes lesping again nimoly to the Squadrons, after they had made way to the beafts, tearing they should be troden underfoot by them, let flie their javelins at them from both fides, lying open as they did like buts to the shot on either hand. Neither lost they any time who were in the vanguard besore the Ensigns, nor gave over flinging their darts at them, until they were driven by a volley of thot lighting upon them from all parts, clean out of the Roman battail: and thenthey turned head also upon the very Horsemen of the Carthaginians in their own right point, and for K ced them to run away. Lalius for his part, leeing the enemies in disarray and fore troubed, charged upon them with his Horses, and encreased their fright. So as now the Carthaginian battailion was disturnished and stript of their Horsemen on both wings. By which time the Cavalry joyned battail, whose hope was now quailed and thrength abated, and therefore not able to make their parts good. Befides another thing there was, a small matter to speak of, but jet in fighting-time and in the very conflict, of great confequence and importance, The shout and cry from the Romans was ever alike and conforant in all parts, and therefore the greater and more terrible; but the enemies made diffonant noiles, according as they differed in language, being as they were, of many and jurdry Nations. The manner of the Romans fight was like and itedialt, by reason of the peise of their own bodies, and the weight of their armour. Learning L fill a d preffing hard upon theenemies: but they on the other fide, shewed more swiftnessind agility, than force and violence. And therefore at the very first shock the Romans in ontinently enforced their battaillon to retire and lose their ground. Afterward they fell to shouldering and knocking them with the pikes and boffes of their bucklers: which done, they fet foot for ward a good round pa: e, and gained some ground of them, marching on fill, and no man seemed to make head against them; whiles they that were hindmost in the files, perceiving one that battaillon to go on and win ground, still put forward the formost, which was the very thing that availed much, and was of great efficacy to put the enemies to flight. But the second bittaillon which confilled of Africans, and Carthaginians, were so far from seconding and upholding the auxiliary strangers thus disma ching; that contrary-wife, for fear lest the Roman by M killing them in the forefront (who flood to it luftily and made refiftance) should come as far as to them behind, they likewise retired and gave backward. Whereupon the aid-souldiers also suddainly the wed their hin-parts and turning their face upon their own fellows: fome of them relired for reinge into the fer and battaillon; others fell to killing of them that would not receive them within their ranks : and good reason they had, for as a while before they had no help at all of them, so then they were altogether excluded and shut out from them. So as now the Carthagini ans had to deal at once in two skizmishes shuffled together whiles they were compelled to dole and come to handlight, both with their enemies, and also with their own fellows. Yet not with Randing for all they were either to affrighted or so angry with them receive them they would not in no hand into their battaillon: but keeping their ranks and files clole together they call them to N fide to the wings and the void ground without the place of conflict, and all because they would not intermingle any fouldiers thus scared upon running away and many wounds, with that battaillon which flood fill sure enough, and as yet unfoiled. But the place where a litt chefore the auxiliaries were ranged, was so full of slain bodies, and weapons and armour thrumbied one upon another that the Romans had we'neer more ado to pais that way now, than they should have had through the preis of the enemies standing thick together. And therefore the formult of the Hastati following after the enemies, every one as well as he could over the heaps of bodies and armour on the earth, and through the flippery filth of the bloud, made a pe'mell of their ownerfigns, and confusion of their ranks. Whereupon the ensigns also of the Principes beganto wave, when they saw the battail afore them so wandering and inconstant. Which Scipio when he once perceived, commanded in all hast to found the retreat unto the Hastati: and when he had withd awn as many of them as were wounded and hurt, and bestowed them intherere. ward he brought the Principes and the Triariito the out-wings and flanks thereof; to the end, that the middle battaillon of the Hastati should be more sure and strong. By this means there began a new skirmish. For now were they come to their very enemies indeed; such as for ar mour and weapons of all forts, for practife and experience of warfare; for fame and renown of The thirtieth Book of T.Livius.

worthy exploits, and last of all for greatness either of hope or peril, were equal and comparable unto them. But both in number and also in courage, the Romans were superiour, for that already they had discomfited the Cavalry, put to flight the Elephants, beaten back the vanguard, and were ready now to encounter with the main battail Now Lelin and Mafaniffa having had the horsemen in chase a good way, whom they had compelled to flie as is beforetaid, returned in good time, and charged hotly upon the tail of the enemies battail. And this affault of theirs it was that fruck the froke, this did the deed and amazed the enemies. Many of them were environed and killed in the place, many fled and were scattered over the plains and open fields, and by the horse- sed by Scipio. men who had taken up all the avenues, and ranged all about, were caught up here and there, and ioflain, Of Carthaginians and their Allies, were killed that day above twenty thousand, and B welners smany taken prisoners: of military enters there were gotten a hundred thirty three, and B eleven Elephants besides, alive. Of the conquests there died about two thousand. Annibal with somesew horsemen made shift to escape out of the tumult and heat of the execution, and fled to Adramentum, having affaied and tried all means possible, both in the very conflict, and also before the battail, ere he departed and left the fight. And this praise and commendation he won tum, now Maeven by the confession of Scepio himself, and all others that were expert warriors, that with singu- chametea, aclarskill that day he ordered the battel, and marshalled the field. For the Elephants he had placed cording to in the forefront, whose adventurous force and intollerable violence in giving the oniet, might Mercator. empeach the Romans from following their colours, and keeping their arraies; the only thing wherein they reposed their greatest hope and confidence. Then, before the main battail of the Canhaginians, he fet the auxiliaries and aid-fouldiers, of purpose, that being a consuled rable and medley of all forts of nations, fuch as were not bound by alleageance, but tied only by gain and wages, should have no liberty to retire themselves, and escapeby running away: who also, as the forlornhope, bearing the furious heat of the first brunt, might weary the enemies with charging sponthem, and if they did no other good, yet with receiving many a wound in their bodies dull and turn the edge of the enemies sword. After this, in the buttel, where all his hope was, he placed the Carthaginian and African fouldiers; that being otherwise in all things else equal to the enemies, they might in this regard have the ods, in that they were to fight with them wearied and wounded, when they themselves were in heart and lusty. As for the Italians, who also were divided from the reft by a good space between he removed far off into the rereward, as doubtful whether they were friends or enemies. Annibal having done this doughty deed and work, as it were D for the last proof of his vertue and valour, fled to Adrumetum, and was from thence fent for to Caribage: whither he returned in the 36 year, after that he first departed thence a very child. Where in the Councel house he confessed and said, "That overcome he was not only in a battel "once but also in the main war for ever hereaster: protesting in plain terms, that now there was "no other way but one to fave themselves, and that was peace, it they could obtain it.

Scipio immediatly after this battail, having forced by affault and rifled the enemies camp, renumed with a huge booty to the Sea and his ships, being advertised afore by a messenger that P. Lentulus was arrived at Ucica with five thips of war, and a hundred Hulks laden with provition of all kinds of victual. And supposing it good policy now that Carthage was troubled and throughly affrighted, to come upon them with all terrour on every fide: so soon as he had difpatched Laline away to Rome, with tidings of this victory, he commanded Cn. Ottavius to lead thelegions by Land against Carthage, Himself in proper person, after he had joined this new fleet of Limiting, pure the old Armado of his own, weighed anchor and departed from Weica, and failed directly to the Haven of Carthage. He was not far from thence, when there met him a ship of the Carthaginians, garnished with infules, ribbands, and white flags of peace, and befet with branches of Olive; wherein were ten Orators embarked, the best men of the City, sent by the advice and motion of Annibal to crave peace. Who as they approached the hin-deck and poop of the Admiral ship, put forth the vails and tokens of suppliants, praying and befeeching the protection and mercy of Scipio. Who had no other answer made them, but that they should repair pto Tunes, whither he intended to semove. Then himself after he had well viewed the situation of Carthage, not so much to have the full knowledge thereof at this present, as to terrifie the enemies, returned to Utica, whither he had called back Ottavius also. As he marched forward from thence toward Tunes, he had intelligence given him, that Vermina the son of Syphax was coming to aid the Carthaginians with a power of more Horsemen than Footmen: whereupon, part of the simy together with the whole Cavalry was tent: whereof the light horse and van-curriers changing the vanguard in their march, after a light skirmish discomfitted the Numidians : and having flopped all passages every way with the Horsemen, so as they could not get out and flie, there were upon a fifreen thousand men of them slain, 1200 taken prisoners, 1500 Numidian Horiesallo were gotten from them alive, and 72 military enfigns. The young Prince himself in the 6 mids of the tymult and conflict, with some few escaped, Then encamped Scipio neer Tunes, in the same place where he lay before: and thither repaired unto him thirty Embassadors from Carthage. And they verily, as they were in harder case and greater distress, made much more pitiful furreating than before: but in their audience found less favour and mercy by agreat deal for their late treachery and falshood so fresh in remembrance. Now albeit when they were set in counsel, all of them had just cause to be angry, and thereupon were provoked to destroy & rase Carthage: yet upon better advisement and consideration, how great and difficult and enterprise, and what a long peece of service it was to befiege a City so strong and so well fortified: and for that Soppile himself was troubled in mind with the expectation of a fucceflour, who should come to win the credit and honor of finishing the war, which indeed was gotten by the travail and hazard of ano. ther, all their hearts were turned and enclined to peace. The morrow after the Orators were called again before them; and after they had been well checked, rebuked, and plainly told of their treachery and warned withal that after io many loffes and overthrows which they had received. they should now learn to be wife, and at length believe that there were Gods in Heaven, and that an oath was to be regarded, these conditions of peace were tendered and off red untothem. Imprimis, it was capitulated, That they might live free, according to the form of their own Laws: Hem, What Cities, what territories (and within what bounds and limits) they held and were posfeffed of before the war began, the same they might keep fill. Item, That Scipic and the Romans I from that day forward should not wast and spot the countrey. Item, That the Carthaginians should deliver all renegate traitors, all fugitive persons, all captives and prisoners, yea, and yeard unto them all ships of war with brasen heads, above ten triremes or gallies of three ranks of oars. Item, That they should put into their hands all those Elephants which they had already tamed and marned and should break and tame no more of them. Item, They should make war neither in Affrick, nor without Affrick, but by order and warrant from the people of Rome. That they should make restitution and amends to Masanifa for all harms, and enter into league with him. Item, That they should find corn and money for the maintenance of the aid-fouldiers, until their Embassadors were returned from Rome : yea, and tender payment of ten thousand talents of filver by even portions in fifty years. Item, That they should put in a hundred hostages at the K pleasure of Scipto and none of them to be either under sourceen years of age. or above thiny, Last of all, they would grant a truce upon this condition, That the ships which were taken during the time of the former ceffation of arms, should be restored back again, with all things eife that were therein: otherwie no truce for the present, nor hope of peace hereaster. These arricles and conditions the Embassadors were willed to return home withal. Which after they had related in the general essembly of the people, Gifgo mounted up the pulpit to dissivade peace, and had audience given him with great applante of the multitude; who as they were heartless and unmeet for war, fo they were as peevith and unruly, and could not long continue in repose. Herear, Annibal took great in lignation, and was highly displeased, that in such a time, those things should either be delivered or heard, and he made no more ado, but stepped to Gifeo, laid hand upon him, and pul. L led him down from the pue out of which he spake: whereat the people were moved and grunbled in great discontent to ice so strange a fight and unusual, in a free City. Then Annibal, as he was a meet martial man and could not skill of civil affairs, nor well away with these citizens liberty. "I went, quoth he, from you when I was but nine years old, and now after 36 years I am" Come again. All military skill and knowledge, which fortune fometime in my privatematters, "and otherwhiles in publick affairs, hath taught me from my childhood, me thinks I havekan-" ed fuffi iently: mary, for the rights and priviledges for the laws customes and fashions of the "City and the common Hall I must be informed and instructed by you. Thus having pleaded ignorance for his excuse, he diff our ed at large of peace, arguing how reasonable and equal, yea and how needlery it was. The greatest point of difficulty in all the capitulations ministred unto them M was this, That tou hing the things abovefaid which were taken during the abstinence of arms, there was nothing now forth-coming and to be seen but the bare vessels; and no easy matter was it to feek up the reft. Now when as they that gainfaid the peace were convinced and purdown by reason, agreed it was, that the ships should be redelivered, and the men likewise be sought out and found: as for all the refl that was wanting, there should an estimate be made according to the value, at the diferetion of Scipio, and so the Carthaginians to make all good in money. Writers there he that have delivered. how Annibal presently from the field sped him to Sea and there finding a ship ready prepared for him, streight-wayes embarked and went directly to King Antiochus: Alfo, when Scipio demorded above all other things that Annibal should be yeelded into his hands, answer was made, that Annikal was not in Affrick. After that the Embella-N dors were returned to Scipio the Questors or Treasurers were commanded to draw an extractaccording to their books upon record, of all such things as were in the ships, and appendined to the City: and look what belonged to private persons, the owners thereof were willed to declare and tellify. In confideration and recompense whereof, there was a sum of money set down, amounting to 25000 pound weight of filter, and the fame to be paid prefently out of hand by the Carthaginians. Thus a truce was granted to them for three moneths : with this claufe annexed over and besides. That during the faid term they should fend their Embassadors to no other place but only to Rome: and what Embaffidors foever came to Carthage, they should not let them depart before they had certified the Roman General both who they were and what their melige and errand was. Then with the Carthaginian Embaffadors were fent to Rome, L. Veinrig Philo O M. Morting Rallis and L. Scipio, brother to the General, At that time there came fich flore of grain and victuals out of Sieils and Sa-dinia, and thereby corn was fo cheap, that the Merchant was fain to 'enve corn behind him to fatisfie the fhirmen and marrings for the portage ardest-

New there had been much trouble and fear at Rome upon the first news and allagra that the Carthaginians had taken arms again : and T. Claudius had commission to conduct a fleet with all

A freed into Sicily, and from thence to pals over into Affrick: likewife the other Conful was commanded to flaystill at Rome, until it were certainly known in what terms all matters stood in Affrick, But T. Clauding went but flowly to work either in preparing and rigging an armado, or inputting it to fea; because the LL. of the Senat were of opinion, that as touching the peace and the conditions thereof, it was rather at the dispot tion of Scipio than of the Consul. Moreover, there were certain prodigious figns reported even prefently before the very rumour of the forefaid rifing and injurrection, which caused men to fear greatly. At Cumes, the circle and compass of the sun appeared less: and it rained a good shower of stones. Also in the territory of Velitre, the earth feeled and funk, and made huge hollow chinks, in fo much as trees were quite swallowed up under the ground. At Aricia the market-place and the shops all about, likewise at Frusing the B wall of the City in divers places, yea, and the gate, were smitten with lightning from heaven : and inmount Palatine it rained stones. This wondrous fight last rehearsed, was explate after the ancient custome, by keeping a Novendial facrifice and feast for nine dayes; the rest by killing of greater factifices. Among all, there were unufual deluges and inundations of waters, which trouhed the minds and conferences of men: for the Tyber to twelled and role fo high, that by reason that the shew-place of the Circus was overflown, preparation was made for the letting forth of thegames Apollinares, without the gate Collina, neer the chappel of Venus Erycina. But upon the very day when the plaies should be exhibited, it grew to be in fair weather of a suddain, that the pageant and pompous train of the shew, which was a going to the gate Collina, was called back and conveied into the Circus; and word brought, that the water was fallen and gone clean out from Cthence so the people were more joyons, and the pastimes celebrated with greater resort, for that the usual and ordinary place served again for the solemnity to be performed,

Claudius the Conful at last departed from the City of Rome, and went to sea; where between the hivens of Coffa and Lauretum, he was overtaken with a terrible and fearful tempest that arole and put him in exceeding fear. From thence he came to the Populonii, and there it aied until the tempest was overblown and gone. Then he fell with the Ile * Ilua, and from Ilua he sailed to Cor- * Elba. fica, and from Corfica he passed over to Sardinia; where, as he doubled the point and was passing the race of the mountains called * Infani, there arole a far more cruel gust, and in places of more *Mainomena, perll and hazard, which scattered the fleet. Many of the ships were weather beaten and sore Proton, Cantishaken, many lost their tackling quite, yea, and some were crackt and split. Thus the Armado ben ingmuch toffed and torn, arrived at length at Carales; where, whiles the ships were drawn up into the dock to drie Land, and there a repairing, the winter came upon them, and the year turned about. And so T. Claudius (as a private person, by reason that no man renewed his commishonforafarther time) brought the Armado back to Rome. But M. Servilius, because helshould not be called home to the City for the folemnelection of Magistrats, after he had declared Dictatof, Cn. Servilius Geminus, departed into his Province. And the Dictator chose P. Elius Parus General of the Horsemen. Oftentimes went the writs out for publishing of the election, but by resion of tempests it held not, nor was performed. And therefore when the old Magistrats left their office after the Ides of Murch, and no new substituted in their room, the City was clean without any Magistrats of state to fit in the ivory chair. L. Manlius Torquatus a Bishop, that year edied. In his place was invested C. Sulpitius Galba. The Roman games were thrice exhibited anewby L. Licinius Lucullus and Q. Fulvius, Ediles of the chair. The Clarks and Scribes belonging to the Ædiles, together with their beadles and summoners, were detected for carrying forth certain money out of the treasure and chamber of the City: and being thereof convicted, were therefore condemned, not without some touch and discredit of Lucullus himself the Edile, P. Eliui Tubero and L. Lettorius Ædiles of the commons, for that there was some error and default in their election, refigned up their places, after they had represented the playes, and in regard thereof solemnized the feast of Jupiter, and set up besides in the Capitol three images made of the filter that was forfeited and raised upon the fines of the persons condemned aforesaid. The Dictator and General over the Horlemen, by order from the Senat exhibited the games called Ce-Freales, to the honour of Ceres.

When the Roman Embassadors and Carthaginians together, were come out of Africk to Rme, the Senat affembled to give them audience in the Temple of Bellona: where L. Veturius Phibaffer he had declared (to the exceeding joy of the LL, of the Senar) that they had fought a battall with Annibal, (the last that ever the Carthaginians were like to fight) and that this grievous and imentable war was now come to an end, he went on fill and related, that Vermina the fon of Sphar was vanquished and subdued; which was no small increase of the other exploits so happily atchieved. Then he was commanded to go forth from thence directly to the affembly of the People, there to impare these gladsome news unto the multitude. Whereupon (for exceeding joy and in token of thanklgiving) all the Temples in the City were fer open, and folemn processions 6 decreed for three dayes. Now when as the Embassadors of the Carthagintans and King Philip (for they also were arrived) required to have a day of audience in the Senat; the Dictator by diredion from the Senat, returned them this answer, That the new Consuls should satisfie their requeft. After this, was the folemnassembly holden for the election of Magistrats; and Consuls Were created Cn. Cornelius Lentulus and P. Elius Petus: for Pretors, first M. Junius Pennus, who Was allotted to have the civil jurisdiction in the City: then M. Valerius Falto, unto whom the Britians countrey fell by lot to government, M. Fabins Buteo, whose hap was to rule Sardinia, and P. Ælius Tubeno, to be L. deputy of Sardinia. Concerning the Provinces wherein the Con. H inly were to be employed; it was not thought good to determine any thing, before the Embaffa. dors of King Philip and likewife of the Carthaginians, had delivered their embaffages: for as they taw the end of one war, so they foresaw the beginning of another. Cn. Lemnius the Consul was inflamed with an ardent define of the Province of Affrick: for if the war continued, he simed at an easy victory: and if it were at the point of an end, he gaped at the honor of finishing the same. and hoped to have thename, That determined it was whiles he was Conful. And therefore he proveded plainly, that he would fuffer nothing to pass before that the Province of Affrick were affigned to him. His colleague (a fober, temperate, and discreet man) gave his consent; for he fow full well, that as the contending for that glory with Scipio, was unjust and unreasonable, so inithe would be overmatched, and never able to import and carry it away from him. Q. Mikmius The. I would be overmatched, and first and Tribuns of the commons, gave out and faid, That Cn. Cornling went about to compais that, which was commenced and affaired in vain the year before by T. Claudius the Conful. For when by warrant from the Senat a bill was proposed unto the people, whom their pleasure was to nominate for government of Affrick, all the 35 Tribes gavetheir voices and awarded that Province to P. Scipio. Much contention there paded and many bickerments both in Senat-house and before the people, in the debating of this question: but in theend they grew to this point, to refer all to the judgment of the Senat. So the LL, of the Senat having taken their oath (for so it was agreed upon) thus concluded and gave this order. First, that the two Confuls should either agree together between themselves, or elle cast lots for their Provinces; namely, which of them should have the rule of Italy, and who the charge of a fleet of fifty K fail, Item, to whether of them twain belel the navy, he should fail over into Sicily and is peace might not be fully concluded with the Carthaginians, then to cross over into Affrick; where the Conful should war by Sea, and Scipio by Land, by vertue of the same commission and authority that he had already. Moreover, if the conditions of peace were accepted of both parts, that then the Tribuns of the Commons should propound unto the people, as touching their will and plant fure, whether the Conful or P. Scipio should conclude the peace; and which of them (if the viscorious army after conquest obtained, were to be brought back out of Africk) should have the conduct thereof home again. Alfo, if they nominated Scipio for to make the peace, and bringaway the army likewise, then the Conful should not cut over from Stelly to Africk, As for the other Conful who had the government of Italy, he should receive of M. Seffinis the Pretor, two legions, L So P. Scipio had his commission sealed again for to remain in the Province of Sicily, with the same forces which he there had. M. Valerius Falco the Pretor in the Brutians country was allowed those legions whereof C. Livius had the command the year before. It was further-more agreed, that P. Elins the Pretor fould take the two legions in Sicily of Cat. Tremellins: and that one legion which P. Lentulus the Propretor had under his conduct, was appointed to M. Fabinifor Sardinia, And M. Servilins the Conful of the former year, continued also in his government with his own two legions for Hetraria. As concerning the provinces of Spain; fith L. Cornlins Lentulus and L. Manlius Acidinus had been there for certain years, the faid Confuls were to deal with the Tribuns, that if they thought it good, they should propound unto the Commons, for to know their minds whom they would appoint to govern Spain: and that he who loever it was, should we out of two armies enrol one entire legion of Roman fondiers, and of the allies of the Lainnation make up fifteen cohorts or regiments, and with the frength of them joyntly, keep inobedience and defend the province. Item, that L. Cornelius and L. Manlius should bring overthe o'dfouldiers into Italy. Unto Cornelius the Conful was affigned a fleet of fifty ships, to bededucted and drawn out of two other Armadoes; the one of Cn. Off avius which was in Africk, the other of P. Villius which guarded the coasts of Sicily; and to choose thereout what shipshe would: and that P. Scipio should keep those fifty ships of war which he had already. And incase his pleasure was that Cn. Octavius should be Admiral over them still, like as heretosore; then Office s was to continue in government for that year as Vice-pretor: but if he made Laliusthe Admiral, then Octavins should depart and come home to Rome, and bring back with him those thips that the Vice-conful had no use or need of. M.Fabius likewise had ten gallies offersice allowed him into Sardinia. And the Confuls were appointed to muster and enrol two legions of citizens, that with the power of fourteen legions, and an hundred ships of war, the affairs of Rome that year might be managed.

These things thus ordered, they began to debate in counsel about the Embassadors of Philip and the Carthaginians: and thought good it was to admit the Macedonians into place for 10 have andience. Divers and fundry speeches they made, whiles they laboured partly to cleer that point as touching the complaints that the Embaffadors fent from Rome made before the King for the forraging and spoiling of their confederats: and partly complained themselves of theal lies of the people of Rome, laying much to their charge: but far more bitterly accusing M. Amelias, forthat he being one of the three Embaffadors fent unto them, flaid behind and took muflers of fouldiers; yea, and against the covenant comprised in the league, made war upon them, and offentimes gave barrel unro their Captains and Governors in open field: partly allo mordemanded, that the Macedonians and their Captain Sopater, who had served in the wars of Annibal for wages, and were taken prifoners and kept bound in prifon, might be enlarged and fer at liberty,

To these points M. Furius, sent of purpose from Autelius out of Macedonia, made answer briefin this wife, That Aurelius who was left behind, for fear that the affociats of the people of Reme, wearied with rodes and incursions into their territories and other injurious oppressions, might revolt unto the King; never departed out of the confins of the affociats aforefaid, and endearoused only, that those robbers and forragers of the country should not invade and over-sun their lands, and go clear away without any harm. As for Soparer, he was a state and peer of the ridm, and one neerly allied unto the King, who lately was tent into Affrick with four thousand Macedonians and with money, to aid and affalt Annibal and the Carthaginians, When as the Macedonians being required what they could fay to thele challenges framed but a doubtful and intricatedelence, before they had well made an end they received this for their answer: That since the King fought war if he proceeded and went on fill, he should shortly have his hands full but foralmuch as he had broken the league in two points, first in offering wrong to the allies or the people of Rome, and moletting them by way of war and hostility; and secondly, in helping their enemies with men and money, they deemed thus much of it that not only ? Some both did & doth well and julily, in keeping them still in prison as enemies, who bare arms against the people of Rome, and were taken captive; but also M. Aurelius performed good service to the State, and a great pleasure to the Senat, in defending the Allies of the people of Rome by force of arms, when by right of league he could not. When the Macedonians had their dispatch, and were sent away with this heavy answer, then the Carthaginian Embassadors were called in,

When they beheld their reverent age, and the dignity of their personage (for they were the belt and principal men simply of their City) then every man was fully perswaded for his own part and faid, That now they dallied no longer, but meant in deed and good earnest to crave & have The Oration peace, But the chief and most portly person of them all was one Afdrabal, in his countrey and a- of Afdrabal mong his citizens furnamed Hadus, a man that ever perswaded peace, & opposed himself against Hadus in the the Barchine faction. And therefore he had the more credit and authority, when he derived Senat of Rome. "the blame from the Common-weal, and laid all the fault upon the wilfulness and greedy ava-"rice of some few. Who after he had used diverse and fundry speeches, one while excusing and "deating the crimes, another while confessing somethings objected, lest if they had denied cer-"tain tuths, they should with more difficulty have obtained pardon and peace: now and then "allogiving the LL of the Senat an admonition and warning by the way, to use their prosperity "and good fortune modestly and with moderation, he added moreover and said, That if the Carthat mians would have been ruled by him & Hanno, and had been so wise as to have taken their time and the opportunity when it was, they thould themselves have given those conditions of " peace, which now they are constrained to crave. But for men to be fortunate and wife both at "once, it is a rare and special gift, and seldome seen. And heroit is that the people of Rome (quoth "he) is invincible, because in prosperity they can remember to be wise, and to take the best way "forthemselves. And certainly, a wonder it were, if ever they should do otherwise. For those "commonly who happen to meet with some new good success, and have not been used thereto "before, overshoot and pass themselves too much in excessive joy; which they have not the grace "togovern with sobriety and discretion : whereas the people of Rome have ever been accusto-"med to the continual felicity of joyous victofies; infomuch as they are grown into a difuse of "taking pleasure and delight in them (so common they are) and have encreased their dominion "and Empire, more (in manner) by sparing and pardoning those whom they have conquered,

"than by the very conquest of them indeed. "The speech that the other Embassadors made, was more pitiful and lamentable, whiles they reconnted before the Senat from what high estate, and to how base condition they were fallen: who but a while since held by force of arms, as it were the whole world, & had nothing left them now but the bare walls of the City of Carthage, within which they were shut up, and could see nothing either by land or fea, which they might rightfully claim as their own. Nay, the very Civit ielf and their houses, they were to enjoy no longer than the people of Rome is willing, and forbeareth to proceed by rigour and extremity against the same, since there is nothing elle behind to work upon Now when as the LL of the Senat seemed to encline to mercy and compilion one Senator there was amongst them (by report) who upon a deep and inverterate hatred of the Carthaginians trechery, spake out aloud and faid, "What Gods will they regard and swear by inmaking of a new league, who have broken their oath, and taken their name in vain whom "they called to witness in the former? Mary (ed. Asdrubal) even those and no other that are so that terengers and heavy enemies to the breakers of league and covenant. So when all their minds were enclined to peace, C., Lenulus the Consul, who had the government of the navy, opposed himself against the decree of the Senat sorto cross the same. Then M. Attilius, and Q. Mimiting, Thomas of the Commons, preferred a folemn bill unto the people, in this form: Pleafeth in you, and will you grant, That the Senat shall resolve and determine, that peace may be concluded with the Carthaginians? Pleaseth it you to chuse and appoint who shall be the man to make that peace, and who shall bring the army out of Africk? As concerning peace, the tribes every one as they were demanded their voices, granted affirmatively (Uni rogatis) that Scipio hould conclude it, and also bring away the army. By vertue of this Act passed by the people, the Senst made a decree, that P. Scipio by the advice and counsel of ten Commissioners, should con-14ct an accord with the people of Garthage, under what conditions he thought good. After this the Carthaginians rendred thanks to the LL. of the Senate, and requested that they might enter the into the City, and talk with their fellow citizens and country-men, who had been taken captives aforetime, and lay in the common goal and prilon. For there were amongst them some of their kinsfolk and friends, noblemen of birth and of good quality; others also, unto whom they were to deliver some message and credence from their kinimen. When they had spoken and communed with them, they came with a new petition and made earnest fuit, to give them leave to raniome and redeem as many of them as they would: whereupon they were willed to give them their names; and when they had named fait upon two hundred, an order was granted out of the Senar. that the Roman Commissioners should take over with them into Affrick unto Scipio two hundred of those captives whom the Carthaginians would make choice of; and declate unto him from the Senate, that in case the peace were fully agreed upon and finished, he should deliver ! those two hundred to the Carthaginians, freely without paying any ransome. Now when the heralds of arms were appointed togo into Affrick, for to confirm and establish the peace accor. ding to the folemn order, at their own request there passed an act of the Senat framed in this form and tenor. Imprimis, That they should carry with them every one by himself, certain flint stones of their own, and likewise Verven. Item, That the Roman Pretors should command them folemnly to pronounce the league, and then they to ask of the Pretor facred herbs or Verven, A kind of grass or herb this is, which was wont to be gathered from off the Capitol hill, and given to the Heralds.

Thus were the Carthaginians dismissed and sent from Rome: who being come into Affrick to Scipio, concluded peace with the same capitulations as is abovefaid. And so they delivered up y their gallies and ships of war, their Elephants, the renegate traitors, the vagrant fugitives, and sour thouland prisoners. Among whom was Q Terentius Cuello, a Senator by his calling, Assorthe thips, to foon as they were lanched forth into the deep, Scipio caused them to be set on fire and burnt. Some report that they were five hundred in number, one with another, of every fort, and all directed and guided by oars. Presently were they set a burning: a dolorous sight and heavy spectacle (no doubt) to the Carthaginians for to behold, as if Carthage it self had been on a light fire. The renegat traitors and rebels were punished more grievously than the fugitives, Asmany of them as were of the Latin Nation loft their heads; all that were natural Romans, were condfied and roundly truffed up on the gallows. Forty years before was the peace last made with the Carthaginians, when Q. Luttarius and A. Manlius were Confuls. The war began threeand twenty years after, whiles P. Cornelius and T. Sompronius were Confuls. And the fame ended in the eighteenth year after, P. Cornelius, and P. Elius Matus being Confuls. Many a time after, Scipio by report, would say, that the willful and covetous defire of T. Claudius first, and afterwards of Cn. Cornelius, was the only flay and let, that this war ended not with the final ruin and utter destruction of Carthage. When as the Carthaginians, who by long and continual wars were grown bare & poor, thought the levy and contribution of money for to furnish out the first payment, lay heavy and fore upon them, infomuch as in their Senat-house, there was great for row and heaviness, yea, and pitcous weeping; it is faid, that Annibal wasfeen to laugh a good while. And when A. Hedns rebuked him for laughing in that publick lamentation of the City, confidering that himself was the cause of M those tears, " If (qd, Annibal) as we see by our eye the outward disposition of the face and com-"tenance, so we could look within & behold the affection of the mind, ye might soon perceive, 6 that this laughter of mine, which ye so much blame, proceedeth not from an heart that is glad " and joyful, but rather fenfeless, supified, and astonied with the exceeding griess and calamites "that have hapned. Yet is not it so unseasonable and impertinent to our present condition, as "these tears of yours, and weeping that you make, is absurd and nothing to the purpose. Then " should ye have wept and shed tears, when our armor and weapons were taken from us, when "our ships were set on fire, when we were interdicted and forbidden to make war with forrain "nations: for then had we our deadly blow, then our backs and hearts were broken. And never think that the Romans have proceeded hardly against you, in comparison of the hatted that ye " bare one to another. No great City and mighty State can long continue and rest inquier. If it 44 have no enemies abroad, it findeth some at home: much like unto strong and lusty bodies, which " feeming fure enough against all outward accidents and causes of fickness, are overcharged with " their own strength and fulness of humours, and thereby subject to most deadly maladies. So "much, forfooth, and no more we feel of the publick miferies & common calamities, as toucheth "and concerneth our selves in particular: wherein nothing pincheth us more, nor goeth neeres "to the quick, than to forgo our mony, and part with our pence. And therefore when Carthage was conquered and despoiled of all her ancient honors, when ye saw her disarmed and stripped " naked, when ye faw her forlorn of all the armed nations of Affrick; no man then fighed, no man "groned thereat: but now when the tribute imposed, is to be paid out of your privat purses, ye "keep a weeping and wailing, as in some publick funeral and mortuary carried forth. But alas, I "fear me greatly that ere it be long, ye shall find and feel, That your weeping this day hath been "for the least loss of all the rest. Thus spake Annibal to the Carthaginians.

Scipio having affembled his whole army together before them all, reftored Mafaniffa to his fathers Kingdom: and over and besides, endued him with the possession of the City Cirches, and other Towns and territories which belonged to the realm of Sypkax, and were now in subjection A to the people of Rome. Unto Cn. Offavins he gave order to conduct the fleet into Sicily, and there to make it over to Cn. Corneling the Conful. The Carthaginian Embaffadors he willed to go to Rome, that those acts and capitulations which were concluded by him with the advice of the ten Commissioners, might likewise pass under the approbation of the Senat, and the consent of the people, and so be ratified and confirmed for ever.

Thus Scipio having obtained peace both by sea and land, and embarked his army, sailed toward Sicily, & arrived at Lilybaum. From whence he fent away a great part of his army by fea, and himfelt paffed by land through Italy, which now was joyfull as well for the peace concluded, as the victory archieved. Where all the way as he went, not only the people came forth in multitudes out of the Cities to do him honour, but numbers also of the country peasants out of the Villages, tilled B all the high-waies along until he came to Rome: where he entred the City, riding in the most flately and magnificent triumph that ever had been. He brought into the City Chamber 100033 pound weight of filver. He divided among his fouldiers out of the spoil * four hundred Asies a * Or, 28 some pecce. Syphax by his death rather disappointed the people of a goodly shew and pageant in the thick to. triumph, than diminished any whit the glory of the triumpher: he died at Tybur not long afore, to which coverth which place he had been removed from Alba: howbeit his death was not objected by reasonthat English. he was folemnly carried to his buriall, with the pomp of a publike funerall at the charges of the City, But Polybius a writer of good account, reporteth, That this King was led in the very triumph. As Scipio rode triumphant Q. Terentins Culleo followed after with a cap of liberty fet upon his head; and ever after, to long as he lived, he honoured him (as beteeming it was) and acknowledged Chim the author of his freedom. But as concerning his furname Africanus, I cannot for certain learn, whether it were the favour of his fouldiers first, or the affectionate love of the people afterwards that brought it up, or rather began upon some of his own house and linage that courted and flattered him therewith: like as in our fathers daies Sulla was furnamed * Fælix, and Pompeius, * Happy. * Magnus. This is certain that he was the first General that ever took his name of the country * Great. and nation by himself subdued, and thereby was renowned. But by his example afterwards, others nothing comparable to him in victory and conquest won goodly titles and glorious inscriptions totheir Images, and honoured their houses with noble stiles and additions.

The Breviary of L. Florus upon the one and thirtieth Book.

E The causes of the war begun again with Philip King of Macedony, which had discontinued, are I set down to be these; In the time of the holy scale of Ceres, two young men of Acarnania, who had not been professed in those sacred mysteries, came to Athens, & chanced among other of their countrimen to go into the Chappel of Ceres. For which as if they had committed some hainous fact in the highest degreethey were by the Athenians executed. The Acarnanians moved with indignation for the death of their neighbours, required aid of Philip to be revenged for them: Some few months after peace grantedto the Carthaginians, in the five hundred and fifty year from the foundation of the City of Rome, when the Embassadors of the Athenians, who now were besieged by Philip, craved aid of the Senat, and they were of advice and resolved to help them, notwithstanding the Commons gainsaid it (by reason that they thought the continual troubles of so many wars were grievous and heavy unto them) yet so far prevailed the authority of the Nobles, that the people also gave their consent to succour their confederate PCity. This war was committed to the managing of P. Sulpitius the Co ful: who led an army into Micedony, and fought certain battels fortunatly against Philip, which were performed by horse-service. The Abjuens being invested and beleaguered round about by Philip, following the example of the Saguntins, Mentheir wives and children, and their own selves after them. L. Furius the Prator overthrew in a pitcht field the Gauls, called Insubres, that rebelled, and likewife Amilcar the Carthaginian who began to make war in those parts, where Amilcar was stain, or with him five and thirty thousand men. Moreover, this book container the expeditions and voyages of King Philip and Sulpitius the Conful. and the winning of certain Cities by them both. Sulpitius the Conful warred with the help of King Attalus and the Rhodiaus, L. Furius the Prator triumphed over the Gauls.

"Ull well apaid am I likewise, that I am now come to an end once of the Punick war, as if myself had been in person there, and born my part in the toil and danger thereof. For albeit unfitting it is forme (who have undertaken and professed so boldly to write a compleat and ful flory of the Romans) to be wearied in the severall parts of so great a work: yet when I think and confider, how threescore years and three (for so many are reckoned from the first w Punick war, to the end of the second) have taken up no tewer books of mine than four hundred eighty eight years before, even from the foundation of Rome unto the Confulthip of that Appius Claudius, who was the first that warred upon the Carthaginians; methinks I foresee already, that like as they who being once entred into the shallows near the shore, are trained on ftill, and venture to wade into the sea, even so I, the farther I go forward, the deeper I step, and am carried away in a vast Ocean, and bottomless gulph (as it were) which cannot be founded; and that my work groweth still upon me in my hands, which as I went away apace, and rid matters at the first, I would have thought by this time should havede-

The Carthaginian peace was no fooner concluded, but the Macedonian war straightwaies en I fued: nothing comparable to the Punick, if ye regard the hazard and danger, the vertue of the Captains for direction, or prowefs of the fouldiers: but if a man confider the Nobility and reputation of the ancient Kings, the fame and antiquity of the nation, the greatness of their seignory and dominion, who in times past had conquered and held by the sword much in Europe, and the better part of Asia, I dare well say, as noble and renowned, if not more. But the war commenced against Philipten years almost before, had ere three years end been laid down and discontinued by means of the Ætolians: who as they gave occasion to enter into arms, so they wrought a composition of peace, But afterwards in process of time, when the Romans by reason of peace with the Carthaginians, had nothing to do, and were at leilure; and yet bearing an inward grudge, and owing a displeasure to Philip, as well for his faithless peace with the Ætolians and other allies and con-K federates of that country, as also for aid both of men and money lately fent into Affrick to Annibal and the Carthaginians: behold, the Athenians, whose territories he had clean wasted and spoiled, and whom he had driven within their City walls, importuned them with their prayers, and perswaded them to take arms and renew the war aforesaid. And much about the same time there arrived Embassadors from King Attalus, as also from the Rhodians, giving notice that divers Cities and States of Afia were follicited likewise by Philipto band against the Romans, These Embassadors had their dispatch, and received this answer, That the Senat would have a carefull eyeto the affairs of Asa. But the entire treaty and consultation concerning the Macedonian war was wholly referred and referred unto the Confuls, who then were employed in the war with the Boii. In the mean season three Embassadors were addressed unto Ptolomeus the King of Egypt, tol. wit, C.Claudius Nero, M. Emilius Lepidus, and P. Sempronius Tuditanus, with this commission: First, to signifie and let him understand, that Annibal & the Carthaginians were subdued: secondly, to give thanks unto the King for continuing fo fast and faithfull unto the Romans in their dilltels and adverfity, when other of their allies, and even their next neighbours for fook and abandoned them: last of all, to request him, that in case they should be forced by wrongs and injuries offered, to wage war against Philip, he would vouchfafe the same mind still and his wonted affectionate favour toward the people of Rome.

Near about this time, P. Ælius the Conful being in France, advertised that the Boians before his coming had made rodes into the lands of the friends and allies of the Romans, presently it all haste levied and enrolled two legions upon the rumour of this tumult and trouble; and joyning M thereunto four cohorts of footmen out of his own army, fent C. Appins a Colonellor Captain of the Confederates, with this power so suddenly raised, and with commandment to march through that part of Umbria, which is called, the Tribe Sappinia, and to invade the territories of the Boil, whiles himself in person led his forces the open way traversing through the mountains, and same thicher. Appins being entred into the confines of the enemies, at the first had a good hand, and sped well in forraging the country with safety of himself. But afterwards, having made choice of a meet place near unto a Castle called * Mutilum, for to cut down and reap the corn, (for now the fields were ready for harvest) but yet, without espials sent out to discover the coasts about, without fetting strong and sufficient guards, which being well appointed and armed might defend the unarmed that were busie in their harvest work; he chanced himself and all his forragers and N reapers to be surprised at unawares by the Frenchmen, and assailed on every side. Whereupon they also that were aimed sled in great sright; and 7000 men stragling here and there over the com fields were flain; and among them C. Appius himself their leader. The rest for fear were driven to put themselves within their Camp: from whence without direction and guidance of any certain Captain and only upon a generall confent of the fouldiers, the night next following they abandoned their hold, left much of their baggage behind them, and through blind forrests, chaies, and wild mountains (in manner unpaffable) they came in the end to the Conful: who, after he had performed in his Province no memorable act, save only that he wasted the borders and frontiers of the Boil andim de a league with the Ingauni (a nation of the Ligurians) returned to Rome, So foon as he had affembled the Senat, all the whole house with one voice called upon him to treat O and confult upon no other matter before they had determined of King Philip, and the complaints made by their allies: so he proposed that out of hand to be debated in Councill. And the Senate in a frequent number there met, passed a decree, that P. Alius the Consul should send whom he thought good with commission and authority for to receive the Armado which Cn. Offanius was to bring out of Sicily, and therewith to cross over into Macedonia. So M. Valerius Lavinus the Vice-Prator was fent; and when he had taken the charge of the fleet, confiA fling of eight and thirty fail, at the hands of Cu. Ottavius about Vibo, he passed the seasto Macedonia. Now when M. Aurelius the Lieurettant was come, and had enformed and advertifed him, what puissant armies, what numbers of filips the King had prepared and got rogether; how partly himself in person by going about not only to all the Cities of the Conment, but also the illands in the lear and partly by fending his Embafladors every ($37; had follicited unto war, and raifed much people to take arms: shewing moreover, that the Romans were not to enterprise that war without preparation of greater forces; and that more foeedily; for fear left if they made flow hafte and lingred, Philip might enterprise that adventure, which Pyrrhus (a Potentate and Prince of a fat leifer Dominion') had done before: it was thought meet that Aurelius should dispatch his letters to the same effect mothe Confuls and

B the Senat. In the end of this year, when a motion was propounded in the Schat, House as concerning the ferting out of lands unto the old fouldiers for recompence of their good fervice, who, unde conduct and fortunate government of Sopio the Pro Conful, had brought the was in Affrica to an end : the LL enacted's decree, that M. Junius the Prator of the City, if he thought fo good, should create ten Decemvirs as surveyors, for to measure out and divide among them the lands in Samnium and Apulia, bomuch as had been forfeit and confilcate to the people of Rome. And thele were they : namely, P. Servilius, Q. Cacilius Metellus, Cheus and Marcus, named Servilii and both furnamed Gemini, Lucius and Aulus both Hostilii, and furnamed Gatoes likewife, P. Villius Tappu-

lus, MiFulvius Flaccus, P. Ælius Parus, and Q. Flaminius.

At the same time P. Ælius the Cof. called the assembly and high Court of Parliament for eledion of Magistrates: and for Cof, were created P. Subpitius Galba, and C. Aurelius Cotta, After them were the Prators chosen, to wit, Q. Minutius Rufus, L. Furius Purpureo, Q. Fulvins Gillo; and C. Sergins Planeus. The Roman flage-plaies were that year exhibited with great flate and magnificence molt fumptuoully, by L. Valerius Flaccus, and T. Quintius Flaminus, Ædiles of the Chair, and for two daies together were represented anew. These Ædiles distributed and divided most faithfully among the people a mighty deal of corn, which Scipio the Pro-Conful had fent out of Affrick, at four Affes the Modius: whereby they won great love and favour of all men. Also the Plebeian plaies were thrice fer forth all whole again by the Ædiles of the Commons, L.Ap flus Fullo, and Q. Minutius Rufus. This man from his Ædileship stepped to the Prators place. And by occasion

D of those plaies there was a solemn scalt celebrated in the honour of Jupiter. Inthe 544 year from the foundation of the City, when P. Sulpitius Galba, and C. Aurelius were Coff, the wat with King Philip began, within four months after peace granted to the Carthaginians, And before all other matters this affair was propounded in the Senate by P. Sulpitius the Coi, upon the Ides of March, the very day on which at that time they used to enter upon the Consulthip. Where by the Senate it was decreed, Impaints, That the Consuls should factifice with greater beafts to what gods themselves thought good, with a solemn prayer in this form: That what loever the Senate and people of Rome minded and intended to do, either concerning theaffairs of the Common-wealth, or the undertaking and enterprise of this new war, the same might speed well and happily in the end, to the behoof of the people of Rome, their allies, and E maely, the nation of the Latines, Item, That after facrifice and divine prayer they should conflik with the Senat about the state of the City, and the government of the Provinces. At the same time it fell out very fitly to provoke and flir up their minds unto war, that not only letters were brought from M. Aurelius the Lieutenant, and from M. Valerius Lavinus the Vice-Prator: but also a new Embassie of the Athenians arrived; the one importing, and the other reporting, that the King drew near and approached their confines, and within a while would be not only Lord of their lands and retritories, but also Master of their City, unless the Romans ser too their helping hand. After that the Confuls had openly pronounced and declared, that the facrifices were performed rightly and according to order, and that the Gods gave ear unto their prayer, and accepted thereof: and the four his yers and bowell-priers likewise out of their learn-Fing made answer and shewed, that the inwards of the beasts were as they should be, and signified happiness, namely, the enlarging of their confines and frontiers, with the atchieving of victory and triumph. Then were the letters above said of Valerius and Aurelius read, and the Athenian Ambassadors had a day of audience After this, there passed an Act of the Senate, That thanks should be rendred unto their allies, for that they being long rempted and sollicited for to revolt, yet notwithstanding had not failed in their allegeance, nor for faken their fealty, no, not for fear of a present siege. As touching sending aid unto them, it was thought good to give answer, when the Consuls had their Provinces allotted unto them; and when that Consul whose hapit should be for to go into Macedony, had proposed unto the people, That defiance should be given to Philip King of Macedony, and open war proclaimed against him. Now it fell by lot unto P. Sulpirius to take that charge in Macedony, who preferred and prefented a bill unto the peo-G ple in this manner: Pleaseth it you, and is it your will, that war be proclaimed and denounced against King Philip and the Macedonians within his Realm and Dominion for the wrongs offered and the war levied by them upon the friends and allies of the people of Rome ? Unto the other Conful Aurelius befell the Province of Italy. Then upon this the Prators call lots for their Provinces, Cn, Sergius Plancus had the jurisdiction of the City ! Q. Fukvins Gillo was to governthe Province of Sicily, Q. Minutius Rufas of the Brutii, and L. Furius Purpuris of France.
